fication* to his Holiness and his Cardinals, he recei-ued this short answer, that it was a business which asked mature deliberation and better informations; the Pope soon finding, that the Sub-prior was too sleight an instrument for him to worke with, and for King John to be wrought with, and therefore bethought him of some fitter hammer for so hard an Anvill.
But fundry stoppes were in the way, which wily and by degrees were to be removed. The first was (which Reginald in likelihood had imparted to hasten his owne dispatch) that the Bishopps of the Province claimed a ioint interest with the Monkes, in choice of their Primate: a point which could no way suite with the Popes aduantage, because Bishopps were generally much obliged to their Soueraignes, and so likely still to Elect a Royalist, whereas Cloystermen, professing ignorance of worldly affairs, and obedience to one Superior, might more easily be swayed to bend as the Pope would bow them, in preferring his creatures. Which was the Motiue (we may suppose) of the Popes * letters, soone after sent to the Suffragane Bishopps, exhorting them by * sacred example, and precept of filiall obedience, to desist from vexing, like vandusfull sonnes, their Mother Church with such vnde claims. The Bishopps notwithstanding, who knew themselves in sacred writ to be styled Fathers, would not thus acknowledge the Monkes for their Mothers, till Innocentius to his light Reasons added the weight of his Keyes, and by his power swept both that and other, rubs out of his intended way. For the King keeping his Christmas at Oxford, (attended as it seemeth by his Bishopps) meaning not to pretermitt any faire means to worke the Popes inclination towards the new Elect, he sent for * twelve of the Monkes, whom with some other of his owne Clerks (which carried his letters to the Pope) he put in trust for transacting this business at Rome; allotting them very bountifull expences out of his Exchequer for their whole journey. They to leave with the King (who knew well the traines of Rome, and the ouer-reaching fetches of Innocentius), a pledge of their duty, and assurance of his hopes,

* entered with him * a covenant by oath, that no man, nor meanes should remove them from him, whom the King & themselves had already appointed. The Bishopps sent * the same time their Procurators also, to plead their right of Co-election; so as, foure obstacles stood at once in the Popes way, (the two elections of the Monkes, and the two claims of the King and Prelates, hee for his Royal assent, they for their ioynt consent, in the choice) which all must be done and voided before the Pope can haue his full forth.

But because these will aske long time for contriving, (which moued his Holiness to adourn the hearing to the very * end of the year) wee will see the while how the King and State of England is imploied.

(33) The dorre, which deceased Hubert did put vpon K. John and his late design, gaue both K. Philip aduantage, to take surer footing in his new possessions, and King John greater stomack and edge to recover his old. The last taske (almost) of the one, and hold of the other, was Chinon a place of great strength, but in nothing more, then in the cuer-trusty valour of her Captain, Roger Lacy; who (if * some mistake him not in steed of * Hubert de Burgo) being redeemed from the French, resolved here to giue Philip another taste of his prowess, and King John of his fidelitie; had not others faithlesse feare defeated his braue resolution. For the besieged having * no rest night or day, from a long and incefsant batterie, their Commanders inuincible constancy against yielding, which enheartned the better sort, disinayed the baser, as more prizing their life, then their faith or fame; some of which by night slipping ouer the walles, so instructed the enemy of all secret aduantages to possess the towne, that by a sodaine assault, both it and Lacy (more worth then it,) was againe surprized. Here seemed to haue bene the Garland of Philips conquest; had not newes bene thither brought vnto him of some new risings in Brittaine, where Guido, the husband of Constantia, Arthurs Mother, (sensible be-like of the false-grounded wronges offered to King John, vnder pretence of Arthur), * returned gladly both into Amity and a strong league with the English: and with him also Samary Malleon, and Almerick Lusignian, * two Peeres of heroicke valour and great command, whom King John of his * prisoners, had made by prudent and louely viage his trusty friends.
The French King fuming to see his vniust intrusions thus preiudiced, (especially by Arthurs owne father in law) was hastning from Chinon into Brittaine, to worke reuenge on them, whose exemplar equic should haue bene his mirrour of amendments; Englands King on the other side, was no lesse heart-ned with this new consideration, sleuying once again a puissant Army, which he * landed at Rochel, being the only noted place, which in all these turmoiles and mutabilities of Fortunes, kept her selfe entire from entrance either of enemy, or of disloyall thought.

(34) The King hauing his Army much augmented * with great concourses of his best affected Provincials, marching confidently forward, subdued a great portion of that Country; till comming to Mont-Alban, a Castle of much renowne, (as being repuputed * inexpugnable, and now the Rende-uou of his most potent enemies, and all their flower of Chivalry, hee gaue a terrible assault thereto for 15. dayes together; where at last his * Englismens valour was so adventurous in scaling the walles, and both giuing and taking blowes vnpertable, that in those few dayes hee entered Conquerour into that very place, * which Charles the great, could not get with his seuen years siege.

The multitude of Nobles therein taken was so great; that hee lent into England a bedroll of their names, for a memoriall of so great a victory. Which auspicious beginnings hee seconded with no lesse expedition, prouidence, and prowess, in the siege of An-giers, where on his first approach, hee * gaue present instructions to his maine Army, suddenly to enui-ron the whole City, & by assault to seeke entrance at the walles on euery side, whiles himselfe and his selected band, with fire and Engines would assaile the Gates; where with great celerity, and no lesse hazard then hardinesse, breaking through, he became Lord of his owne. But whatsoeuer were the Citizens demerites, pititious it was, that their offences, and the Conquerors wrath, lay so heauy on those stately walles, as * to throw them flatte to the ground; which hasty doome, (it being the * cradle of his birth, and City of his chiefest delight) hee as excessively (and very deely too) repented, when with excessive expences hee encircled it againe with a beautie farre beyond the former. These faire successes, humbling all the Country before him, cleared his passage into Picardy, whither King Philip was now conuerting all his power to oppose himselfe against the violence of this Torrent: which * now more facily hee might stoppe, hauing in his way by laying secret ambushments, laid hands vpon Duke Guido, Suary, and Almerick, King Johns principall hopes, as they were busily aduancing his present affairs: by which surprize, though the Engliss forces missing their Provinciall aids, were greatly impaired, yet their * great hearts were not much amated, as the Frenchmen found, when both the Armies neere appoaching our night, the next morning alacriously they addressed to the fight, and with great spirits on each side expected the Signall. Notwithstanding, the day likely to proue dreadfull with expence of blood, vpon carnell interceding of * forraigne Prelates and religious persons, who undertook equally to compose all things; both Kinges condescended to a two-yeeres * Truce, King John chiefly out of affection to his Captiue friends, whose liberty was formost in the conditions.

(35) Hauing thus settled those Countries in farre better termes then last hee found them, hee embarked for England; where hee laid not aside a careful (though distastfull) prouidence, for still bettering those his successes: for which ends, whiles from his Subiects (both Lay and Clergy) hee * gathered money, the Sinewes of warre, hee lost their affections, the ioints of Peace; whereof Geffrey Archbishoppe of Torke (his Natural and vnnatural brother) was a principall incentiue; who * solemnly cursing all the Kinges receiueurs within his Prouince, fled secretly out of the land, which periculiue, * a bitter enemy of K. John, yet bitterly taxeth, saying, * the Engliss Bishopps were farre from that dutifull obseruance towards their Soue-raigne, which the French Bishopps performed to theirs, at whose command they maintained Souldiers in his warres against King John, acknowledging they were so bound to doe, as often as the King pursued the warres in person though now also they did it, where hee was not in person.
And indeed how hollow-hearted to the State those money-murmurers were, their * owne friend bebetraied, shewing, how with curses they wished, and prayed to God, that these exactions might neuer haue any good success, though they knew it was purposefull for preferring a maine part of the Kingdom. A di-loyalty the more vnusufferable by the King, knowing that but * a very little before, the Popes Legate, *Io.
* Fiorentinus*, nick-named * Ferentinus, for bearing a way so much money, had * gathered of the Clergy a huge masse of money which in full chests hee conuoyed to Rome. Yet all these domesticke grudges abated not the Kings due care, nor yet his good hopes, which were soone after much augmented by the encouragements of Othoes Imperiall presence, * who in person arriving here in England, to proiect for his owne and his vnles warres, was with great ioyes met by the King, and conducted through London by night, where all the City was scene in her glory, all the streetes adorned with richest hangings, beautified all along with the lustre of pendant Crownes, and burning lampes: who after some dayes of royall entertainments; hence departed not vnfurnished with helpes to defray his warres.

(36) Whiles King John thus busied about his open hostilities, Pope Innocentius is plotting his secret Stratagemes against him at Rome: where, like vnto that * other old Roman, who being chosen em-perre touching some march-lands betwixt two neighbour Nations, vnpartiall to either, * adiudged it from them both to the Romane State; so hee now, being Arbiter betwixt the King, Bishopps, & Monks, concerning their choice, hee means to defeat them all, and * adudge the right of disposing thereof to his Romish See. Therefore, at the * fore-limited day of hearing, his first care was, that the * Bishopps lippes for euer should be sealed vp, (notwithstanding their * allegations of Law, Reason, Decrees, and Practice), fro intermeddling in choice of their own Primate. Will you heare the maine reason? because himselfe, and some other Popes would haue it so. Which definitive sentence being * sent to the Prelates into England, it was thought a point of prudence also, to * prepare the King and worke him pliable before hand, to entertaine that which was to follow: which must be done by amiable lines, and gemmes, wherewith he knew the King was much delighted. His Present, being 4. gold Rings, with foure precious stones, an Emrault, Saphire, Ruby, & Topaze, hee so vainely & childishly (though * ignorance entitle it eloquence) celebrateth in his * Epistle, for their number, forme, and colour, that no man will question whether it were dictated with an Apostol-licke Spirit. The Rings Roundnesse must remember the King of Eternity; the Quadrat number of Constancy, and of the foure Cardinall vertues, Iustice, Fortitude, Prudence, Temperance; the Gold price of wisedom, the Emraults greenenesse, of Faith; the Saphires brightnesse, of Hope; the Rubies readnesse, of Charity; the Topazes clearenesse, of operative Sanctitie &c. Which, though toys, were yet accepted as pledges of loue for a while, till at last, the King finding by the sequale, they were but baits to beguile him, esteemed the Popes Gold as dross, his Jewels as * Jewells fraudes, and his loue as most vancoured hatred. For shortly after came to his notice, the most indignious iniurie, which the Pope meant to obtrude vpon him and his Kingdom, hauing not onely hunted both Reynard and Gray out of their holdes, but also imposed vpon him, for the chief place and managing of his State, one whose hee reputed a chief and dangerous Enemy to himselfe and it: which thus was fetched about.

(37) The Monkes freed from the Bishopps impugning, were now in the strife amongst themselves; the * one side against Reyners election vrged, it wanted Royal assent, the greater and sounder part of Electors, due solemnities, due * time: the other, against Norwich, that no second election could be validous, unless the former were first annulled. Both their Reasons pleased well the Pope; who (as pre-posessed Iudges often vfe) made shew of * great diligence in pondering the Pleadings, whereas himselfe long before had resolved on his Sentence; which was, that by Apostollicall definitive doome, neyther of the Elects should euer be capable of that See. So great rubbes hath the Pope with so little breath blowen out of his way. The man whose aduancement al this while hee had aimed at, was now commended to them them, who must be there presently chosen for their Primate, Stephen Langton, a Cardinal, English by birth, French by education and affection, one of the transcendent power in the Roman Court, that the Pope was thought not for love, but for envy, (as being himself eclipsed by his nearness) to have wished his service in some remoter dignity. But the Monks ill apaid with what was done already, and very tremulous to enter matter of new intrications, all edged against all further courses, that no Canonically Election could be there made, they having consent neither of King nor Consent; at which word the Pope snapping them up, bad them know, that he had there plenitude of power over the Church of Canterbury; and besides, that no consent of Princes used to be expected in Elections celebrated where the Pope was: hee therefore charged them under paine of his high curse, (a terrible bug-bear in those daies) there presently to choose him for their Primate, whom himselfe thought good to nominate unto them. Thus trembling vnder the cracke of this thunderbolt, they all excepting one Helias de Branfield (whose constancy shall perpetuate his memory, durst not for feare but elect him, though very unwillingly, and with murmuration: whole Consecration followed by the Popes owne hands at Viterbium, and his earnest recommendation by the Popes flattering letters, to the Kings fauourable acceptance. And this was the vnblest beginning of those new miseries which brought the King to his ending, and his Kingdom to vn-reportable calamities, all which, little did his Holiness or his Charity reckon off, so his desperate Politie might take effect. Yet not vnderly felt those iudgements on manie Princes of those times, who neglecting the domesticke execution of Supreme iustice, suffered their Subjects, at so high a rate both of expence and trauels, to buy such arbitrary and dangerous formes of a foraine, and fallily named Iustice.

(38) Two very presumptuous Lames hath one observed to haue bene first hatched by this lawlesse Pope, the one occasioned by King Iohn and Philips former strife, that Princes delinquent must be liable to correction from the Pope; the other, vpon the choice of the Emperor, that where in elections voices are equal, or concord wanting, the Pope may gratifie whome hee please: vnto which we now may add a third no less carduous & insolent, that the Pope may strike up Elections, both where, and of whom, and with, and without what consent himselfe. Which lewd obtrusion, that it galled the King to the quick, we need not maruaile, if wee ballance in one scale, the Popes meere will and pleasure in the other, the dishonour to the King (thus to be triued out of that, which so vehemently, and with his owne preference hee took care to see effected) the prejudice to his Crowne, to be defeated of Soueraigne assent; the hazard to the State, to haue his Enemy (a Philippine, and French fauourite) the chiefest man ouer his English: besides wrongs more particular, as both the disgrace to his best-deserving Counsellor, the disloyalty of the Monks, first, to choose without his licence, then to mocke him with a second choice, next, to beguile him with oaths, after to trauaile vpon his excofline charge, and lastly to doe, and vndoe all, with their peruerse. With all which so farre the Kings patience suffereed, that hee beganne on them to digorge his wrath, who with him beganne these affronts; profcribing first all those Monkes as Traitors, and afterward writing his letters to the Pope, with relation of those great wrongs to himselfe, and exceptions to Langton; vowing immutably to stand for his own Elect, and to die in defence of the Liberties of his Crowne; putting the Pope in mind, that Rome reapt more gaine from England, then from all the Tran-Alpine Regions; threatening also, if hee were now crossed in this, hee would stoppe all from crossing the Seas to Rome, nor would any longer emendicate their foraine Iustice, sith his owne Kingdomes, so abounded with Bishoppes and learned men of most accomplished perfection in all professions.

(39) If, when this Kings Father vttered some such threats to Gratian the Popes vassall, hee then replied: Sir doe not threaten vs, for wee feare no menaces, because wee are of such a Court as is to be imperious ouer Emperours and Kings, (which as a remarkable Apotehe, Baronius sets forth in greater letters;) we may then guess, how this great Lord of that Court did himselfe brooke such tart salutations. Nay the effects bewray it: when in his sublimed Reply, hee shewes the King for comminatory abraydings, and contumacious malepartnesse; and threatens him, that if hee do not, by referring himselfe wholly to his good pleasure, lecke to deserre his Grace, hee should plunge into those difficulties, whence hee should hardly euer get forth; intimating, that himselfe (being unworthy vicerger to him, vnto whom euery knee in Heauen, Earth, & Hell must bow), must in the end needs haue the vpper hand; and that to resist him is to oppugne God himselfe and his Church, for which glorious Becket split his blood. These were indeed bloody words; to affright the King with expectation of more such blowes, and bloody stripes from Rome, as had lighted on his Father. And hee threatned no more then hee acted; for thereupon, hee sent his doubled Apollolick command, the one general to all the Prelates, for submitting and adhering resolutely to Langton, the other, to some particular Bishops, for consenting the King, and interdicting his whole Kingdom, if him they found still contumaciously rebelling. Neither was hee more insolent in the command, then they in the execution, whereby (on 7 a day all iuring for vnchristian an Action) this flourishing Church (though the King had sworn their banishment and confiscation if they did it) was deprived of the very face of Christianity for many ensuing yeeres; as if, not Innocentius Christs Vicar, but Italian his professed Enemy, had mured up the doores of the Christians Temples for despite of their God.

(40) But this High-Priest had forgotten what another taught him, and he himselfe sometimes thought, about interdicting France for their Kings offence; that better it was one should suffer then a whole Nation perish: whereas now, for the Kings only crossing the Popes good pleasure, God is censured to loose his worships, and all the People to hazard their soules, lying almost like Infidels, without Gods service and blessed Sacrament, yea and dying like dogges tumbled into euery ditch. But what did such wofull effects fasten onely on the Layty? The Clergy bare their part too; whom the flames of the Kings iustly incensed wrath did so scorch, that his Dominions were too hote for their abode: for, their persons hee profcribed and sent packing to the Pope, their reuenues, hee confiscated, their Bishoppes, Abbeyes and Priorishes hee deputed to Laymens custody: their women (for such as had not wiuens, had Lemmans) were dearely ransomed; and euery where they suffered wrongs without ordinary protection of Iustice. Whereof, though our vulgar perfunctary Writers produce no other reason, but the onely overflowing of the Kings gall, as if first stirred by some few delinquent Bishops, through furious reuenge it ouerwhelmed the whole Clergy; yet indeed these were but the due chafticements of their generally disloyall hearts. As (to instance) when the King sent his mandate to S. Albans, that not regarding the Popes command in the Interdict, they should continue the celebration of Gods service; the Abbot calling his Monks into the Chapter-house, perswaded them to obey God rather then Man (meaning the Pope rather then the King) and to beare resolutely the Kings anger: whom God in due time would bring to an end. What maruaile then, if the Clergy carried so generally with this streame of a foraine vsurped power, against Gods service, and their Soueraignes god-godly desire, and due authority, were likewise generally inuolued in that reward of their disloyalty. And yet, euen in the Clergy, many of eminencie detested these cruell and irreligious courses of the Pope; Philip the Bishoppe of Durresme, and his Successor, with the Bishops of Norwich and Winchester, heartned the King to contemne the Papall curse; the Cistercian Abbots (neglecting the Interdict) continued their diuine celebrations, till the Pope suspended them for their contempt; Alexander Abbot of the Benedictines, a Diuine of exquisite learning (published in his Sermons, that their present calamities were no reproch to their Soueraignes proceedings, but due rewards of the Subjects hainous trespasses, because Kings ought to governe, yea and strongly bridle all disobedient Subjects; whomsoever; but as for Popes they ought not to intermeddle in the ciuill affaires, and regiment of any Princes ouer their vassals, seeing Peter himselfe received no power, but onely in matters appertaining to the Church. And though the Pope were reuenged on him for his plaine truth, and some Monkish humors haue asperfed other such men with bitter reproches, yet what may bee thought both of these the Popes courses, & of such his opposers, a late Iesuite (no partiall man to Princes) theueth, saying, that many, and godly wisemen at that time did wish, that King Innocentius had not stood so hard with King Iohn in such a point as this was, for contenting him with a person grateful vnto him in that See. And no maruaile they so wished, seeing that was the ground cause of such infinite confusions, factions, and wrongs, hurrying so indignely the Prince, Peeres, Clergy & Commons; the very contemplation whereof to all godly wise men must needs bee gaffly and ruffill: yet we liue those Anathematizing Bishops, the Instruments of all these euils, who patiently endured vnder the name of Exile, to liue the while abroad in all varietie of delights.

(41) Such perplexities in the People could not but breed as great hatred and hazards to the King; who therefore to preuent the issue of such discontent, (which though causeless, yet kindling in the multitude proue often vnquenchable,) hee required of his Nobles new Oathes of allegiance, pledges of such as hee most suspected, and homage of all Freeholders, yea of twelue yeers old, whom hee dismissed with a kisse of peace. Mildoubting also the Popes further intent to abrogate his Subjects from their due allegiance, hee gathered about him (by example of his Father Henry on the like ground) a mighty Armie for all occurrents. The terror whereof hee first displayed in the North, offended (saith one) with William King of Scotland, for marrying his daughter to the Earle of Bulloigne; for receiuing (saith another) Fugitives, and enemies of his State: for throwing down (saith a third) a Castle built by King Iohn against Barwicke: but whatsoever were the breach, the cloze was amiable, each accompanying other to Tork, where King Williams two daughters were promised to King Iohns two sonnes, and deliuered as pledges of vnited loue, with a gift of nine thousand marks. The dread of this his power so glynded out of the North into the West, that vpon his returne, the Princes of Wales, and others rich & poor came to him at Woodstocke (he like thing neuer heard of before) to doe him homage. But all these links of allegiance were soone crackt by another thunder-clap (from Rome) of Anathemas on the King by Name, with strict iniunction for all men to abandon his presence: which sentence being sent to bee diuulged by the Bishoppes and Prelates in England, all of them for feare or fauour of the King, were content to neglect the Popes command, and let the Apollolike proffesse escape without execution. The fame yet thereof was in all mens mouths, but came first (as seemeth) to the Kings Ears; by a seruant of his owne Exchequer, Geffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who secretly perswading his fellow-officers, that they were bound in conscience to relinquish the Kings ser-nice, gaue them example himselfe by leaving his duty and charge; for which hote-braine trickes, hee was put in a Cole of lead, the weight whereof (as a punishment of his leuitie) soone hasted his end in prison: but the greater and wiser sort, both of Nobles and others, continued their due attendance on their Soueraignes Court and person, without regard of the censure.

(42) Those Romish furies thus infesting all at home, gaue also courage & opportunity to ill-affected members further off, of which in Ireland hauing forfeited long of the Kings Indulgence or abstinence, beganne now to play the Kings themselves. The noble spirit of this Prince in his tender yeeres made choice (on bended knees to his Father, in presence of Heracles Patriarke of Ierusalem) rather in deuotion to conduct an Army against the Turks, then in Ambition to take possession of that goodly Kingdom. But being now possessed thereof, and intending (by a kind of compensation for his losses in France) to annexe and assure that Kingdom to the English Crowne, hee resolues with a powerfull Army to quell the disturbers, and reforme the disorders, of his first, and long vnvisited charge. Whole approach such fame and dread did forerunne, that more then twenty Petty Kings of that nation hastened to Dublin, there to honour his arrival with their submissive attendance, homage and oath of allegiance; others, eyther vpon confidence of their good holds, or diffidence for their ill desertes, flying his presence, and some of them, the Country. The two Lacies (whose onely praye was, that they were the sonnes of a nobly-deserving Father) hauing bene, through ambition of Soueraignty, the fountaine of dangerous garboyles, (tyrannizing ouer the Commons, and making away such of the Nobles, as stood eyther in their light, or in the Kings fauour) fled into France, where they liued in an Abbey as poore Gardians, vntill the Abbot desiring by their deportment some state about their habite, vpon penitent humility reconciled them to the King. The Lord William de Breufe, (a Baron lately of great command and wealth in the Marches of Wales) shewed not the like penitence, nor found the like grace; who, vpon refusal to deliuer his sonne as a pledge of his fidelitie, spedde into Ireland to flie the Kings wrath, and now, to auoid his pursuit, fledde also into France, then the common Sanctuary of all trayterous fugitives; but sharp reuenge ouertooke both his Sonne and his Lady (taken in a strong Castle of Metz) whose virulent and rayling tongue had more exasperated the fury of the King (whom shee immodestly reuiled as a Tyrant and Murtherer,) then could be pacified by her strange present, (four hundred Kine, and one Bull, all milke-white, except onlie the eares, which were redde,) sent vnto the Queene.

(43) But Catalus, the vnquiet King of Connaught, trusting to his owne Forces, King Iohn subdued by strong pursuit: and after all carried him captiue in triumph, imprisoned the English Fugitives, tooke pledges both of English and Irish Inhabitants, punished by death malefactors, turbulent persons by ransomes, established all their Lawes, Coines, and Officers, to the English forme, and deputed (which was worth all) a wife, stout and vpright Gouvernour ouer them, the Bishoppe of Norwich, Langtons competitor: thus setting on that barbarous land so noble and ordered a face of gouernement, as was the stay thereof in those tumultuous times, and a patterne euen to more peacefull ages to imitate. By which both glorious and speedy conquest and reformation, hee better merited that Style of Irelands Lord, then when it was confirmed to him by a Crowne of Peacockes feathers from the Pope, at what time (long before) hee inoyed it by his Fathers gift, as his Broad-Scale (here not vnfit to be annexed) will shew.

(44) The Banckes of King Johns estate, were not unlike to those in Grounds ill-neighbourd with an encroaching Sea, where before one breach is well made up, another no lesse dangerous is laid open: which endles turmoils kept his Body still in Action, his Mide in passions, and his Prowesse in vce. The vast expences of his triph expedition were no sooner repayed (by a great tax charged on all the Conventual houses) but Lewylin Prince of North-Wales, with his great spoils on the English Marchers, made new matter of charge and exploit for the Kings; ha-ving, to prevent due reuenge, caused his Wallians to conuey all their cattell and better substance to the scarce-accessible refuges of Snowdowne Hill. These difficulties much more whetted and excited the Kings resolution; neither had the vertuall power of the Popes fulmination as yet so blasted his good fortunes, but that hence also hee returned in great Triumph, as Conquerour of all Wales, where, with wonderfull celerity and valour, hee subdued all their Princes and Chieftes, whom hee receiued upon Oath, homage, and hostages, with an absolute graunt of all their inland unto the King for euer. Notwithstanding, perceiving that a very many slypt away for dread (at least for colour) of the Popes curse, from thofe his martiall and other civil seruices (though hee punished by fine all such Reuolters) whereby his person could neuer bee free from danger, nor his State from trouble; hee resolues (seeing the Pope vnflexible, & vnconformable to many Christians calamities) at length to relent from his vowed stiffness against the Popes Elect, in hope so to settle his owne and his Subiects tranquility, though with vnutterable indignity to himselfe. In his returne from Wales, two Nunces from the Pope, Randolph a Subdeacon, and Durand a Knight Templar, met him at Northampton to make the attouement: whereto he was so propent, that hee accorded to assure vnder his Seale, that Archbishop Langton with the Bishops, Monkes, and others, should be restored both to his fauour, and to their possessions; that, holy Church should haue all the Franchises, as in Edward the Confessors time: that hee would neuer take any thing of holy Church against the owners will: but, because hee would not also make full satisfaction for all confiscations, and other emoluments receiued of the Clergie, (may, hee could not haue expended all his treasure in his continuall warres,) the Clergie and their Factors (the Legates) more prizing their priuate gaine, then the weale publike of their Native Country, contemned the sweet proffer of peace, & exposed all to the ban of a reuengeful contention. For hereupon they did not onely denounce the curse upon the King by name (which the Prelates before durst not doe) and upon all other who conuersed with him; but, as if hee had most contumaciously contemned quietnesse, by their relations they incensed the Pope (to procure of himselfe to set forth his owne greatness) to put on him a farre more indignant wrong and contumely then Interdiction, by absolute-lying all Kings and People, poore and rich, hauing dependance on him, from all Fealty and Subiection to him.

himselfe could not but want security, hee dismissed his host, tooke hostages of his Barons, pursued the detected Conspirators, and the three principal of them flying the land, he prosecuted their persons, demolished their Castles, and confiscated their possessions. But many of as vile and virulent affections they left behind them, as that trayterous Act of those Nobles bewrayed, who sent to Philip of France their sealed Charter, promising to settle on his head the Crowne of England, if hee would come to receive it. And that the mindes of the vulgar should not be vnpossessed with like expectation of Johns vn-crowning, the prophesies of an Heremite called Iward (foretelling, that on the day of Ascension, King John should bee no King) were buzzed into their cares. Whether by Gods inspiring, or the Diuelles, these were reuealed, some doe doubt; but hee that considers the quotidian impotures of these times, and the secret machinations of the Pope, the French King, and the English Barons, all for diuers ends, consploting against King John, will easily perceiue both what vile there was of suborning such a Prophet, to deterre the popular mayne, from sticking to the King, and to beguile their credulity, as if the thing were to be done, by Gods fore-appointment, and ordinance, and also that his punishment by death as a Trayterous Impostor, was no other then hee deserued.

(46) Neither is the Popes reuenge thus appeased, some higher greeces yet remaine, on which his Greatnesse, and greatness of his holy rage must display it selfe: the underpross whereof (a thing almost incredible) were not onely Englishmen, but English Bishops also. For Stephen Langton with the Bishops of London and Ely (thirsting after reuenge though with the destruction of their Country, & blood-fild of innumerable their Compatriots) going to Rome with complaints on the King, y made humble supplications to the Lord Pope, that hee would vouchsafe a touch of pious compassion, to support the English Church, being at the point of ruine. At whose earnest solicitation, the tender-hearted Pope (griuously lamenting the defolation of the Kingdome of England,) decreed by solemne sentence: That King John should be depouled from his Kingdome, and that the Pope should prouide some other, who should be deemed worthy to succeede. To effectuate the former clause, Innocentius eagerly pursued the latter, sending speedy letters to (whom but King Johns most mortall enemy?) Philip King of France, requiring him to undertake the labour of the dethroning King John, with no lesse reward then pardon for all his sins, and enioying of the English Crowne to him, and his heires for euer. A goodly large patent both for a Spiritual and Temporal Kingdome, which (more like Mars his Priest, then Christs Vicar) hee meanes to seale, with a deluge of Christians blood. For not thus yet satiated, hee transmits his Letters generally: To all Potentates, Souldiers, men of warre of all Nations, to signe themselves with the Croffe, and to follow their Captaine Philip for the deiection of King John, assuring all that their assistance (whether in Person or Contribution) shall bee no lesse meritorious, then if they visited our Saviours Sepulchre. That this Pope vnder colour of such Crusadores, did formerly cloake his own Avarice, his owne Monkes auer; but here hee clothes therewith both his Pride, and a far more sauage vice, the thirst, not of mens gold, but of their blood. In which seruice with King Philip, hee vied the same English Prelates for his Negotiators, which were before his Solicitors thereunto, with whom also he sent his Factor Pandulph, c. giuing him in priuate, secret instructions how to manage every particular of the whole designe, to the most behoofe of the holy See.

(47) The French King likewise receiuing from the Archbishop and his Associates (in a council) the Apostolic sentence, was very apprehensive of that employment, whereto not so much the Papal command, as his owne ancient malignity, and the English Barons traitorous requests, had prepared him; both which he was now willing to make with the specious pretext of iustice and deuotion. Vnder which colors hee had speedily marshalled an immense Army at Rouen, & drew a mighty Navy richly furnished to the mouth of Seign, alhis Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights, & souldiers being summoned to the exploit vnder paine of his Treason and dishonoring, who therfore both in feare & hope of spoile came flocking without number.

(48) A preparation of so great importance, that all Christendom tooke notice of, could not long be hidden from King John; whole care, by reason of his now doubled opposition (forraint & domestick) could be no lesse for his owne and his Kingdoms safety, then was his Enemies for impugning both. Wherfore his Summons being sent to all his officers both for sea and land, for speedily furnishing both of a Naue, & an Army, equiualent to encounter so powerfull an Inuasion, such innumerable multitudes swarmed to Dover, and other harbours for landing, that the Chief-leaders for want of prouision, dismissing the rest, encamped at Barham-Downes, onely with 60000. choice, valiant, and well appointed men, who, if they had carried all one mind, and true affe-ction towards their King, and safeguard of their Country, there breathed not any Prince vnder heaven, whose assault England had not bene able to repell. And being no worke appointed for a Sea-fight, his intent was to grapple first with the French Fleet, making no doubt of sinking them all: so secure and confident was he in expectation of all Inuaders. In which braue aduersitie, whiles both shores of the Sea are thus belaid with both those Kings puissant Armies, the one waiting for the Enemy, the other for faire windes, and more forces, behold Pandulphus (the Popes Pragmaticke) hauing first desired safe conduct of King John, arrives at Dover, to put in execution those secret Instructions which his Lord (who made his aduantage of the Foxe-skinne, as well as of the Lions) had expressly prescribed. Hee there vnfolde to the King, the innumerable multitude both of King Philips ships, and of his Souldiers Horse and Foote, (all in readinesse to passe, and yet more expected to follow) to be- reauce him of his Kingdome by Apostolicall authority, and to enioy it himselfe with his Heires for euer. That with him were also coming all the English Exiles, both Clergy and Lay, they, by his forces to repossesse their estates (maugre the king) and hee from them to receiue allegiance, as from his hisworne Subiects. That hee had the fealty of almost all the English Peeres obliged to him by their owne Charters; which made him distrustlesse of attayning easily his wished successe: which calamities (the more vnflusterable, because imposed by his insulting enemie, and his owne Subiects) he might yet euade and retaine his Crowne, which by Sentence hee had already lost, if penitently he would submit himselfe to the Churches iudgement. Doubtlesse the traitres whereinto the King saw himselfe plunged, were very dreadfull, so many deadly enemies abroad to assault him, so few trustie friends at home to guard him: which droue him into this sad cogitation, that those his perfidious Peeres would now with their followers abandon him in the field, or betray him ouer to the sword of his Enemies. Yet not vnkliely other motives also might forcibly perswade him to relent: the remembrance of the Emperour Otto whom this very Pope (not without foule blot of Injustice and Leuitie) had both eagerly aduanced, and furiously disempyred; the boundlesse furies of the Crusado promulged against him, wherewith this Pope vied to ouerflow, as with a mercilesse Ocean, all such Princes as withstood his will, which once broken in would neuer end, but with the end and ruine of all. Thus thinking it better to yeeld to the time, with assurance both of his Crowne, and of the Popes fauour, then desperatelly to hazard Life, Crowne and all, to his immortal focs; hee redeemes his safety on such conditions, as Necessity and the Pope (both which have no law) lifted to impose; and so presently swore to submit in all things to the judgement of the Church. By virtue of which farre-stretching Oath, Pandulphus afterwards exacted his subscription to a * Forme of Peace prescribed by the Pope, wherein King Iohn, though with an unwilling, yea a bleeding heart, and weeping eyes, yet will he, will he, must acknowledge that touching all things for which hee was excommunicated, hee had absolutely sworn to stand to whatsoever the Pope should command. Secondly, that the Archbishop, Bishops and Monks, with all the rest of that sort, should with satisfaction also for all damages be restored both to their possessions and the Kings favour, so that they also would swear not to attempt any thing against the Kings Person and Crowne. Wherein we see that King Iohn in swearing to obey the judgement of the Church, was concluded to have sworn performance of whatsoever the Pope commanded; and how great matters the Pope can command, King Iohn, with much more * bleeding a multitude of spirit, shall quickly see and feel. For two dayes after (being the * period of the Hermits prophetic) the King at the house of the Knights Templars, in Dover, by the Popes command in his preordination at Rome, taking off his Crowne from his head, surrendered it into the Popes hands by his Attorney Pandulphus (at whose feet hee also laid his Scepter, Robe, Sword and Ring, the Royall Ensignes); subscribed also to another * Charter, whereby hee resigned his Kingdomes to the Pope, professing hee did it * neither for feare, nor force, but of his owne free will, and in the common Council of his Barons, as having no other way to make satisfaction to God and the Church for his offence, and that thence-forward he would hold his Crowne as Feodary to the Pope, paying a pension annuall of 1000. Marks for both the Kingdomes of England & Ireland: whereupon doing homage and swearing fealty to the Pope, hee did withall deliver some money (as the earnest of his subjection) unto Pandulph, who throwing it to the ground, did thereon trample with his feet, to manifest his Masters greatness. That these things were done in presence of some Peeres, who gave no consent thereto, appears by Henry Archbishoppe of Dublin (the very principall man in that Assembly) who both inwardly grieved thereat, and openly disclaimed and gaine-sayed it.

(49) The Pope formerly pretended he fought * nothing more then Iohns repentance, and * grieved at nothing so much as Englands defolation: but these his circumcutions bewray he fought somewhat else, which bred both repentance and defolation to King Iohn and his Successors long after. Which fact cannot be liuely parallelled, then by another dolefull accident of the former yeare, * when a dreadfull fire in Southwarke, consuming the Church & buildings neere London Bridge, suddenly (whiles numberless people flockt on the Bridge, either to bring succour or seeke safetie) the fire by a wind seized also on the hither end of the Bridge; wherewith * multitudes thus encompassed on both sides, miserably perished; where at length some bringing their Barges to save the rest, their crowde was so great, that the vessels sinking, more perished in the water, then by fire. King Iohn, like those, was in the midst of two inevitable flames, on this side his faithlesse Nobles, on that, his mercilesse foes; when the Pope thus proffering him S. Peters Boat, for a safe-gate from both, drencht him into as great misery, certainly greater Ingomy than both the other. Wherin yet the Pope doth not want his share and shame; amongst his owne favourites, some accusing that his preferred Charter, as * lamentable and detestable; some, denying it was of the Popes procuring, but that King Iohn had long before made a vow of devotion, that if God seled him in those Kingdomes he would dedicate them both, and make them tributary to the See Apostolicke. But some other (great pillars of the Papacy) stepping further, & avow it to be utterly untrue, that King Iohn did make his Realmes thus tributary to the Pope; or that ever such pensions were paid to Rome; or if hee so did, or any other English King should so doe, such an Act to be of no validity at all; or if it were of any force; it ought only to lie on King Iohn, who so offended, and not on any his Successors. Doubtlesse, if the Popes Sword had power to cut off King Iohns regality for any offence, his Crowne was to have descended to the next Heire (whether Henry his sonne, or Eleanor Arthurs sister, then alive) who, as they were not guilty of the fault, so neither consenting to the re-negement. Some therefore have imagined, that * such Instruments might happily then be motioned and drawn, and yet die unratified, though the copies be recorded; but whatsoever were then done, that the Pope himselfe (not onely those his friends) were thereof ashamed will hereafter appeare.

(50) Whiles Pandulphus is thus chaffering about the Crowne for his Master the Pope, Philip is firing his head to wear it, and was now setting forth his Navy to winne it, for himselfe; which made the Legate (having after five dayes seyn redelivered the Crowne, but * not yet released the Censures, till conditions were performed) to hasten into France, carrying with him eight thousand pound, as part of restitution to the exiled Bishops; where, coming to King Philip, hee advised him to dismise his host, & enterprize against King Iohn as being now an obedient, and reconciled Sonne to the Church. But Philip who was of the Popes mind, not caring for Iohns repentance, but for his Kingdomes, which now hee lost before he had gotten it, fretting exceedingly to see himselfe nor onely to see for a while, and made to the world an object of scoff, by the Danes guilefull collusions, but also by the * Popes owne incitements, plunged into so excessive a damage, (having spent, beside his great traualle in this preparation, 60000. Crowns, wherewith hee purchased neither but scoffes, refused, and professed, that sith the Pope himselfe, had so farre thrust him on, his Legates suggestions (no nor his threats of excommunication,) should not draw him backe from his intentment. In which resolution calling his Peeres and Nobles into a consultation at Suesjourns, all the rest approving the course, Ferdinand Earle of Flaunders (part of whose Country Philip by force detained) told him tartly, that as the attempt was both unwise, and impossible, so * it was fitter, every mans right should at home be restored, and justice embraced, before they attempted to teach duties of piety to others abroad. And, that he * ought rather to thinke, of making restitution to King Iohn of those transmarine Countries, which hee withheld unrightly, then of invading his Realm, where to hee had no right at all. With which unexpected reclamation, the chiefe Peeres beganne to waver, & Philip enraged, bidding him desist, forbade him his Court. The like rough visage (not * long before) found * Reginald the most valourous Earle of Bulloigne (though his daughter was married to Philips younger sonne,) whom the French King perceiving to will well to King Iohn, drove him unrightly out of his Earldome; but King Iohn, receiving him with honourable compensation of * favre-renewes in England, held both with him and Earle Ferdinand, a sure (though secret) confederacy: So that now Philips rage, and feare to hazard his owne Crowne, if seeking anothers, hee should leave so neere an Enemy at his backe, diuerts the course of his Ambition into the streame of his Reuenge, and resolving first to subdue the Earle, (after which successe hee might more safely passe into England,) hee commands his mighty prepared Navy to set forth from the mouth of Seyne towards Flaunders, where himselfe with his forces (meaning to subdue the country in their way) would meet them by land. Whereof King Iohn having speedy intelligence from the Earle (who, knowing his meanes too slender to beare off the Kings so long prepared power, desired his present aid) without delay dispatched his * Fleet, to pursue them who intended to pursue him, under the conduct of

* three brave Generals, his brother William Earle of Salisbury, William Duke of Holland, and Reginald Earle of Bulloigne; who with happy gales furrying the French Navy at the port of Damme, (whiles most of the French Souldiers were on land, dispoiling the Earles Country,) seized on them all, * three hundred of which shippes, laden with provision, Armes, and other costly fraught (for whatsoever the King and all his Nobles held dearest was therein,) they sent for England (whither at first they were bound) and above one hundred other they burnt, or sunke for France.

(51) This Nauall victory produced effectes in the two Kings so opposite as were their affections; the one, with anguish of his irreparable losse and ignominy, halting backe into France, to prevent further danger; and the other (joyfull of his own successe and his confederates) dismissing his power, as secure of any French attempts in halfe. Wherefore now, with full purpose to find him worke at home, who so busily sought it abroad, hee forthwith sent (with large rewards to his Flaunders Army) instructions also to the Earles, how to infect Philip on that side of France, whiles himselfe entering Poitou, would the like on the contrary side, and Otho the Emperour on a third part. A dangerous plot and league, if the issue had beene answerable to the designs. For prosecution whereof, King Iohn attending at Portsmouth with a noble Army, in hope now that all true English, would gladly embrace so fayre an opportunity, to recover their hereditary Provinces from the false French, his Barons restless themselves in procuring his vnrest, and enuying that his foraine vexations being thus passed, he should want domesticke, flatterly oppose themselves both to his command and their Countries good, * denying him (until hee were absolved of his excommunication,) their attendance in so behouefull a seruice. Those men in the heat of his former troubles with the Pope, thinking such troubled waters most advantageous for their fishing, recommenced their contention with the King for their long desired Liberties, where in because they found him still as immovable, as themselves were immoderate, it seemeth, though the cloake of their now-refusal were Religion, yet their spur was Reuenge; hauing withall an eye to the good of the King of France, whom so well they had before loved, as to with him King of England. But King Iohn, being no lesse earnest to further the present generall cause, then they their particular ends, delayed not their desires; and * *depeeding his Charters and safe-conducts to the Archbishop and his fellow-Exiles, hee as speedily arrived: at whose presence the earth is said to have trembled; but (doubtlesse) King Iohn did; who hearing of his coming towards him (then at Winchester) went to meete him and those other Bishops; at whose sight hee fell downe at their feet with floods of teares, intreating them to commiserate his, and his Kingdomes miseries. Upon which * great humility in a King (moving them likewise to bedew their eyes,) they lifted him from the ground, and leading him by each Arme to the dore of the Cathedral Church (where, at rehearsal of the 50. psalme, all his Nobles and others wept for ioy, after in the Chapter-house they did abjure him; but with such guilefull Appendices of Oathes imposed on him, that this abjuration was not so much the Epilogue of his old, as the Prologue of his new Tragical vexations.*

(52) For the Prelates, whose best abettors the disloyall Barons had formerly beene, meaning now to be like to them, amongst other Oathes then taken of the king (to defend holy Church & Churchmen; to make due restitution to the Clergy; to beare fealty to the See of Rome,) cunningly also inserted this, * to establish the good Lawes of his Predecessors; to abolish all bad, proceeding with all his Subjects according to the iust judgments of his Courts: out of which generalities, what good stufte the Prelates &

Barons can picke, sequels will shew. Now all exceptions seeming to be taken away, which might hinder the Kings designe for France, hee once againe at Portsmouth halts to imbarke his host; where, at the point of passage new impediments are pretended, * that the people having spent their money with long attendance could not be fitted for the seruice except the King would doe it out of his Treasury; which moued the King in anger, with a small traine of his owne attendants, to set forth, to sea, and his Barons (Philips true friends) to depart home, leaving the king (who as Gerfry expected their coming) destitute of their seruice. With these so often treacherous delusions, what maruaile, or blame, if a King, and in so important an Action, thus defeated, were enflamed to take due reuenge? On which purpose the King thus * *enforced to returne, resolving to chastise those rebellious Spirits (the causes thereof) and to reclaim them to due obedience by force of Armes, the Archbishop (resolved to be as tough a Bridle to the Regall power, as euer Hubert his predecessor was,) came vnto him, to diuert him with Argument, that it was a breach of his Oath, for him to take Armes against any man whomsoever, without the judgement of his Court. But the next day, seeing he could not thus preuaile with reasons (the King forbidding him to intermeddle in matters of lay-judgements, and swearing that hee would not forbear for one Clerkes pleasure to tame his owne vassals) hee followed the King (who was on his way earnestly following his intentment) deterring him with threats, and vowing, * if out of hand he did not desist from his purpose, he would excommunicate all (except the King himselfe) who durst take Armes against any whomsoever, till the interdict were quite released. So quickly did this Prelate on his coming into England, shew himselfe not onely a faithfull Philippine, (as the King forswore,) and a faithlesse Baronsist (as these his darings proue) but euen another Pope, to threaten and persecute the King, sith Innocentius had left to doe it.*

(53) But these threats of sacred Censure, though they dash the whole course of Regale government, may seeme the more excusable, hee hauing some colour (though but a colour) thereof by reason of his vocation and place: the courtes which soone after he pursued, will not admit the like plea or pardon with the King. This English Pope, hauing in a promissuons Synode of Clergy men and Barons, granted by Indulgence, that in this time of Interdict, both Conuenticuals and Seculars, might in their Churches celebrate diuine seruice, so it were with a very low voice; singled out the Barons into a very priuate conference, (more cordiall perhaps to them then seruing of God,) relating with much ostentation, what an Oath at his absolving the King, hee * compelled him to take, for restoring good Lawes, and antiquating bad; to which end, a Charter of King Henry the first being lately found (which there hee shewed and caused to be read) by it, they might, if themselves would reduce, to the pristine estate, those Liberties which long they had lost. Both Charter and Counsell being received with great applause and ioy, a Confederacy was stricken betwixt them, they all swearing to him to strive for those liberties to the spending of their liues, and hee promising them his most faithfull and uttermost assistance. Amongst so many talke to the State, probable it is, that some were false among themselves, by whose these secreties might come to the Kings eares; who finding himselfe by both Clergy and Lay-Peeres combining against him, vnable to rebetge his foraine, or repress such domesticke indignities, knew no surer way to ouertop them all, then by that high Hand, by which himselfe was first subiected to them all. How this must be fetcht about, because it concerns his Holinesse, a learned Monke shall relate in his owne Language. The King knew and had learned by manifold experience, that as the Pope, both for Ambition, and Pride, went beyond all other mortall men; So likewise, he was in his greedy desire of riches so vnfa- sitan both bodily & ghostly: and not onely forgave gladly all his mortall perfections (holding that a mater, though very difficult to flesh and blood, yet salutary to the soule) but also sent command to Henry his sonne to doe the same: to whom hee caused all present, to swear fealty, as to the Heye of his Crowne, and sent his letters to all his Officers abroad, exhorting them to assist him. And thus hee commended his soule to God, and his body to be buried in Worcester Church, where the Bishop solemnly interred it, by the Kings appointment, neere the Body of Wolstan, a sanctified Bishoppe, renowned for constant fidelity to his Prince against the rebellious Nobles of his time: with which kind of men, King Johns government had bene miserably embroiled.

(62) This, being the Catastrophe of his Tragical Raigne, might also have bene the close of his Story, had not the fuddery of his death, exacted some search into the cause of his sickness. Such Authors as touch the matter but in generall, content themselves with saying, he dyed of a grieve, or a feaver, or a flux, or a surse; but those who have entered into the particulars, insit on such a Surse, as wher-of both grieve, feaver, and flux were most probable effects and Symptomes. For comming (say they) from the Washes to Swinfield Abbey, (being of the Cisteraux Order, which of old he had much incen-ded) hee added new matter of offence, as he late at meat, when, in speech of his enemies too large provision, hee swore, if hee lived but halfe a yeere longer, he would make one halfe-penny loose as deare as twelve: whichto prevent, a Monke of that holy habit, whither in loue to Lewis, or hate to the King, or pity on the Land, presenting him with an enuened Cup, (whereof the King commanded him to be his Taster) became the Diabolical Instrument of his own and his Soueraignes destruction. This relation, de-liuered by Monkes, and men of Monkish humour, as a thing to vnderstand, that they saw (at what time they wrote this) a few Monkes in that Abbey did sing for this their Brothers soule specially, and so should whiles the Abbey stood, which if it had bene forgerd every Child might easily haue refused; and the rehearsall of all circumstances thereof, (of the Kings speeches, of the Monkes conference with his Abbot, of his preparing the drinke with a Toade in the garden, of his dying in the Firmiry) might deserue credite with the greatest Patrones of Monckery; yet none of them (as if by acquiting Simon of Swinfield, all other of such Orders were cleared from assassinating of Princes) striueth eagerly, to asperse some late Relaters herof, with the blots both of malice & forgery. Wherein is the malice? in so to moue hatred to Monkes and their Religion; whereas of truth, either Monkes, or men of that Religion, were the very first, who not onely so depicted, but also liuely and richly depainted it in their goodliest Manuscripts.
Wherein then the Forgery? in adding to Caxton, that his Abbot gave him absolution for the same before hand, there being no such matter at all, nor any mention thereof in the story? No? let the very story speake; The Monke went to the Abbot, and was stricken of him, and told the Abbot all the King had said; and prayd his Abbot to assaile him, for hee would give the King such a drinke that all England should be glad thereof and sayfull the yode the Monke into the garden, &c. Yea farther, one Monke alledgeth, an inducement for the Abbots assent thereto, for that the King had sent for the Abbots sister (a faire Prioresse) with purpose to haue deflowered her. Yea, but the story itself is charged with nonellie, the first author thereof being but An.
1483. and all other former Writers making no mention of it. This if true, were somewhat, and doubtlesse, it is as true as the former: for how could hee be the first Author, when not onely Raulph the Monke of Chester, a John of Tynmouth, and a Thomas Otter-bourne the Franciscan Fryer recorded it as a fame generally received; but sundry other ancient stories, as

John of Lichfield, the Monke of Leicester, & Seale Mundi (to omit other namelesse Authors before Anno 1483.) so confidently avouch his poisoning at Swinfield, that vnpariall after-Writers, though friends to Monckery, made no scruple to beleue it. And why should they not, sith an Author, more ancient and vnexceptionable than all the rest, (even King Johns Sonne and Successor in his Kingdome) attested it, when, the Prior of Clerkenwell fauilly telling him (being then in that house) that as soone as hee ceast to doe Justice towards his Prelates, he should cease to be a King: the King enraged with his trayterous threat, replied, What? meane you to turne mee out of my Kingdome, and afterward to murder me, as my father was dealt with?

(63) But not to trouble our selues with refuting a Gooses gaging against Foxes true relation; easily it is to obserue the hatred of Monks against that King, both in thus procuring his death, and in his dishonour (a second death) in their slanderous inuentions euer since. For, whereas he writ by some of his Bishops to censure certaine Princes, for aides against his faithlesse Rebels; the Monkes charge him, that hee counterfeited his Bishops Seales, and writ abroad, that all Englishmen were become Infidels and Apostates from Christs faith, and therefore such should come to subdue them and take their possessions: when hee said, a Stag which hee killd, had neuer the lesse fatte, though hee neuer heard a Masse; they charged him hee doubted of the Resurrection of the dead; and in saying, hee neuer sped well after his yielding to the Pope, that hee said hee was vnfortunate since hee was reconciled vnto God: that, when hee gaue leaue to a seruant of his owne, to enter any religious Order, he gaue him leaue to be of what Religion and Faith hee list. That moreover, hee offered his Kingdome to a Sarazen, and would embrace the Turkish faith, though this tale were told by one Robert of London (a wicked Masse-Priest, or rather a Monster, having a face like a Tew, with one arme long, and another short, his fingers deformedly growing together two and two,) with such senselesse improbabilities, as, that hee found that Moorish King reading of Saint Pauls Epistles, and that hee refused the Kingdom of England being offered him, with the like. That lastly it was revealed to a Monke, King John was in Hell; though a Poet for so saying, is by M. P. (who made no doubt of King Johns saluation) censured for a * Reprobate. These all are demonstrations off o-credible harred, as should rather alleneate their Authors credite, then the Kings; whose Raigne had it not fallen in the time of so turbulent a Pope, so ambitious Neighbour-Princes, so disloyall Subiects, nor his Story into the hands of exasperated Writers, hee had appeared a King of as great renowne, as misfortune. His works of deuotion inferiour to none; as his Foundations declare at Beauley, Farrington, Malmsbury, and Dublin, and that other for Nunnes at Godstow by Oxford, for which, some haue interpreted that Prophecie of Merlin as meant of him; Sith Virgin giftes to Maids he gaue, Monks blessed Saints God will him saue. His Arts and Orders for the Weale-publike were beyond most: hee being eyther the first, or the chiefe, who appointed those noble Formes of Ciuill government in London, and in most Cities, and incorporate Towns of England, endowing them all with their greatest Riches; The first who caused Sterling money to be here coyned; The first, who ordained the Honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earles; The first, who settled the Rates and Measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such like Necessaries of Commerce; The first, who planted English Laws and officers in Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdome, and fastned vnto the Crowne of England, thereby making amends for his losses in France.
Whose whole course of life and actions, wee cannot shut vp with any truer Enloge, then that which an ancient Author hath conferred on him: Princeps qui-dem Magnus erat, sed minus felix: atque ut Marius, ut amque fortunam experius: Doubtlesse, he was a Prince more Great then happy, and one, who, like Ma-rius, had tried both sides of Fortunes wheele.

His Wives.

(64) Alice, the first wife of King John, was the eldest of the two daughters, and heires apparant at that time of Humbert the second, Earle of Maurien; now called Sawoy: her Mother was Clemence daughter of Berthold the fourth, Duke of Leringen, who had been the diuorced wife of Henry the Lyon, Duke of Saxonic. This marriage at their childhoode cōcluded by their Parents at Mountferrant in Auene, in February, Anno, 1173; he should haue had with her, her Fathers Earledome, but all altered by her vn-timely death; and after ensued the death of her Mother, the new marriage of her Father, and issue male of the same, whereof the Dukes of Saxonic are descended.

(65) Isabel, his second wife (by * some called Hawisa or Aua) though the * youngest of the three Sisters, yet was in regard of this marriage, the sole Heire of William Earle of Gloucester, sonne of Earle Robert, the Naturall sonne of King Henry the first; her Mother was Hawis the daughter of Robert Bosse Earle of Leicester. Shee was married vnto him when hee was Earle of Mortaine, in the first yeere of his brother Richards raigne: and after ten yeeres hauing no issue by him, was (the first yeere of his Raigne) diuorced from him, vnder pretence of Coniugini-ty, and married to Geoffrey Mandeuill Earle of Essex, and lastly, to Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent; but died without any Issue by them.

(66) Isabel also his last wife, was daughter and heire of Aymer Earle of Angouleme; her Mother was Alice daughter of Peter, Lord of Courteney, fifth son of Lewis the Grasse, King of France. Shee was married vnto him in the first yeere of his Raigne, & crowned by Hubert Archbishoppe of Canterbury, 8. Id.
Octob. Anno 1200, and inuoluing him, was married to Hugh Brun Earle of March, and Lord of Lusignain and Valence in Poitou, to whom first she should haue bene married, but yet (as seemeth) continued her affection to him till now. By him shee had di-uers Children, (greatly advanced by the King, Henry 3. their halfe brother, and as greatly maligne by his Subiects) Hugh Earle of March and Ango-leme, Guy of Lusignain, slain in the battell at Lewise, William of Valence Earle of Pembroke, Aymer of Valence Bishoppe of Winchester, Geoffrey of Lusignain L. of Hastings.

His Issue.

(67) Henry, the eldest Sonne of King John, and Isabel his last wife, was borne at Winchester, 1. October, 1. 10. of his Fathers Raigne, Anno, 1208. K. John dying at Newarke, * whether hee was brought in Horrelliter from Swynhead, the Barons malice was ended, their offence amended, Lewis of France reioiced, and the yong Prince seated on his Fathers throne.

(68) Richard, his second son by the same Queene, was borne the next yeere after Henry; by whom afterward hee was made Knight, created Earle of Cornwall, and appointed Earle of Poitou. After the death of William Earle of Holland, Emperour of the West, hee was by the Electours chosen to succeed him in the Empire, and crowned King of Romanes, & of Almayn at the City of Acon in Germany, by Conrade Archbishoppe of Coleyne, Maij 27. being the Alcentation day, Anno 1257. deceasing at the Castle of Berkmasted, April 20. Anno. 1271. the 13. yeere of his Empire, his body was buried in his Monastery of Hayles in Gloucestershire, but * his Heart at Oxford in Reuby Abbey (founded by him) vnder a Pyramid of admirable worke. Hee had three wiues, the first was Isabel daughter of William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, widow of Gilbert Clare Earle of Gloucester; by whom hee had issue, Henry slaine at Merton in Utah, and John, both dying without Issue. His second wife was Senches, (daughter of Richmond Earle of Prouince, & sister to Queene Eleanor his brothers wife) who was crowned with him at Acon, and had issue by him Edmund Earle of Cornwall, and others. His last wife was Beatrice, Nièce to the Archbishoppe of Coleyne, who seemeth to haue suruiued him; and to haue no Issue by him.

(69) Iane, the eldest Daughter and Child of K.
John and Queene Isabel his last wife, was the first wife of Alexander the second, King of Scots, married vnto him in Torke, Iunij 25. Anno 1221. who returning into England to visite her Brother, deceasing at London, and was buried in the Nunnery at Tarent in Dor-setshire, 4. Martij in the 21. yeare of her Brother King Henries raigne in England, and the 23. of King Alexander her husbands in Scotland, Anno 1236.

(70) Eleanor their second daughter, was first married to William Marshall the yonger, Earle of Pembroke; and after his decease without issue, and seuen yeeres Widow-hood remarried to Simon Mont-fort Earle of Leicester, (sonne of Simon Earle Mont-fort in France, by Amice Daughter of Robert Blanche-man Earle of Leicester) who maintaining the Barons warres against King Henry her brother, was slaine at the battaile of Euseham, in the 19. yeere of her brothers raigne, 1265; after whose death, shee and her Children were forced to forsake England; she died in the Nunnery at Montargis in France. Henry her eldest sonne, was slaine with his father at Euseham; Simon, the second, was Earle of Bigorre, and ancestor to a Family of Mountfords in those parts of France.
Almaricke, her third sonne, was first a Priest, and Treasurer of the Cathedral Church in Torke, and after a Knight, and a valiant scrutour in fundrie warres beyond the Seas. Guy the fourth sonne was Earle of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitor of the Mountfords in Tuscaine, and of the Earles of Campo-bach in the Kingdome of Naples. Richard the fifth sonne, remained priuily in England, and changing his name from Mountford to Wellesborne, was ancestor of the family of Wellesbornes in England. Shee had also a daughter named Eleanor, borne in England, brought vp in France, and married into Wales to Prince Llewellyn ap Griffith.

(71) Isabel, their yongest daughter, was born, An.
1214; when shee was 21. yeeres of age, shee was married (being the 6. and last wife) to the Emperour Frederick the second, at the City of Wormes in Germany, 20. of Iuly, 1235. Shee had issue by him, Henry appointed to be King of Sicily, and Margaret wife of Albert, Landgrau of Thuring: shee was Empresse 6. yeeres, and died in Childbed, Decemb.
1. of her husbands Empire 31. of her brothers raign 38. Anno, 1241.

(72) Iane, or Ione the daughter naturall of King John (by Agatha Daughter of Robert Ferrers, Earle of Darby) married to Lewis Prince of Wales. Anno 1204. her Father gaue with her the Castle & Lordshippe of Elnifmore in the Marches of Southwales; she (like a most louing Child) gaue her Father secret intelligence of the Treasons intended against him by the Welsh and English.

(73) Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, a bafe son, who transported some Souldiers into France, when Archbishoppe Hubert forbad the King his father to goe thither.

(74) Richard, who married the daughter & heire of Fulbert de Domes, who built Chilhams Castle in Kent, which Castle hee had with her, and had issue by her, HENRIE THE THIRD, LORD OF IRELAND, DVKE OF NORMANDIE, GYEN, AND AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-SIXTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER IX.

HENRIE, the eldest Son of King John, was when his Father dyed about * ten yeeres of age: which state of Child-hood, being most vnfit to succede in so troublous a state, (the furious waues where-off seemed far from being appeased) God Almighty, in fauour and pity of his Innocency, strengthened with the seruice of great and worthy men, whereby the free and noble Realme of England was graciously preserved from French seruitutie; from whose Continent as it was naturally disparted with a Sea, so could it as badly haue endured to be ioyned thereto by subiectiue gouernement. Howbeit the difficulties were not few nor slight, which did at first empeach this happy preferuation, though they did not hinder it long; for, * hee disposing the matter, who ordaineth all things wisely, and moderates them sweetly, faire weather was restored after stormes, and quiet being established through the Kingdome, the peaceable seruants of God had place to breath in.

(2) To effect to great a benefite, Wallo the Popes Legate stood wholly for aduancement of Henry, and expulsion of the French; the authority of whose persuasions, ioyned with his other power and example, drew many of the Prelates so farre, that (although their lands and goods were therefore spoiled) they would not doe any homage to Lewis; as likewise the loyall care of William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, did gaine (in time) and settle the hearts of the secular Lords. Great was the wildom, courage and diligence of that Noble Gentleman in lo broken and ieopardous estate; for he, knowing that the maine hopes of his Country rested in the safety of their persons, in whom the right of Succession was, he first of all secured them within the Citie of Gloucester, which was at Henries seruice: There were with the young King, his mother Queene Isabel, his brother Richard (afterward King of Romans,) his sisters, the said Earle, and many others in great numbers of the chiefe and principall men of all fortres; who vpon perfect notice of King Johns death, repaired thither to their young Prince, with a purpose to consult and concur in one, for the re-union of minds and bodies to the obedience of the true borne king. The Earle of Pembroke therefore bringing forth his precious charge, and placing him with all due honour and ceremony in view of the assembled States, is reported for the pleasing of all sides, to haue vied words to this effect. *Albeit the father of this Prince whom here you see before you, for his euill demeanours hath worthily undergone our perfection, yet this young Child as he is in yeeres tender, so is he pure and innocent from those his Fathers doings: Wherefore, sith euery man is to be charged with the burthen of his owne transgressions, neither shall the Child (as Scriptures teach us) beare the iniquitie of his Father: we ought of duty and conscience, beare our selues milder towards this tender Prince, and take compassion of his age. And forsomuch as he is the Kings * lawfull and eldest Sonne, and ought to be our Soueraine, and his Successor, let us with one ioint assistance appoint him our King and Gouernour; let us remoue from us this Lewis the French Kings sonne, and suppress his people, which are a confusion and shame to our Nation, and the yokes of their seruitude let us cast off from our shoulders.*

(3) The entertaining of persuasions among the wife, is an effect of Truth, not of painted Phrales; and these plaine wordes of the Earle, (the young Kings Brother in Law) were received with generall applause of all that were present, so that Henry was immediately proclaimed, and speedily crowned (vpon the day of SS. Simon & Iude) in the presence both of Wallo the Popes Legate, (who imposed on his vnexperienced yeeres some vndue Oathes of seruice to the Romane See,) and of Queene Isabel, with many of the Lords Spirituall and Secular, and store of all other sorts of People. The speeche of which roial Ceremony (for it was the ninth day after King Johns death) was not greater then the necessity of the State required: for his Enemy (not only his, but the enemy of the English name, Prince Lewis) had (as yet) London, the chiefe seat of the Empire, at his deuotion, many potent Earles, Barons, and martiall malecontents, subiect to his command, and an Armie in the field with which he fought to constrain that mirrour of constant loyalty, Hubert de Burgh, to render him the most important Castle in England, that of Douer, committed to his much-approued trust: The young King on the other side was enuironed with many difficulties, want of money not the least, the most part of his Fathers treasures being drowned. To encounter all which mischiefs, the said Earle of Pembroke was by common assent of Prelates and Peeres constituted Guardian of the young Kings person, and Vice-Gouernour of the Kingdome.

(4) Letters hereupon issuing in the new Kinges name, and for his affaires, to all such as had charge in the common-weale, (with many promises of reward and fauour,) were accordingly in most places obeyed: for the euill will borne to King John, seeming to die with him, and to be buried in the same graue, the loyall bloud waxt warme about the coldest hearts, rekindling in them the honest desire of shewing themselves true Englishmen. It was also a great helpe to the Kings party, that Prince Lewis his followers and abettours, were, on euery Sunday and Holiday, pronounced to stand accurt and excommunicated. Lewis perceiving (contrary to his expectation) that King Johns death was to him nothing auailable, but rather detrimentall, dwells no longer about Douer Castle, but raising his siege, enters London, and provides the best hee can for his tottering estate, which hee sought to support, by putting French Garrison into Castles; The * Tower of London being rendered to him; hee besiegeth Hertford Castle; which after the laughter of many French, being deliuered vpon faire composition, the custody of that Peice was demanded by Richard Fitz-Walter, as by ancient right belonging to him; but Lewis put him off with this answer, that he should haue patience, till hee had conquered the Realme, at which time hee would restore their rights to euery one. The secret reason which moued Lewis to giue this answer, was: for that, consulting with his French vnder-Fitz-Walters demand, they gaue it for their common opinion: That the English were not worthy to haue such places entrusted to their charge, who were betrayers of their naturall Lord. A iust reason to moue Lewis so to answer, but a farre better to teach others to continue loyall. The Castle of Berkhamsted (whose Captaine was one Waleran a valiant Dutch Knight) hopelesse of succours was likewise rendered, which as the rest, hee stuffed with French Garrisons; wherein, howsoeuer hee provided for his owne Nation during that present, hee tooke no wise courie for the maine of his enterprife: for so apparant iealousies (seconding & confirming the Vicount Meluners predictions) could not but vterly visitte the affections of such great ones as had called him in. His next March being to Saint Albans, where he would haue constrained the Abbot to doe him homage, he was encountered with this honest answer: *That he would doe him no homage, vnlesse hee were absolved from the homage which hee had made to the King of England: yet to purchase repite of homage, or rather his, and the Towns peace till Candlemas, hee was forced to vfe the mediation both of his * purse, and of his noble friends.*

(5) But those intestine causes for which the Barons had called Lewis in, falling now to the ground by the death of King John, and the French by their naturall infolence, suspitions and vanity, ministring new reasons of auersion, were all of them strong motiues to dispose the mindes of the English Lewisians to returne to due obedience; yet finding themselves bound in honour, not so to leave him (so dainely destitute, (who vpon affiance of their oathes and hostages had put himselfe among them) that he should thereby fall into Henries hands; they desire therefore his absence, but not his destruction. The more handsomely to compass the rest, an abstinence from warre was (for a time) concluded betweene the King and Lewis; the rather for that Lewis had intelligence from Rome, that the curse which Wallo had denounced against him, should shortly be confirmed by the Pope, vnlesse hee left England. As this Truce gaue Lewis liberty to sayle backe to France for new supplies from his Father, (who greatly desired to conferre with him;) so his absence gaue opportunity to his English, to consult more freely of their best way; that from thence forth Lewis was neuer potent in their affections, but * presently lost many chiefe Lords and others, who againe became true English.

(6) Lewis vpon his speedie returne out of France, minding to make a speedy dispatch, sets out of London his Army of more then twenty thousand Souldiers, with a purpose not only to free Mont-Sorrel (then besieged by his enemies) but to subdue the whole country adjoining. Odious and grievous to the Countries was this passage of the French, which reach as farre as Lincoln, there were among them so many ragged rascals, the * verie scumme and filthy froth of that Nation, whose beggary was so base that they had not clothes to hang on their backs, to supply the which they made many goe naked in all the places where they marched. The Earle of Pembroke Gouernour of the King * by the Counsell of Wallo, and the Bishoppe of Winchester resolving to set the cause vpon God, and the fortune of a field, is now with the young King and his Assistant stant Lords, at Newarke, where the Generall assembly for that service was appointed. The whole Army after the Musters, rested there some dayes, which they spent not in vanities, but in deuotions & recit of the Sacrament, humbling themselves before the offended Maieſtie of God; and so all of them (saith Paris) being prepared, resolute eyther to return victorious, or to die in defence of their country, their Soueraignes right, and their owne Liberties, and possessions, all which seemed now to lie at stake. To giue them the greater edge and spirite, Wallo with great solemnity accuseth Lewis and his Coadiutors, and thus the Army marcheth towards Lincolne, and the Lewisians there in siege of the Castle: the King himselfe being left with a strong guard at Ston (about eight miles short of Lincolne) accompanied with Wallo and others, there without perill of his person to attend Gods pleasure, in the euent of the enterprise.

(7) Vpon their approach, if the Counsell of some English Lords had bene followed, the Lewisian Army had issued forth of the City, & giuen them battle in the open field; but the Earle of Perch (the French Generall) thinking the Kings party to bee greater then it was, for that the Noblemen and Bannerets thereof had each of them two Ensignes, the one borne with themselves, the other advanced among the Carriages, which doubled the shew of their numbers; they did thereupon change that course, closed the Gates of the City, and plyed their endeauours against the Castle more fiercely then before. The Earle of Pembroke therefore lets Falscius slip in at the Castle-posterne with his Arbalesters, whiles others breake vp the South-gate of the City, at which the Kings Army most courageously entering, and they of the Castle falling out in Flancke of the Enemy, scattered and vterly defeated the Lewisians. The Earle of Perch their Generall, being euironed with the Royallists, and willing to render himselfe, sware that hee would neuer become Prisoner to any English: vpon which refusal he was run through the sight of his helmet into the braines, and so dyed without speaking any word. In this conflict (being on Saturday in Whitson-week) the force of naturall propension was apparent; for notwithstanding the fierie resolutions of the Kings People, yet when they saw the faces of their kinsmen, friends & countymen on the other side, that fury relented so strongly, that the most part of the reuenge fell vpon the Hories, and not vpon the Horsemen, whom onlie they laboured to maketh their Captiues. The whole riches of the Lewisian Campe, & of the City of Lincolne, became the boory and spoile of the Kings Army, whereupon this difcomfiture was called Lewis Fair; Neither did the Clergy of the place escape, for the Popes Legate had commaunded that they also should be rifled to a penny, as persons excommunicated in partaking with Lewis. The Chaffe was but coldly & faintly followed vpon the flying Barons, otherwise not a man could haue escaped; wherein yet the chiefest Barons were taken, with about 400. Knights, besides Esquiers, and of other sorts without note or number, though some say that this number of Knights were slain, & matrons and women of the towne flying by boate, which they had no skill to gouerne, were drowned. Such as escaped the fight were not therefore past the danger; for the Country people fell vpon them as they fledde, killing great numbers, so that almost all the footmen tooke vp their last lodgings before they could reach to London, where Lewis was. The Marſhal of France, the Chaffellan of Aras, and about two hundred Knights came safely thither, but were not otherwise then sowerly welcome of the Prince, who laid vpon their cowardise the losse of all the rest. His feare of being taken Prisoner iustly encreasing, hee fortifies London by the best meanes hee can, and dispatcheth Poſts into France for more reliefe. This great victory was much the stranger, if (as some write the same went) that onely three were slain vpon both sides, the Earle of Perch, one of Da-Brems Knights, and an obscure fellow belonging to some, or other of the Barons.

(8) The Kings Gouvernour after the victory rode presently with the glad some tidings in the height of speed to the King and Legate, who with tears of ioy gaue God thanks. But the noble Earle not leaving his worke imperfect, seeks to embarras Lewis from foraging about London. Meane while by the diligence of Lady Blanch the wife of Lewis, Euface the ruffianly Apollata, (who of a Monk becoming a Demoniack) was now vpon the Sea with a fresh supply of men and munition bound for London; But God was no better pleased with these, then with the other scatterlings at Lincolne. For the English Nauie, hauing the wind of the French, sunke diuers of their shippes by tilting at them with the yron Prowes or Beakes of their Gallies; vntill almost vnblacked lime in dust or powder, which they threw into the faces of their enemies, and blinded their sight: so were the hopes of Lewis for any present succours absolutely frustrated. Euface himselfe, found after long search, and drawne out from the bottome of the Pumpe in a French shippe, at Douer had his head cut off, though some say hee was slain by Richard, a base-sonne of King Iohn. The newes of which successe being brought to the King, did not more reioice him, then they wounded Lewis, for the losse was not onely great in men, but in all sorts of riches and prouisions. To giue now no rest to Lewis his declining fortunes, the Earle of Pembroke with a mighty Army besieged London, and Lewis therein, allwile by Water as by Land, seeking to driue him by penurie to render the City. It came to capitulation, and in an Ilet in the River of Thames, not farre from Stanes, the King, Wallo the Legate, and William Marshall the Kings Gouvernour, met with Lewis & the Barons to finish the Peace: for Lewis had promised to doe as Wallo and the Earle would desire, so that it might not tend to his dishonour or scandall: Heades or Articles of the agreement which Lewis sware vpon the Gospell to performe, were, 1. That Lewis, the Barons, and other his partakers should stand to the iudgement of the Church (whose censures they had now some yeeres contemned) and from thenceforth bee and remaine true to the same. 2. That he and his should forthwith depart the Land; neuer to returne againe with a purpose to doe harme. 3. That he should doe his best to draw his Father to make restitution of all such things in France as belonged to the King of England, and that Lewis when himselfe was King should quietly part with them. 4. That Lewis should immediately render to King Henry all holdes and places taken in the warre. On the other part, the King, the Legate and the Earle swore; 1. That the King should restore to the Barons and others, all their rights and inheritances, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father. 2. That none (of the Lay) should suffer damage or reproch for taking part on either side. 3. That Prisoners should be released, &c. Whereupon Lewis with his adherents was formally by Wallo absolved from the sentence of Excommunication, and so they ranne on all sides into embracements, and parted in the kilfe of Peace. The Welsh, who had held with the Barons, were left out of this Conclusion, being thereby laid open to spoile. Thus was Lewis driven out of England, whom the Earle of Pembroke brought to the Sea-side, and the Realme was cleared.

(9) There are* who write how that Lewis had a great summe of money paid him for restoring the Hostages; but Mat. Paris whom some cite to that purpose, affirms no such matter in any printed Copy. Reason surely is vtterly against it; for when euen the life of Lewis was after a sort in King Henries hand, with what sense can it stand that the King should set all the French free without ransom; and yet himselfe pay money for the Hostages; which also were not his, but the Hostages of his enemies mies the Barons; so that, if money were due, it must haue come from them, not from the King, who both in honour and profite was rather obliged to the contrary. Writers of that very time doe in plain words say. The Poverty of Lewis was such, that he was compelled to borrow five thousand pounds of the Londoners, to set him out of England: and therefore that other seems nothing else but a vaine gloze to false the honour of Lewis, who was plainly driuen out of England, after so high hopes with losse, sorrow, and eternal disgrace, which the French are so sensible of, that they scarce seeme to write of the whole action, otherwise then *laying the misfortune of Lewis vpon the Barons mutability.

(10) The Realme of England purged of those foraine drugges, was not therefore presently freed from other manifold encombrances, such as after so great a tossing of all lawes and things diuine, and humane, doe ordinarily flow vp and downe, like the froth & working of a troubled Sea. For diuers men presuming vpon their former seruices to the State, or thinking the old bad world would either continue still, or sooner returne, if iustice grew confident against Trespassors, or for what other corrupt practices fouler, did dare intollerable things. The principall Lords of this misrule, were William Earle of Aumari, Falscius de Brent with his Garrison Souldiers, Robert de Vespont, with others, who hauing had the Castles and possessions of certaine Bishops and Great men, either to keepe in trust, or otherwise by iniquity of the times conuerted violently to their vices; did still with-hold the same, both against the minds of their lawfull owners, and the Kings expresse Prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gaug defended the Castle of Newarke (being the Fee of the Bishoppe of Lincolne, as was also the town itself) against the Kings Army, conducted by the * Great Marſhall Earle of Pembroke, for eight dayes, and did not first yeeld the place, before (by mediation of friends) the Bishoppe paid to Gaug one hundred pounds. There was in that great Earle, a perpetual care to conclude things without bloud-shedde, wherein thined his Christian piety and morall wisdom, there being no other so safe way to settle disordered humors. The greater was his losse both to the King and State by his death * soone after enluing, whose * monument yet remaining, doth nor so much eternize his memory, as that well deferred * Epitaph, the Epitome of his noble vertues;

Sum quem Saturnum sibi sensit Hybernia, Solem Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Ireland Saturn, England Summe am I, The Mars of France, and Normans Mercurie.

He left behind him sixe Sonnes, all Earles of Pembroke successiue, and dying without issue; his sixe Daughters aduanced by great marriages, brought as great aduantage to their husbands issue, by the inheritances of their issuelesse brethren.

(11) The King (gouerned after Marshalls death, by Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and such * other, whom the Bishoppe had procured to ioyne in administration of publik affairs) seeming now to haue a settled and calme estate, resolute (for good hopes sake) to bee crowned againe; which was performed by Stephen Archbishoppe of Canterbury at Westminster with the attendance and confluence of all the Prelates, Peeres, and People. Vpon the * Saturday before his Coronation, the * new worke of the Abbey Church at Westminster, (Paris calles it the Chappell of our Lady,) was begonne, whereof the King himselfe in person laid the first stone, as if hee meant the world should know, his intention was to consecrate his future actions to raise the glory of God. This calme but new beginning, was almost as speedily distempered and disturbed by sodaine stormes; by reason that, while the King kept his Christmas with great royalty at Oxford, in the company of the Prelates and Peeres of England, William de Fortibus, Earle of Anmarh, incited by Falscius de Brent, and the like riotous Gentlemen; sodainly departed from the Court without leaue, & (whether it were vpon discontentment, because the King had against the Earles will the last yeere taken some Castles into his hands, or out of an euill ignorance how to lye in quiet) he mannes the Castle of Bilham, vntill it with the Corne of the Chanons of Bridlington, spoiles the Towne of Deeping, and vnder shew of repaying to the Parliament, isleth on the Castle of Fotheringhay, committing many other furious riots in contempt of the King, and breach of his peace; many * others in other places following his lewd example. Yet at length the Earle coming in vnder the conduct of Walter Archbishop of Torke, was at the suite of Pandulph (who succeeded Wallo in the place of Legate) pardoned; and the like hurtfull clemency was extended toward his Complices and Retinue, whom the King (in regard belike of some former better deserts) let free without punishment or ransom. And to prevent any further disturbances of that nature, Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, for his rare integrity and fidelity approved in all King Johns troubles (was also made gouernour of the Kings Person, and Chief Insittur of England, with the generall allowance of all the States. What need the land then had of a seuerer proceeding, wee may iudge by this, that Faulk de Brent held the Earledomes of Northampton, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, with the Castles and Holdes; Philip de Mure, the Castles of Peke and Nottingham, Nottinghamshire, and Darbyshire; and others detained other portions, without any other right, then that which the iniquity of the late tumults gaue.

(12) It was no small addition to the troublefomnesse of this time, that certaine * Lords of Wales, and (as some say) Prince Lewelin himselfe, desirous to ridde their Marches of the English, rose in Armes, & laide siege to the Castle of Buelt, which incited King Henry to draw thither with an Army; but the worke was made easie by the voluntary departure of the Welsh; vpon the fame of the Kings approach: which appearances of some ensuing stirres, moued the king to thinke of strengthening himselfe with faithfull alliances; and not long after, Alexander King of Scots came to York, (who in the yeere * before had met King Henry at the same place) and there tooke to wife the Lady Joan King Henries sister; and Hubert de Burgh, in presence of both the Kings married the Lady * Margaret sister to Alexander Boethius * saith, that two great Lords of England married two sisters of King Alexander at that place. About which time, * Isabel Queen Dowager of England, without the leaue of her sonne the King, or of his Counsell, crost the seas, and tooke to husband the Earle of March in France. The young King supposing his estate at home now somewhat settled, and his eyes beginning to grow cleare-sighted by the benefite of experience, forgets not to looke about his affaires abroad; and first sends * Sauarie de Malleon to bee his Lieutenant in Aquitaine, where yet the English held the greater part, and dispatcheth Ambassadors to Philip King of France, for restitution according to the Articles with Lewis: whereunto answer was made that nothing ought to bee restored which by right of warre had bene attieched; but (as it seemes) there was a Truce for * sower yeeres agreed vpon betweene the two Monarches, concerning the County of Poitou.

ford, * about reformation of the Clergie; where also was conuenced before him an execrable impostor, who seeing how current all grosselt delusions passed in those dayes of blindness, was emboldned to suffer himselfe to be wounded in his hands, feet, and * side, (an horror to thinke) that by the resemblance of thole bloody impressions, he might perwade the people (apt to beleue any thing) that hee was their verie Saviour: whole deferred punishment was by immuring between two walles, as a monster too impious and vnworthy to die by anie humane hand. There was immured with him a curled old Beast, who pretended to be Mary the mother of this Christ, and well might bee, for their manners bee compared; * some adde a third also, who named herselfe Mary Magdalen. The punishment by Crucifixion which * some thinke was executed vpon the man at Arbor-berry, is neither so credible nor tollerable, as in which Christianity it selfe might seem to sustaine reproach; it being also against the * ancient law of Constantine, the first famous Christian Emperour, that any should from thence forth die by crucifixion; but it may be, that it was first so iudged (which might cause the relators error,) though afterward vpon fonder deliberation changed into a more fitting censure. But strange it is, that this man deferring (as hee did) so seuer a iudgement at Oxford, Saint Francis, whose fiction and imposture was the very fame (for the * wounds, though not for the name, of Christ) to soon after deferred for it to be canonized at Rome, for a Chiefe of Saints; and perhaps if this Monster had been at Rome, hee had bene likewise Sainted, or if Saint Francis had bene at Oxford, he had been likewise immured.

(14) In the State of the Common-wealth incredible darings (though of inferior quality to that former) were not wanting, against the maiesty of the Kings as appeared by Constantine Fitz-Arnulf, a Citizen of London: who vpon colour of a popular tumult, by him purposely cherished, (which rose at pastimes of wrestling, and like matters between the Citizens of London, and others of the Suburbs, attempted to set vp a Lewis againe, and in the heat of the sedition, hee traisterously cried, * Mount-Ioy, Mount-Ioy, God for vs and our Lord Lewis. Though the * Lord Maior, a discreet man, earnestly perwaded dutifull behauiours, yet Constantine had made the people incapable of good Counsell with his seditious Proclamations, which hee there caused to bee * published. The secret of this conspiracy was * reuealed by * another Citizen, and without question was further spred then the compass of one City, cūen as farre as into the hearts of all such turbulent people, to whom warre was beneficiall, and Quiet banefull. The chiefe Iusticiar hearing of these matters, with forces assembled, entred * the Tower, whither hee commaunded the principall men of the City to come, who easily put off the blame from themselves vpon Fitz-Arnulf. But hee as resolute in his answere, as desperate in the sedition, complained of himselfe in the hearing of all, that he had done lesse therein then hee ought; yet fiftene thousand Markes sterling hee offered for his life, when hee saw the halter about his necke, (for with his Cryer, and his Nephew the next day hee was hanged,) but no price could redeeme him out of the hand of Iustice. It is said, that hee so confidently answered, vpon trust of the Articles and Oath between the King and Lewis, that the partakers of Lewis should not be troubled; and that, vpon this occasion, Lewis denied restitution of such things, as the Articles did mention, pretending that Henry had herein broken first his faith, and thereby made the whole contract frustrate. Execution thus done without noife, or the Londoners priuity, the Iusticiar accompanied with Falscius and his armed troups, enters London, apprehends such others who were culpable, and for a terror to the rest, caufeth their * hands or feet to be cut off, and then set them at liberty. The King deposed the Magistrates, though some write that the tumult was appeased by the Maior, but when the King found, that onely the * bafer fort were interested in the disorder, he was reconciled to the Citie, having first thus weeded this chiefe Garden of the English Empire, and plucked vp by the rootes the maiser bramble.

(15) This dangerous beginning might haue had farre worse proceedings, if the King, though in yeeres tender, yet had not bene so prouident, as to haue foreseen it, and so, with patient conuenance at some particular indignities, prevented a publike disquiet. For the Barons, still minding their long desired Liberties, and requiring a confirmation of them by the King, who, at the concluded peace with Lewis had sworn thereto; William Briwere, one of the Kings Councell answered; that the Liberties which they demanded ought not to be observed, because they were violently extorted. But wordes growing hereupon, and Archbishop Stephen (the Barons ancient abettour) kindling thereat, the young King prudently shut vp the whole strife with this speech; All of vs haue sworn to these Liberties, and that which wee haue sworn, all of vs haue to obserue. His Deed immediately sealed his Word, (for hee saw hee durst doe no other,) and Writs were sent forth, to enquire vpon Oathes, what Liberties or free customs were current, in, and from the time of King Henry his Grandfather: by which act, all mens hopes were raised to expect the full conclusion of all those grievous contentions, which had so long encombered the Kingdom. The like hope was conceiued of better successes then before, in forrain affaires, vpon newes of the death of King Philip of France, the euer-deadly (and now-dead) Enemy of Englands welfare; which moued the King to send the Archbishop of Canterbury, and three other Bishops to Lewis, now crowned King of France, there to demand the Duchie of Normandy, and such other Lands on that side of the sea, as before his departure out of England hee had sworn to restore: but his answere was; 1. That he held those possessions by a iust title, as hee was ready to shew King Henry, if he would come to his Court to make his demand; 2. That the King of England had violated his Oath, for that such as were taken at Lincolne were grievously fined; 3. That such Liberties of England, for which the warre was first moued, had bene granted at his departure, and since confirmed by oath, were not onely not observed, but the old wicked ones reduced, and generally farre worse ordained in their place. With which solutions to their demand, the Ambassadors were faine to returne, and Henry left to come by his owne as hee could.

(16) The king well perceiving, how vnable hee should be either to recover those his Transmarine Dominions, or almost to maintaine his owne royall estate at home, if such, as by the vnruines of former times hauing gotten possession of Crowne-lands might still with-hold them, resolved to reforme them; by aduise principally of Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury and Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, who thereby drew vpon themselves no small loads of enuie. Which recovery of such parcels of the royall Patrimony, though it were no lesse needfull then lawfull yet by reason the interested were so many (and such as wanted no will to cōse the whole Kingdom, rather then forgoe their Religion,) they wisely vsed all the strengthes which Religion or humane policy could giue. First therefore * there was procured a Briefe from the Pope, by which both the King was declared to bee at liberty to choose his owne Councell, and gouerne by himselfe, (which, who doubteth but hee might haue done without the Popes Bull?) and all men commanded vnder pain of Censures to restore such things as against law and the Kings will, they detained from him. This put the interested into a will to raise Armes; meeting for that purpose at Leicester, where the Cestrian Earle and his * Confederates consulted, how they (vnder der the specious pretext of removing the Earle of Kent, as one whose predominating greatness, and euill offices against them, were not to be by them endured) might detain the Castle and other possessions demanded. But vpon notice, that (if forthwith they did not render backe what they vniuilly held) they should by name bee presently excommunicated, and that the King (now at Northampton) had with him not onely an honest cause, * but a greater number of Souldiers (which they much more feared then all their shames of Excommunication) they following a * wiser course, repaired forthwith to the King, rendering vpp to his hands all that belonged to the Crowne; but did not lay downe their displeasure, for that, on their petition, the King would not put from him his chiefe Iusticiar, the object of their Enuie.

(17) Meane while Lewis King of France not contented to deny the demanded restitution vpon his allenged pretexts, inuades such other parts as * King Henry peaceably held in Poitou and Normandy, the best colour and reason giuen for it, * is, That whereas Aquitaine (whereof Normandy and Poitou were part) was holden of the Crown of France by homage, the King of England, being not hindered by sickness nor other necessity was not present at the Coronation of Lewis, nor executed his absence by Ambassadors. In prosecution of which pretence hee tooke * Rochel (the principall Port of Normandy) and other places, and ouerthrew in a Battle, Sauarie de Malleon also, Lieutenant for king Henry in Aquitaine: vpon which ouerthrow the losse of those foresaid Townes with the whole Countrey of Poitou (as * one faith) ensued. The which, the king lost the seruice of the said Sauarie, a valiant commander, who for some indignity offered vnto him by William Longspe Earle of Salisbury. (* sent out by King Henry, vpon some dislike of Sauaries doings, with commission to oueruiue his courtesies,) suddenly turned French, among whom hee had great credit and preferment. King Henry ill brooking so greata defalcation of his foraine estates, determined to haue recourse to the generall aide of his people, for meanes to recouer his losses, but while (for that purpose) hee held a * Parliament, the whole assembly was sodainly troubled with iust complaints of an vnufferable outrage.

(18) For Henry de Braibroke, a Iustice Itinerant, who with other held the Assises at Dunstable, was sodainly surprisid (and imprisoned vnder strong Garrison in Bedford Castle) by the commandement of Falscius, enraged, for that thirty verdicts had there passed against him, vpon trials of title for lands which hee had forcibly entred. The Judges wife with her teares moued the whole Parliament to indignation and pity, that all other business set a part, the Clergie aswell as the Laity forthwith attended the King to the siege. Falscius himselfe flying into Wales, there to continue a greater body of rebellion, did leaue his brother, Lieutenant in the Castle with a desperate crew, hauing victuals and munition for an whole yeeres resistance. Yet after two Moneths siege the Castle being taken, the Judge was enlarged, the Lieutenant and his wholeretinue hanged, the pile it selfe (as a dennee of thecces) demolished; and an example giuen what others should trust vnto, who did not in due time submit themselves to their Soueraigne. This * Falscius was a Norman by birth and a bastard, who comming ouer in poore fort vnder King John, so behauid himselfe in the Kings seruices, that in regard of his al-daring forwardnesse, Bedford was giuen him to defend against the Barons; where by rapine and violence hee had drawne together the shew of a great fortune, besides that which hee had in marriage with Margaret de Riparia a great inheritance, whom King John, to her no lesse discontentment, then disparagement had bestowed vpon him. But now when this Castle, beyond his imagination was thus beaten to the earth, and all other his possessions seized by the King, hee procures Alexander Bishoppe of Coventree to safe conduct him to Bedford, where hee throws himselfe at the Kings feet, imploring mercy for his former good seruices. Hee was, after pardon of life hardly gotten, sent into perpetual banishment; at which time hee with teares desired the Earle of Warren, (who had in charge to see him ship away) That hee would commend him to the King, and let him know (a secret sice for theking to take notice of) that all the troubles which hee had raised in the Realme, were by the only instigation of the Barons. Notwithstanding the king was so incensed for the keeping this Castle against him, that hee commaunded all * Strangers to depart the Realme within a time there limited vnder great penalty.

(19) The interrupted Councell of Parliament, and purposes of the King for recouerie of his Poitouine inheritances, were now againe resumed; yet the King could not there (but vpon condition) that hee should graunt their Liberties, the string which was cuer harped on,) obtaine a fiftenth, nor the good will of the States to furnish him in his French hostilities: Thus the king, * drawne with desire of money (whereof his want was very vrgent) grants those his Charters vnder his Seale, and was so further wrought on, that oathes were (by royall commaundement) taken, to tie all men to the obseruation of the said Graunts, according to the very letter, if that bee the meaning of * litterarum iuramentum, and not something else. Vpon the strength of this money (whose dayly expence, like vidual nourishment, keeps all great actions alive,) Richard Earle of Cornwall the Kings brother, William Longspe Earle of Salisbury, and aboute threecore Knights with competent forces were sent into Galesse in the Springs, where they safely arrived at Burdeaux, and were honourably entertained. This timely arrual had good effects, for it confirmed the well-disposed, sealed the irrefolute, and reduced much which had bene extorted by the French. Hugh Earle of the Marches of Poitou, comming by the French Kings direction to remoue Earle Richard and the English from the siege of the Riol, was with all his Forces intercepted * by an Ambuscado, and difcomfited with no small losse of men, munition and carriages. All sides were in the end * contented to pause without parliance, and the English held Aquitaine despite their force or practises. But William Longspe the Kings vncler suruiued not long his good seruices in those parts; who returning (vpon busines of State) into England, (soone ended his dayes at his Castle of Salisbury, with so great humility and pietie, that at point of death hee would not receiue the holy Eucharist in his Bed (which deuotion is also reported of King Henry the eight) but vpon his bare knees on the ground, which hee moistned with abundance of penitent teares. Vpon which great Earle this Epitaph was made:

(20) About these times the Pope (say * his Monks) sent abroad into the world his Nunces, requiring euery where vnde exactions, with purpose to settle a certainty of contribution to his See of Rome, out of all the Cathedral and conuentual Churches in Christendome; alleading, * that hee did it to wipe away from that See, that ancient scandall of Anacore and Briberie, which otherwise their penury must still enforce them to use. Neuertheless, alwell the Messenger, as the Messager found but slender welcome here. For (by procurement of the Archbishop of Canterbury) the Popes Agent Otto, receiued letters from Rome, commaunding him presently to returne: to that hee had of purpose bene flacke herein, as in other things, in regard of five thousand Marks, with which the Queene Dowager of France had (as he said) embred him, and withall ranne at him in great fury with his drawne sword, but Ranulph Earle of Chester and others stept betwene, and saved the King from so foule a blemish, who foone after received him into grace againe. But that assembly was dispersed by the arrival of a great man out of Britaine, a principal confederate with the English against Lewis, who shewed the unreasonable time of the year, and other reasons; and the enterprize thereupon adiourned to the Spring. So after Easter hee transports from Portsmouth with a full Armie into Britaine. The same day in which hee set saile from England, himselfe did in person, visite the poore and feeble, and dealt large Almes, not refusing to kisse the sicke and leprous. The successe of this voyage is so diversly reported, that without prejudice to an obseruant Reader, it might be all left out. Much certainly was not done. The King of England purpose was to haue marched through Britaine (where many received him) into Poitou; and as some write hee did so, and tooke homagie Gaigoigne. To embrace this passage, the King of France lay with a great Armie at Angiers, and the King of England at Nantz in Britaine, expecting the repaire of more force. Fulk Paganel a noble Norman, with about sixty valiant Knights perswaded the King of England, it was easie for him to reduce Normandie to his obedience; but Hubert de Burgh diuerted the King from acceptance of that enterprize. The Normans therefore made an ill iourney, and an unlucky, for they prevailed not with King Henry, and for their conspiracy were disseised at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by losse in battle (wherein, if any battle were at all, some say the French had the better, taking about foure thousand of the English), or otherwise, this is agreede on, that after the waite of infinite Treasures, and the great diminution of his numbers, the King of England returned without accomplishment of his purpose, leaving for the defence of Britaine, the three great Earles of Chester, Pembroke and Aumari, with forces answerable.

(28) It is not unlikely that the dangerous rebellion of the Irish, hastned his returne; for the King of Connaught and his Irish, seeing the King and the Earle of Pembroke (who as Heire to the great Strang-baw had good possessions in those parts) wholely embued in the enterprize of Britaine, had invaded the Kings people, with a purpose and hope, vnderlie to expell and amoue our Nation from among them; but their deuises proued mischieuous to themselves, that rebellious King himselfe being taken Prisoner, not without the losse of many thousands of the Irish. The Welsh also loone after brake out againe, whose Prince Lewelin, in reuenge of those Welshmens heads, which Hubert de Burgh had cruelly caused to bee stricken off in cold blood, and presented to the King, had burnt certaine Churches and Gentlewomen in them; for which, at Oxford in the presence of the King, all the Nobility, and Clergy, hee was solemnly excommunicated, and the King there gathering a great Army, in person went to repress the Welsh, though not without losse.

(29) Another Garboyle whether no lesse disturbed the whole land, the Infidelity of the Romans (who were charged to haue wrought innumerable confusions and infinite grieuances to the King, his Kingdome, Peeres and People) stirring vp multitudes through the Land, by a common consent, to seeke by force to shake off the importable yoke of their oppressions. It was alleaged by these reformers, that they had vnder hand the Kings Letters Patents, the Lord Chiefe Iustices assent, the Bishop of Londons countenance, and the shiriffes aide in sundry Shires, whereby the armed troups took heart euery where, violently to seize on the Romanes Corne, and their other wealth; which booties they employed to good purposes, and for reliefe of the poore, the Romanes while hiding their heads, for feare of looting them. And though the King, on the Popes complaint thereof, seemed to dislike the outrage, yet had the King himselfe no lesse cause to be moued with the infidelity of the Pope, then were his subjects of those Popelings. For that very time the See of Canterbury being void, Ralph Newill Bishop of Norwich was elected by the Monkes, and gladly approved by the King, whose most faithfull Chancelour hee was, an unshaken pillar of truth, doing right to all without delayes, especially to the poore, without declining to the right hand or the left. But the Pope being told he was a Royalist, and one that would ioin with the King and whole Kingdome (who now all struggled to shake off the Popes seruitude), and would to the death stick to that law, and those Appelles, which Stephen Langton solemnly before the Altar in Saint Pauls Church urged against King Johns submission to the See of Rome; his Election (as being a person very dangerous) was presently pronounced void. Whereupon the Monkes chose a second, and him the Pope misliked, for being too old, and soft spirited, then a third was elected, a man of eminent learning, a Student in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and him also the Pope reiected; neuer resting till they had chosen Edmund of Abington, a man more pleasing to the Romanes palate. But the King seeing the Great Emperour Fredericke, euen this very time while hee was winning the Kingdom of Jerusalem from Infidels, so Turkishly in his absence depoued from his owne Empire by the Pope, vpon a priuate spleene, no maruaile, if in this his vnrripe age, and distracted government, hee feared to draw on himselfe by any opposition, too mercilesse an enemy. So that for the time these indignities were winked at in these parts: in France also by the wisdom of Queen Blanch, and mediation of the Archbishops of Reims, and Philip Earle of Boilein of one part, and the Earles of Britaine and Chester on the other, a three yeeres cessation from mutuall hostilities was ratified by oath, betweene the French and English.

(30) Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, Chiefe Iusticiar of England, hauing with few rubbes hitherto, enjoyed the most inward looe and fauour of all this King, as of King John, seemed now to haue run the Stage of his best fortunes. For the King (vpon occasion of such inrodes and spoiles, as the Prince Lewelin continually made in the Marches of Wales) being aduertised by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and certaine other of the Councell, once for all to giue an end to those braues and insolencies of the Welsh, complained; that hee was not able in regard of his wants; saying, that his Treasurers told him, all the rents of his Exchequer would do no more then scarce maintaine apparrell, household and ordinary Almes-deedes. This was not vnknewne to the Bishop, and the rest of that faction, who watched this opportunity of purpose to lift the Earle of Kent out of fauour: wherefore they boldly answered the King: that if he were poore hee might thanke himselfe, who gave away to others such Honours, Custodies, and Dignities, as were vacant, alienating them from his estate; that hee was only to be called a King in name, rather then for any riches which he had; that his Ancestors, magnificent Princes, abounding in all sorts of worldly glorie, and wealth, heaped to themselves inestimable treasures, out of no other meanes, but the Rents and Profites of the Kingdome.

(31) The King stung with this iust reprehension, beganne (by their instructions) to call the Sheriffes of Shires, Baylives, and other his Officers to a strait account, for all such recetes, as appertained to the Exchequer, thrusting some out of their places, and wringing out of all their full sponges, store of coine, till hee satisfied himselfe both for the arrears and interest. Out of Ralph Briton, Treasurer of his Chamber hee screwed a thousand pounds, and and also put him from his place, into which (by the Bishoppe of Winchester suggestion, who now predominated in Court) hee substituted Peter de Orinail a Poiteuine, the Bishoppes Nephew or Sonne, if Paris say true; and so forth hee, the Kings coffers otherwise empty and leane, were by these means stuffed againe, though not to their full surfeit. For these were but preparatives to a farther scrutine and rancke, intended against the Earle of Kent, whom (vpon the Bishoppes suggestion) the King remoued from the Proto-Iusticiari-bippe (or high office of his Chiefe Iustice) and put in his place Sir Stephen Seagrave a Knight onely in name. Then is a strict and captious account demanded of the Earle of Kent, for all such things as he was in any fort chargeable with; as, 1. For such receipts or debts, as were due to King John, or to this King Henry himselfe: 2. For the meane profits of such lands, as the King was seized of, from the day of the death of the first great William, Earle of Pembroke, his Iusticiar and Marshall, whither those lands were in England, Wales, Ireland, or Poiteu: 3. For such Liberties or waies Customes which the King had in Forests, Warrens, Counties and else where, and how they were kept or alienated. 4. For such things as the King lost by Huberts negligence: 5. For the wronges and damages offered to the Romanes, and Italian Clerks, and to the Popes Nuncios against the Kings will by authority of Hubert, who would take no order to correct the misdoers, as by vertue and nature of his place hee was obliged: 6. For the many elcuaues coming by Carruages, gifts and presents, or for the rents of Custodies belonging to the Crowne.

(32) To all which heades, the Earle answered, that hee had the Charter of the Kings Father, by which hee was freed from giuing any account eyther for things passed, or to come, and that hee had giuen such proofe of his fidelity vnto King John, as he would not endure to heare him make an account. Peter Bishoppe of Winchester replied hereunto, that such a Charter after the death of King John had no force, and therefore the Fathers Charter, and graunt of Priuilege, was no reason why he should not stand accountable to the Sonne. This defence for money dangers in this fort traiered or auoyded, they labored to draw him in for his heade, by charging him with sundry Articles founding treasonable; as, 1. That Hubert had disswaded the Duke of Austria from matching his Daughter with the King who sought it; 2. that hee had hindered the King from entering vpon forraign lands to him belonging, whereby the King, Peeres, and People consumed their Treasures vainly: 3. that hee had enticed the Daughter of the King of Scots (whom King John had entrusted to his custody, meaning himselfe to marry her) & traiterously defiled the noble yong Lady, whom he married in hope to be King of Scotland in her right, if shee furnished her Brother: 4. that hee had stolne out of his leuel-house a precious stone of wonderful value, whose vertue was to make him who had it, invincible in Battle, & that hee gaue that stone to Lewelin prince of Wales, the Kings enemy: 5. that hee by his letters had caused Lewelin to hang William de Breuse.

(34) The King with his Prelates and Peeres meeting at Lambeth, at the day appointed for Huberts answer, hee (being made to beleue that the King would put him to a most foule death) durst not appeare, or peepe forth of his sacred refuge. The Londoners were assembled in Armes (by the Kines command) to the number of about twenty thousand vnder banners displayed to dragge the Earle out of Sanctuary: but vpon the Earle of Cheshers wiser Counsell, the prey was taken out of the hands of a bloudy multitude (who mortally hated him for Constantines death) and they returned againe to their City. The Archbishops of Dublin still performing the office of a true friend, ouerslips not this occasion, and by his importunity obtayned day for Hubert, till about Twelfe-tide then next ensuing, and the King for his assurance, during the Interim, giues him letters Patents. Hubert thinking himselfe secure for the present, is now vpon his way toward his wife at the Abbey of Saint Edmund in Suffolke, but his enemies so prevailed by their suggestions, that Sir Godfrey de Cxancumb Knight, with three hundred armed men, was sent to apprehend the Earle in Essex. Hee hauing intelligence of their approach, fledde into a Chappell at Brentwood, which adioyned to his lodging; from whence those rough Souldiers haled him (hee holding in one hand a Crucifix, and in the other the Sacrament) and sent for a Smith to make for him shackles of yron. But when the Smith vnderstood, that it was for Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, he refused, vttering such words (if Mathew Paris doe not Poetize) as did well shew that honourable thoughts are sometimes found in the hearts of men, whose fortunes are farre from honour; for hauing first drawne a deepe sigh, hee said; * Doe with mee what see please, and God haue mercy on my soule; but as sure as the Lord liues, I will neuer make yron shackles for him, but will rather die the worst death that is. For is not this that most loyal and courageous Hubert, who so often hath preserved England from being destroyed by strangers, & restored England to England? Hee who faithfully and constantly serued his Soueraigne Lord King John in Gascoigne, Normandy, and else where, that he was compelled to eate the flesh of horses, whose blood courage euen Enemies admired? hee, that so long defended Dover Castle, the Key of England, against all the exquisite sieges of the French, and by vanquishing them at Sea, brought safety to the Kingdome? what need I rehearse his excellent doings at Lincoln and Bedford? Let God be iudge between him and you, for using him so vniuilly and inhumanely, repaying good with euill, may requiting his most excellent deserts with the worst recompence that can be. But Sir Godfrey, and his blacke band regarded not such speeches, but otherwise binding the Earle hard, they set him on horsebacke, and so conuayed him to the Tower of London.

(35) This breach of Sanctuary being made known to Roger Bishope of London (whose Diocese it was) he confidently tells the King, that if the Earle were not restored to the Chappell, hee would excommunicate all the Authors of that outrage. The Earle is accordingly restored; but the Sheriffs of Essex and Hertford, at the Kings commandment, with the powers of their counties besiege the Chappell so long, that at last (they having cast a Trench about it that none might goe in or out) the Earle was compelled to come forth and render himselfe, bearing all things with an equal mind, as one that had a cleare conscience before God, which hee professed to haue. While the Chiappell was thus beset round, the Kings indignation was so violent, that hee forbade all men once to make mention of Hubert in his hearing. No marvaile then if it be said, that the Princes indignation is death. The Archbishoppe of Dublin neuertheless was not daunted, but with prayers and teares besought the King, who remained as yet inexorable, Huberts enemies possessing his soule and senses. Hubert therefore is againe imprisoned in the Tower. There was no sacrifice as it seemed could appease the Kings ire, but that of the Earles Hoord of gold, and other riches, which the Knights Templars had in their custodie vpon trust, & without Huberts consent refused to deliuer. Hubert therefore willingly yeelds; which when the Depostaries did giue vp, the value seemed incredible. This hoording perhaps was Huberts crime, whereof being thus purged, he had hope to recover out of these deadly pangs and conuulsions of fortune, and himselfe to be made capable of curing. Well, the king obtains this precious booty, but his enemies would haue his blood also; saying, that hee was convicted of theft and fraud, it was meet he should die a most shameful death. It seemed, they thought, that the verie finding of so much treasure was a conuiction of fraud in the getting, and that the King must be interpreted to haue lost, whatsoever the Earle had gained. But the displeasure of the King was mollified with this golden balme, for hee answered them thus; Hubert from his childhood hath (as I haue heard) faithfully enough serued my uncle King Richard, and my Father King John, and if hee haue done ill towards me, hee shall neuer therefore die an euill death. For I had rather be reputed a foolish or a negligent King, then a cruel Tyrant, or a bloody man towards him, who hath long serued mee and mine ancestors; nor will I weigh more his euill deedes, which are not as yet manifest, nor proued true, then all his good deedes, which are plainlie knowne to the Realme, and to vs all. Hereupon Hubert had all such lands granted vnto him, as cyther King John had giuen, or himselfe had purchased. There vnderooke for him to the King (as sureties) the Earles of Cornwall, and Warren, Marshall & Ferrars, and himselfe was committed to the Castle of Denfise, there to abide in free Prison, vnder the Custodie of four Knights, belonging each of them to one of these four Earles. This Court storme thus in part ouerblowne, let vs take our standings, to view what other weather followed, and what countenance of things in this Kingdome did next present it selfe to the world.

(36) The King being naturally, as it seemes, addicted to repose himselfe vpon some one mans counsell, was now wholly swayde by Peter de Rupibus Bishope of Winchester, who had therefore wrought the Earle out of grace, that hee might slyly raigne, and predominate in the gentle King. Which the better to effect, the Bishope procures him to displace the English Officers, and in their roomes to surrogate Poitounes and Britons; who comming o-uer to the number of about two thousand, hee stuffs his Castles with them; and (in briefe) did as it were wholly entrust himselfe, his treasures, strengths, and the Realme to them. So that Indgements were committed to the vniuersall Lawes to the Out-lawes, Peace to Wranglers, and Iustice to wrong-doers. Suchas would haue praied redresse for these abuses, were interrupted, and put off by the Bishope of Winchester. Among them who were removed from their places in Court, was one Sir William de Redene a Knight, and Deputy Marshall to Richard Earle of Pembroke. This was to the Earle very displeasing, which ioyned with a consideration of the publicke cause and danger, he associates vnto him certain of the great Lords (as was the fashion of those Lording times, vpon euery discontent,) and in the Company of them aduanceth confidently to the King, whom in the hearing of many heereproueth; for that hee had, through sinister aduise, called in the Poitounes, to the oppression of the Realme, of his natural subjects, of their Lawes and Liberties: humble therefore hee beseecheth him that hee would speedily reforme such abuses, which threatened the imminent subuersion both of the Crowne and Kingdome: which if hee did not, himselfe and other Lordes, would so long withdraw their attendance, as hee entertained Strangers. The Bishope hereunto makes answer; That the King might well and lawfully call in what Strangers himselfe thought good, for the defence of the Crowne and Realme, and such, and so many of them, as might be able to compell his proud and rebellious people to due obedience. When the Oracle would speake no otherwise, they departed from Court greatly discontented; firmly promising one to the other, that in such a cause which did touch them all, they would like men stand together while anie breath was in their bodies.

(37) Those who were now most potent about the King, nothing sorry for the discontentment of so great a Peere as the Earle Marshall, but counting it a part of their strengthes, to vie the regall power toward the weakning of the English, nourish in the King his auersion. The minds of men sufficientlie inclining of themselves, to doubt the worst vpon such diuisions, had their feare increased by sundrie prodigies of strange thunders and raines, and especially of foure redde Parabellons (or fireballances of the Sunne) besides the Sunne it selfe, (appearing about the parts of Hereford and Worcester) from morning till night in the Skies: and indeed much trouble immediately ensued aswell in England as Wales, & Ireland. The Poitounes, and other Strangers thus bearing the sway, so as the Kings person went guarded with troupes of such, the Earles and Barons being by the Kings commaund summoned to another Parliament at Oxford, refused to come. While the King was there, one Robert Bacon, who vied there to preach before the King and Prelates, freely told him, that if hee did not remove from him Peter Bishope of Winchester, and Peter de Rinaldis, he could neuer be in quiet. The King did hereupon a little come to himselfe, & Roger Bacon a Clergy-man also of a pleasant wit, did second Roberts aduise, telling the King that Peter de Rupibus were most dangerous things at sea, alluding to the Bishopes name, Petrus de Rupibus. The King therefore (as he had the happines in his mutability, to change for his more security) taking that good aduise of Schollers, which he would nor of his Peeres, summons a Parliament to be holden at Westminster, giuing the world to know withall, that his purpose was to amend by their aduise, what hee ought to be amended.

(38) But the Barons, considering that still there arrived sundry strangers, men of warre with Horie and Armour, and not trusting the Poitounes faith, came nor, but presumed to fend this traitorous messenger to the king, that if out of hand hee removed not Peter Bishope of Winchester, and the Poitounes out of his Court, they all of them, by the common assent of the kingdome, would drive him out, his wicked Counsellors together out of it, and consule about creating a new Soueraigne. The king (whom his fathers example made more timorous,) could easily haue bene drawne, to haue redeemed the loue of his naturall Liegemen, with the disgrace of a few strangers; but the Bishope of Winchester and his friends infused more spirit into him. Whereon; to all those whom hee suspected, the King sets downe a day, within which they should deliuer sufficient pledges to secure him of their loyalty. Against that day the Lords in great numbers make repaire to London, but the Earle Marshall (admonished of danger, by his sifter the Countesse of Cornwall) flies backe to Wales, and chiefly for want of his preference nothing was concluded. The King not long after is at Gloster with an Armie, whither the Earle and his adherents required to come, refused, the King therefore burns their Mannors, and giues away their inheritances to the Poitounes.

(39) This Rebellion had not many great names in it, but tooke strength rather by weight then number: the known Actors were the Earle Marshall, the Lord Gilbert Basset, and many other of the inferior Nobles. The Bishopes Arts had plucked from him, the Kings Brother, and the two Earles of Chester and Lincoln, (who dishonourably sold their loue for a thousand Markes,) and otherwise, as it seemed, secured theret: neuertheless, these may well be thought, not to haue borne any euill will to their now forsaken confederate, the Earle Marshall, who tooke himselfe to handle the common cause; certainly hee handled his owne safety but ill, as the euents shall demonstrate. The Earle hearing these things, contracts strict amity with Llewelyn Prince of Wales; whose powers thus knit together, by aduantages of the Mountains, were able to counterpoize any ordinary inuasion. To the Kings aide, Baldwin de Giffes with many Souldiers came out of Flanders. The King now at Hereford in the midst of his Forces, sends from thence (by Winchester counsell) the Bishope of Saint Davids, to desie the Earle Marshall; how farre sooner this word desie extends it selfe, sure it seems that the Earle hereupon vnderstoode himselfe discharged of that obligation, by which hee was tied vnto the King, and freed to make his defence. The King notwithstanding after some small attempts, and better considerations, did promise and assume, that by aduise of his Counsell all that was amisse (should at a day appointed) be rectified and amended. About which time, Hubert de Burgo, hauing intelligence that the Bishope of Winchester (who was a Poitouine) plotted his death, escaped out of the Castle of Denfise (where hee was prisoner) to a neighbour Church, but was haled from thence by the Castle-keepers. The Bishop of Sarisbury (in whose Diocese it happened) caused him to be safe-restored to the same place, from whence by the Earle Marshall, and a troupe of armed men his friends, hee was rescued and carried into Wales.

(40) The King, at the day and place appointed, holds his great Councell or conference with the Lords; but nothing followed for the peace of the Realme; it was not an ordinary passage of speech, which hapned there betweene the Lords, and the Bishope of Winchester. For, when the English Bishops and Barons humbly besought the King, for the honour of Almighty God to take into grace his natural Subjects, whom (without any trial by their Peeres) hee called Traitors: the Bishope (offended it seems, at Peeres) takes the words out of the Kings mouth, and answers; That there are not Peeres in England, as in the Realme of France, and that therefore the King of England, by such Iusticiars as himselfe please to ordaine, may banish offenders out of the Realme, and by iudiciall processe condemne them. The English Bishops relished his speech so harshly, that with one voice they threatened to excommunicate and curse by name the King; principall wicked Counsellors; but Winchester appealed, then they accursed all such as alienated the heart of the king from his natural subjects, and all others that perturbed the peace of the Realme.

(41) The Earle Marshall, this while had by force reclaimed a Castle, which hee had a little before sur-rendred to the King, which stirred the King to gather his forces at Glocester, and thence to aduance towards Wales. But the Earle had politickly barred the Country of all Prouisions, for man and beast, that the King was faine to strike aside to Gromont Castle, where the Earle, with his Confederates and the power of Wales, to awaited their time, that assailing the Kings Campe vnawares, there were taken about five hundred horse, with the Sumpters, riches, and carriages of the Armie; vpon which losse (his men also greatly scattered) the King leauing two noble Gentlemen with the Poitounes, to make good the Marches against the Welsh, returned more empty and inglorious then before. The Earle found them worke, whom the King had left behind; and (as hee was a man of no lesse courage then deepe witte,) whereas Baldwin de Giffes (the valiant Flemish knight) with a thousand Horsemen; thought to haue surprized him, who hauing but a tenth part of that number, came to view the Castle of Monmouth; the Earle alone defended himselfe against twelue of his enemies; and when his horse was cowardly slaine by them, hee pitcht one of them by the legge out of the Saddle, and leapt into it himselfe, neuer giuing ground till his Armie came to the rescue, and obtained a faire victorie, with the slaughter and captiuation of many Poitounes and others. His other exploits in and about Wales, were not few nor vnfortunate; if it were not onely in this, (as what indeed could be more glorious or vngracious to a noble mind?) for that his Soueraigne was vpon the contrary side.

(42) The King about this time, to strengthen his life and State, with the prayers of Beneficiaries, and other deuoted affections, founded the house of Conuerts, where such as forsooke the Iudaicall Superstitions, had prouisions for maintenance vnder a sober rule and ruler; hee also erected and endowed a famous Hospital at Oxford, both for the entertainment of Forrainers and Pilgrimes, (who thither much frequented,) and for reliefe also of such as were diseased: So that Llewelyn Prince of Wales, (the Earles chiefe confederate) when hee was threatened sore, if hee would not lye in quiet, did not speake more magnificently of charity, then honourably of the Kings more feare (quoth hee) the Almesdees which the King dooth, then all the men of warre which hee hath, and the whole Clergy, put together.

(43) The Earle Marshall encreasing in strength and hatred against such as were the Kings reputed Seducers, makes spoile and booty on their possessions, and ioyning with the power of Llewelyn, puts all to fire and sword, as farre as Shrewsburie, part whereof they burnt to Ashes, and sackt the residue. The King then at Gloster for want of sufficient Forces, departed thence (greatly grieved) to Winchester, abandoning those other parts as it were to wast and ruine. It therefore seemes, that he was not growne stronger or richer, by the displacing of Hubert Earle of Kent, and the rest, and by taking new into their roomes, who commonly bite and sucke hard till they haue glutted themselves, (if at leastwise there be any satietie in auarice) whereas the old officers, hauing provided in asore for the maine chance, haue the lesse reason to be grieved.

Realme, his Lands, townes and Tenements consumed with fire; after his Hereditaments destroyed, and himselfe for ever disinherited, that if upon his coming thither, they did take him either alive or dead, the King did give them all the Earles lands there, which now were forfeited by virtue of his Attainure, and for assurance that the said gift should continue firme and good, they, by whose advice the King and Kingdome were governed, faithfully undertooke. To these letters (which the Monkes call bloody) they caused the King to set his Seale, as they themselves also (being eleven) did theirs; upon receipt of which lines, the parties signified backe under the seale of secrecy, that if the Contents of those letters were confirmed by the Kings Letters Patents, they would performe that which was desired. The Letters patents bee made accordingly, and having fraudulently gotten the Great Seale from Hugh Bishop of Chichester, Lord Chancellor, who knew not thereof, they make them authenticke with the impression.

(45) The Kings mind therefore being still exulted towards the Earle Marshall, hee grievously charged Alexander Bishop of Chichester, that he had too much familiarity with the Earle, affirming that they sought to thrust him from his throne; the Bishop to clear himselfe from so hainous a scandall, puts on his Episcopall habite, and solemnly pronounceth all those accurs, who did but imagine a wickednesse of so foule a nature, against the Maiesty or person of the King: and thereupon by the intercession of other Prelates, hee was received into grace. The King was then at Westminster, where Edmund the Archbishop of Canterbury elect, with other his Suffragan Bishops, bewailing the estate of the kingdome, present themselves before him, telling him, as his loyal Liegemen, "that the Counsell of Peter Bishop of Winchester, and his Complices, which now he had, and used, was not sound nor safe, but cruell and perillous to himselfe and his Realme. First, for that they hated and despised the English, calling them Traitors, turning the Kinges hearts from the love of his people, and the hearts of the people from him; as in the Earle Marshall, whom (being one of the worthiest men of the land) by sowing false tales they drave into discontentment; 2. that by the Counsell of the same Peter, his Father King John first lost the hearts of his people, then Normandie, then other lands; and finally, wasted all his treasure, and almost England it selfe, and neuer after had quiet; 3. that if the Subjects had now bene handled according to Justice and law, and not by their wogedly counsels, those present troubles had not hapned, but the Kinges lands had remained undestroyed, his treasures unexhausted; 4. that the Kings Council is not the Council of Peace, but of perturbation; because they who cannot rise by Peace, will raise themselves by the trouble; and disinherison of others; 5. that they had the treasure, Castles, Wardships, and strengthes of the Kingdome in their hands, which they insolently abused to the great hazard of the whole estate, for that they made no conscience of an Oth, Law, Justice, or the Churches censures. Therefore we, O King (said they) speake these things faithfully unto you; and in the presence both of God and man, doe counsell, beseech, and admonish you, to remove such a Council from about you, and (as it is the usage in other Realmes) governe yours by the faithfull and sworne Children thereof. The King in briefe answered hereunto, that hee could not suddenly put off his Council, and therefore prayed a short respite, till their accounts were audited. Meanwhile the behaviours of the Marshalline faction (having this backing at Court) grew more and more intolerable; for while the King was at Huntingdon, the Lord Gilbert Basset and others, set fire upon Alkmundbury, a Towne belonging to Stephen de Segrave, the flames whereof were scene of the owner, being then with the King at Huntingdon. They also tooke prisoners upon the Welsh Marches, and according to the Law of VVarr (which, faith one, is lawlesse) did put them to their ransomes.

(46) Nothing had hitherto preferred the King more, than that hee could, without great griefe forgive any fauourites, if hee were merely preiudiced, the contrary quality whereof hath bene the cause of final delolation to so many Princes. For albeit the choice of Counsellors ought to bee free, yet by common intendment, they should bee good; or howsoever they are, or are not, it is madnesse to hazard a Crowne, or leese the loue of an whole Nation, rather then to relinquish or diminish a particular dependant. The rights of amity ought neuertheless to remaine inuolable, but in such distance, that the publike be not peruered, nor interrupted for a private. The King therefore, in this point not vnfortunate, commaunded Bishop Peter to betake himselfe to his residence at Winton, without once meddling in affaires of State; but against Peter Riualis his Treasurer, hee was so vehement, that hee swore, hee would plucke out his eyes, were it not for reuerence of holy Orders; commaunding also their Poitevins to depole the Realme, neuer to see his face more.

(47) Then are the Archbishop of Canterbury with the Bishops of Chester and Rochester sent into Wales to pacifie things there. But the inuincible Earle Marshall had now crost the Seas into Ireland, to take reuenge for the spoiles and disfigurements, which his hired enemies had made in his lands thereby whose plots, according to that secret agreement, hee was finally taken, and died of a wound giuen him in the backe, as hee with admirable manhood defended himselfe. His Body was buried in Kilkenny, (which pleasantly situated Towne our Sovereigne, King James erected into a City,) where himselfe in his life had appointed, in the Oratorie of the Minors: in which Towne, as yet some small tokens of this great name are remaining; for in the East window of the Abbey Church of S. John Baptist, and in the Abbey of S. Dominick, the ancient Armouries of Marshall, Lord of Kilkenny, are yet extant. The Patrimony of this Earle was shared by the Contractors according to the purport of the Letters patents; but when the King heard of his death, hee (to the wonder of all that were by) brake forth into teares, bewailing the losse of ioye braue a Knight, affirming that hee had left no Peere behind him in the Kingdome. A blessed King, faith Paris, to loue euen those who had offended him.

(48) The Archbishop of Canterbury with the other Bishops, repaired to the King at Gloucester, upon their returne from Leoline Prince of Wales, who pretended hee could not conclude, till the King had received into grace such of the banished Nobility, with whom himselfe had bene confederated during the late displeasures. The King hereupon moved with Pitié, sends forth his Proclamations, that all such as were outlawed or proscribed, should bee at Gloucester vpon a certaine day, there to be received into the Kings fauour againe, and to haue restitution of their inheritances; but left they might suspect any euill measure, it was ordered that they should bee in the Churches protection, and come vnder the safe-conduct of the Archbishoppe and the other Prelates. Thither at the time and place limited doth Hubert de Burge Earle of Kent (and lately chiefe Iusticiar of England) repaire; vpon whom, by mediation of the Bishops, the compassionate King looks graciously, receiving him in his Armes with the kisse of peace; in like sort was the Lord Gilbert Basset, and all others of that fellowship, received into fauour, their severall liuings and rights fully restored; and both Hubert and Basset admitted to bee of his Council. And, that nothing might bee wanting to make the ioy vniuersall; Gilbert, Brother to the late Earle Marshall, had the whole Earldome conferred vpon him with all the lands and rights thereof whereof, notwithstanding the foresaid treacherous conuoyance, whom also the King made Knight at Worcester, and deliuered into his hands the the Red of the Marshallship, according to the custom. Howbeit in all these points the King may seeme but to haue temporized (as thereto driven by ouerbearing inducements) or else greatly afterward to haue changed his iudgement, because hee openly at one time * called the said Richard a bloody Traitor, and caused this Gilbert to bee forcibly kept out of the Court vpon a Christmas day.

(49) Vpon this reconciliation the practise, by which the late great Marshall was destroyed, and his possessions dismembered, came to light; the copy of the letters, which had bene sent into Ireland, being by commandement of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, openly read in the presence of the King, the Prelates, Earles and Barons. It moued teares in all of them; the King with an Oath affirming that hee knew not the contents of the said letters, though by the vrging of the Bishoppe of Winchester, Riualis, Segraue, Passlew, with other of his Council, hee had caused his Seale to bee put vnto them. At the sound of Summons to make their severall appearances, the Malefactors take Sanctuary, the Bishop and Peter de Riualis in Winchester Church, Segraue in Leicester Abbey, Passlew in the new Temple, and others elsewhere. In the end, vpon the intercession of Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, who piously endeauoured to extinguish all occasions of further diffention in the Kingdome, and vnderooke they should haue a lawfull trial, the delinquents appeared at Westminster before the King, who * fate in person with his Iusticiars vpon the Bench. Peter de Riualis was first called (for the Bishop came not,) whom the King forth through with an angrie eye, saying; O thou Traitor, by thy wicked advice, I was dravne to set my Seale to these treacherous letters for the destruction of the Earle Marshall, the Contents whereof were to mee unknowne; and by thine and such like counsell, I banished my naturall Subjects, and turned their minds and hearts from me. By thy bad counsell, O thy Complices, I was moued to make warre vpon them to my irreparable losse, and the dishonour of my Realme, in which enterprise I wasted my treasure, and lost many wortheie persons, together with much of my royall respect. Therefore I exact of thee an account as well of my treasure, as of the custodies of wardes, together with many other profits and escheates belonging to my Crowne. Peter denying none of the accusations, but falling to the ground, thus besought him. My Sovereigne Lord and King, I haue bene nourished by you, and made rich in worldly substance, conformed not your own Creature, but as leastwise grant mee a time of deliberation, that I may render a competent reason for such points as I am charged with. Thou shalt (said the King) be carried to the Tower of London, there to deliberate till I am satisfied. He was so, Stephen de Segraue, the Lord Chiefe Iustice (whom the King also called most wicked Traitor) had time till Michaelmas to make his accounts, at the Archbishopps and other Bishops humble entreaty; and for other matters, hee shifted them off from himselfe, by laying the blame vpon such as were higher in place then hee: into whose office of Chiefe Iustice, Hugh de Pateshull is aduanced. The like euasion Robert Passlew had, by leaving the fault vpon Walter Bishoppe of Carlisle, who was about him in the Exchequer: and thus were these euill enormities reformed, not without reducing store of Coine to the King.

(50) As those continuall turmoiles, and plagues of the sword, much afflicted the land, so this was the third yere, wherein God inflicted also for sin, the plague of famine, whereby the poore did miserably perill, there being no Samaritan to pay for their harbouring, or to annoint their wounds with the oyle of consolation. Our Authors, to make manifest, how odious the mercilesse heart is in the sight of God, relate a storie of that time with protestation, that they doe it, left to memorabile an example should be in time forgotten. Certain poore, while as yet the Corne was greene, plucked the ears in the common fields, to sustaine their liues; whereupon the Owners call on the Priest, to curse all such as had so done: but one in their company adured the Priest in the name of God to exempt his corne from the sentence, saying, it pleased him well, that the poore driven with famine, had taken his corne, and so commended that which they had left to God. The Priest, compelled by importunity of the rest, was entred into the sentence, when by a terrible interrupting tempest of thunder, lightning, wind, haile, and raine, all the corne-fields about were defoliated, as if they had bene troden downe with Horfe and Cartes; that no kind of beast or fowle would feed vpon the corne thus laid. But (as say our Authors out of the Scripture) seeing * they who are piteous find mercy, that honest and compassionate hearted man, found all his corne and grounds (though interlaced with theirs,) altogether vntoucht and vnharmed. Whereupon (say they) it is more cleare then any light, that as glory to God on high is sung of Angels, so there is peace on Earth to men who are of goodwill. This dearch was in * France and Gascoigne as well as in England. A Jewish impiety may well be annexed to want of Christian Charity. There were brought before the King at Westminster Iewes, who circumcised a Child, and purposed in contempt of Christ and Christianity) to haue crucified him in Easter at Norwich.

(51) These now calmer times, were made more happy, by the marriage of the Emperour Fredericke with the Lady Isabel, the King of Englands sister, a beauteous young Lady about twenty yeeres of age. The messengers arrived in March with the Emperours letters, closed vnder a Seale of gold; and there were sent to conduct her ouer, the Archbishoppe of Colein, and the Duke of Louain. The King brought her to Sandwich with about three thousand horse in his traine; and being impartially furnished with all worldly abundance, shee tooke shipping in May, and in one dayes and one nights space arrived at Antwerpe, a City of the Empire, & was euery where most magnificently entertained; her sweet humility, and excellent beauty, drawing all to loue and honour her. At the solemnity of her * marriage were present three * Kings, eleven Dukes, thirty Marquesses & Earles, besides the number of great Prelates. On whether superstition, or obseruation, of the Emperour is noted at this marriage, that hee forbore the Emperresses company, till a certaine howre, which his Physicians or Astrologers had assigned, and in the morning hee caused her to bee carefully tended as a woman with child, and sent word to his brother the King of England, that hee should haue a sonne, so skilfull or confident hee was; and God did fauour his iudgement, for it proved so. This Imperiall affinity gaue a * worthy Historian occasion here to display and emblazon the Maiesty and glory of the English Princes; but amongst them all, none were higher aduanced then the Children of King John, one of whose sons was now a * King, the other afterward chosen to be an * Emperour, and one of his daughters a * Queen, this other (here mentioned) an * Emperresse. And here doth VVendouer end his history, to whom we haue hitherto bene beholding for his labours, forry wee can enioy his good company no longer.

(52) There were spread through England about this time certaine Romane VVrurs called * Caurfins, who had entangled the King himselfe, most of the great men, and all others as had to deale with the Court of Rome, in their cunning snares. Their first entrance into England was some few yeeres past, when the Pope requiring the * tenth of all moueable goods in England, Ireland and Wales, towards his wars against the Emperour Fredericke, sent Stephen his Nuncie hither to collect it, * who brought with him that race of deuouring Monsters vnder humane shape, called the * Popes Marchants, vnder colour of of supplying with money such as wanted present pay. The * Popes continually angariations and extortions, under colour also of the Turkish warres, kept these men (if men) still in vfe here in England, to the * extreme begging of infinite numbers, who were in-veigled (either by persuasion, or craving, or commanding, or committing, or excommunicating) to give way to the Popes insufferable extortions, all men wondering into what bottomlesse gulfe that huge Masse was put, which the Popes Factors had gathered. Wherewith all mens hearts were deeply wounded, for that all this unvaluable treasure never was imployed to any publike use, or honour of the Church. Roger Bishop of London (a learned and religious Prelate) burning with zeale of Christian charity, seeing the numbers and mischiefs of these execrable furers, thus still to encrease, first admonished them (whom he reputed no better then Schismatickes) to repent, and leave that wicked trade of life. But when he found them deafe to all aduise, armed with the weapons of spirituall iustice, he openly pronounceth them accursed, precislie commanding them to packe out of LONDON, WHICH TIL THAT TIME KNEW NOT WHAT SUCH A PLAGVE MEANT, lest his stocks should be infected therewith. But so Apostolicall and holie a remedie tooke not such effect as it deserved; for they swelling with pride and presumption on the Popes patronage, easily procured from the Court of Rome, that the oldfild Bishoppe should be peremptorily cited to appeare in the remote parts beyond the Sea, there to answer for that iniury which he had offered the Popes Merchants.

(53) The King being now in the best strength of his yeeres,ooke to wife the Ladie Elenor, second daughter of Raimund Earle of Prouince, which hee had by the daughter of Thomas Earle of Sanoy. A Ladie about twelue or thirteene yeeres of age, and altogether as beautifull and princely, as shee was young. Her father, by * reason of warres which hee had with the Citizens of Masilis his subiects (who vpon pretence they were oppressed, sought to driue him out of all his territories) was but a poore Prince. Neuerthelesse it was the happinesse of his foure daughters (whose Parentage adorned with rare beautie, and fashioned with excellently-vertuous education, made them fit Brides for any Princes in the world) that each of them had * a King to her Husband. The Eldest was married to Lewis the ninth King of France; Elenor to the King of England; Santia (or Cynthia) to Richard his brother King of Romans; Beatrice to Charles the French Kings brother, King of Sicilia. The Nuptials were accomplished at * Wesminster; where also shee was crowned Queene with incredible state and splendor, the King himselfe wearing his Crowne also. The Citizens of London are noted of much seruicable forwardnes and magnificence at this royall feast. The Citie was adorned with filkes, banners, Crownes, Pals, Tapers, Lamps, and with * certaine wonders of witt and strange shewes; the Citizens richly attired and well mounted, met the King on horsebacke. At the Nuptiall dinner, the Trumpets sounding before them, they came in, carrying three hundredth and threescore Cups of gold and siluer, to serue the King and that noble Company with wine, according to their duties at Coronations. The King had twice or thrice before attempted to marrie, but God ordained otherwise till now; and it was a match made principally after the manner of honest priuate persons, for loue; and not as heads of publike Bodies vfe to do, for seeming worldly strengths and profits. It was also begun and concluded without the priuie of the States. The Emperour soone after requested the King to send him his brother Richard, Earle of Cornwall, to make him Generall against the French, whereby the English also might recouer their right; but the Emperour was desired to choose any other; for him the States of his Realme, (which were assembled to consult thereupon) would not forgoe, because he was but young, and next heire to the Crowne, if the King should die without children. This answer was given to the Emperours Ambassadors at Merton neere London; where also the Statutes, called of Merton, were at the same time enacted.

(54) The humorous Lords began now againe to relapse into their wonted gyddinnesse, taking it in great indignity, that the King was so much ruled by his wises vncle, William de Waleria so much that the King withdrawing himselfe into the Tower of London, thither none of the Lords would come. Vpon better aduice therefore hee returns to his Palace; where some great Officers and others were put from the Prime Council and their places, not without the admiration of many. But the Bishop of Chichester, chosen Lord Chancellor in the Kings minority, being required by the King to deliuer vpon the scale, refused; alleging more stoutly then loyally, that as he had received it with the publike allowance of the Parliament, so without the same assent he would not resigne it. Which thwartings of his Peeres and Prelates, incited the King (it seemeth) to resume againe into his fauour some of those his Counsellors which he had formerly dis-couraged, as Peter de Rimalis, and Stephen de Segraue. But (whether on discontent hereof or no) Richard the Kings brother (whose seruice was formerly denied to the Emperour,) the Earles Marshall, Chester, * Lincolne, and Sarisbury with many other honourable Souldiers assumed the vow to fight in Palestine against Gods enemies, for accomplishment whereof they departed thither * the second yeere after. Meane-while the King to secure himselfe from dangers neerer home, trauals toward Torke to settle a peace betwene himselfe and Alexander King of Scots; who, the rather vpon Confidence of Leolin amitie, (which toward the English was but * shadowie and alwaies suspected) demanded Northumberland. Neuertheles by the wil-dome of friends, & moderation of both the Princes, they parted in peace, the King of England being else-where to lay out lands to a certaine * value, least he should dismember his kingdom by forgoing to great and necessary a frontier. The Scottish King claimed that County from King John, who by his deed enfeofed him thereof, as in portion with his daughter which King Alexander had married.

(55) Peter Bishop of Winchester (remoued formerly from Court by the working of the English Bishops and Lords) being crased and sicke in bodie returned about Michaelmas from forreine parts; soone after which (as if that Bishoppe had brought them with him) Paris notes, there ensued great raines, and extraordinary land-floods: Though * indeed he was a man of great wisdom, and dexterity in handling weightiest affaires: he also built sundrie Monasteries, and besides other his worthy deedes, he left his Bishopricke so furnished at his * death (a president which few of his successours haue followed) that there was not so much diminished of that which he found at his entrance, as the verie * Cattle which serued to draw the plough.

(56) The King whose treasures were exhausted with payment of his sisters portion (* thirtiethousand Markes) to the Emperour, and otherwise, called a Parliament at London, where he could not obtaine any * supplies from the States, but vpon * confirmation of the National Priuileges of England formerly granted, and vpon acceptance of the Earles of Warren and Ferrars, and John Fitz-Geoffrey into his most inward Councils; whom the King (merely enforced to satisfie his People) caused to sweare to giue faithfulfull Council, and to forswear all corruption or sale of Iustice; and finally hee conditioneth, to relie wholely vpon his naturall Subiects for aduise, leaving all oth vs. The money gathered (the leuerest and most mistrustfull point of all,) was not to be paid into the Eschequer, but to be deposited in some religious house, or fortress of euery Countie, to to bee expended in the genrell seruices of the Kingdom, as occasion required; so that if the king failed to performe his part, euery man should haue backe what hee had disbursed. One great and ordinary cause of waste, seemed now taken away, for that Leolin (who had * first taken homage of all his owne Barons) did * voluntarily yeeld to hold his whole Principality of the Kings of England, moued thereunto (though with much milke of the Wells) to strengthen himselfe against his son Griffin, who greatly infected him, being also assailed with a pallie.

(57) There is in Mathew Paris much complaint of the State of England at this time, which by the Kings flexibility (aith he) was becom the ordinarie prey, sometime of one sort of strangers, and sometime of another, Poitouins, Italians, Alemaings, and Provincos. Indeed the Genius, and common humour of a Nation, is not easily alterable: and our Misfortune (or hatred to Strangers) was no new quality, for * Horace noted it before or about Christs birth: and Englishmen can hardly see when they are well to keepe them so. But no kind of Strangers at that time more infected England (aith our * Monk) then the Romans, of which here swarmed three sorts, furers, which were the Popes Merchants, Italian Clerks, most vile and illiterate persons, which armed with the Popes Bulles possessed themselves (against all right of Priuileges) of spirituall reuenues, and if any withstood them, they were by the Popes owne warrant excommunicated; lastly, the * Farmers and Proctors for the Romans, who cunningly scraping together whatsoever was of price in the Land, sent it over Sea to the Italians, who there liued in deliciousnes on the Patrimony of him that was crucified, and in pride on other mens goods. Infomuch, that holy men with heart-breaking teares, and * deadly groines, professed it was better for them to die, then to see those miseries on their Nation and holy men. So that the daughter of Stien was become like an impudent Harlot. And as these Papall Engines dealt here in England, so did they with others * at Rome, the Gouernours of that Church not seeking to winne mens soules, but their money, oppressing the religious by punishments, vsuries, & Simonie, without any care of iustice and honesty, which made the Greece Church at this time to fall quite away, and oppose itselfe against the Romane. Doubtlesse England had no lesse cause so to doe, then had the Greekes; but as Pope Gregory knew that his onely way to keepe England fast, was to hold close with the King; so the King also saw no way to strengthen himselfe against his Barons, but by holding in with the Pope, though with so many insufferable mischiefs. And for some such purpose of the Kings, newly now arrived Cardinal Otto, the Popes Legate, greatly against the liking both of the Peeres, and of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, who not onely reprobated the King thereof, as of a thing dangerous to the Kingdom, but soone after also tooke his journey to Rome, to make some complaints, neither would he stay, though the Legate recalled him by his authority, which ener after caused much hatred betwixt them. Yet sundry good offices were at first performed by the Legate. The treatie of peace begun betwene the two Kings of England and Scotland at Torke, was again resumed in the same City, where Otto interposed himselfe toward making a finall agreement, which ensued. There were also assembled the Earles and Barons, who by the princely offices * of Alexander King of Scots, were reconciled to the King their Soueraigne, if this be the time which Boetius means, and not the next yeere. Otto had formerly accomplished many of them among themselves, whose diligences had emperiled the State of the Realme, so that for a time nothing but calme and amity appeared. Yet soone after they stormed to see the King so * addicted to the will of the Romans, especially the Legate, for which, Richard Earle of Cornwall reprobated him, as carrying himselfe more like the Popes Pensioner then a King. Notwithstanding the King was so proud of his State, that the Legate calling his * National Council, thither came from the King, John Earle of Lincolne, John Fitz-Geoffrey, & William de Kele a Canon of Pauls, to forbid the Legate on the behalfe of the King and Kingdom, not to attempt any thing against the Crowne or royall dignitie.

(58) Simon de Montfort (afterward created Earle of Leicester) had now wrought himselfe into such fauour, that the King with his owne hand secretlie gaue Elenor, (widow of the late William Marshall Earle of Pembroke) to him in marriage, notwithstanding that she had vowed herselfe a Nunne. When this was once knowne to Richard Earle of Cornwall; and the angry Lords, they all took such snuffe thereat; because they were not first consulted with, in regard the King had promised to doe no weighty matter without their, that none but Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent adhered to the forsaken King. The head of this defection was the Earle of Cornwall, of whom men generally had hope, that he would now free the Land from the miserable oppressions both of Romans and other Strangers. Him therefore the Legate vndertakes, but found him stiffe and vntractable at first. For when hee truly and fatherly told him: That if all the people of the land rose against the King, yet he being his own brother ought always to stand fast with him against the whole world, and not make himselfe Captain of the enemies, &c. The Earle roundly replied; * *That none ought to marraile, if hee being the onely Heire apparent, had a care of the Kingdomes state, when there was no treasure in the public coffers for defence thereof, thought hee were enuironed with enemies: That it was moreover wondered at, for so much as the King his brother did most stand in need of helpe; and good discretion, that he would not take example by such as were wise, as neither of the Emperour, who having married their sister, retained her with him, but sent backe all that attended her, not giuing to any of them either lands or money, although himselfe did abound in both; nor the example of the King of France, who tooke the same course though he married the eldest sister of the English Queene, &c. The Legate vpon these and many other shrewde sharpe speeches, take with him Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and deales with the King, who required time to answer; which the Lords granted, and met at London stronglie appointed vpon the day. There, while the quarrell hung in suspence, Simon de Montfort had with money, faire wordes, and much entreaty of Mediators, reconciled himselfe to the fierce young Eapley, and so also had John Earle of Lincolne, another marke of the publike enuie. This practice (which Earle Richard entertained without his Confederates priuity) had profitable effects; for the controlling Lords lost thereby their Generall, and hee greatly weakened himselfe in the opinion of the Lords and People; both which were points of aduantage and safety for the King. But Simon feeling himselfe as yet vpon no sure ground, left his wife with child at Kenilworth, not ceasing, till by the fauour of the Emperours letters and * excessive bribes, (by which iustice was overcome, and made captiue to the Roman avarice) hee had obtained at Rome a dispensation for that marriage, which yet was * doubted, whether it could bee lawfull, because shee had taken the * ring, though neither the habit of a Nunne, nor the uiale. Howsoeuer, the King did afterward sodainly breake with him, obiecting that Montfort had * first corrupted her, and hee to couer his Sisters shame, was content to giue her in Marriage.*

(59) While the King and his Queene abode at Woodstocke, a Traitor was apprehended, who vpon examination, confest that others had vowed the same, and that hee was sent out of Ireland from William the sonne of Geoffrey de Marisco (one of those Patentees, which hoped to share in the lands of Richard late Earle Marshall) to commit that * assistance upon him. This execrable wretch having become a Courtier, and one of the Kings * Knights, supposing to have found the King in his own retiring Bed, had about midnight gotten in at the Chamber window; but God (in whose special protection, the lives of Princes are) disappointed him, for the King was elsewhere in bed with his Queen. Nevertheless he gave not over, but with naked knife in hand, fought up and down in some other Chambers. One of the Queens * gentlewomen (sitting late and very devoutly at her booke by candle-light,) at sight of the furious villaine, with her shrieking noise wakened the Kings servants, who starting out of their Bed, laid hands upon him; & afterward he was drawne in peeces with horres at Courtence. And worthily: for as * a vulgar Chronicler hereupon saith truly, *in wounding and killing a Prince, the Traitor is guilty of homicide, of parricide, of * Christicide, nay of * Deicide.* William de Mareschall, who was said to be the instigator of this Treason, knowing his danger, became a Pyrate & fortified the Isle of Lundey in Severn, where he did much mischief, the situation of that little Island being * inexpugnable. At length he was surprised therein, and fixtence of his Complices, who all of them after conviction were put to death at London. William to the last gasped denying his privacy to the former treasonous attempt of killing the King. About the time of the Kings danger at Woodstocke, the Legate was in very little better case at Oxford, where being at first honourably by the University entertained in Ousney Abbey, the pride of his Romans there proved so intolerable, that a troupe of the younger Students, provoked therewith to arme themselves, not only flew the Legates owne brother, but would have done the like with the Legate himselfe, whom they termed an Vsurer, Symonist, Rent-raker, Money-thirster, perverter of the King, subverter of the Kingdom, enriching strangers with spoiles of the Englishs but hee lurking in the Belfrey, at midnight escaped over the river (not without danger of drowning) and fled to the King for his protection. For which outrage, the King lending the Earle of Warren with an armed band, * imprisoned about 30. of the offenders, and the Legate interdicted the University, till all the Bishops of England (purposely * meeting in a Synode) pleaded for the University, as being the second of Christendome: to whose importunity the proud Legate would not condescend, vntill all the Bishops would yield to goe on foot with the Students from Pauls Church to the Legates house, (which was about a mile,) who there unowned and unhad, should humbly crave absolution; which accordingly they performed.

(60) The Legate was (not long after) called home by the Pope, * upon notice of the scandall daylie given in England, by the unsatiable avarice of the Romanes; but by the earnest workings of the King, who feared lest his great ones would rise against him, hee was detained as a necessary cuill to establish the good of Peace. For it was in a manner taken up for a fashion among the Lords, to glorifie themselves with the senselesse multitude, by seditionously disparaging and taxing the Kings discretion and government, being farre too gentle and amiable for spirits so perverse and insolent; which might well force his louing nature, to seeke kindness and aduile among strangers, seeing he could not have it for any his deserts among the home-borne. A great reason why (perhaps) he did some few things rashly and passionately enough: it being a thing forceable to distemper a very wise man, to have so many imperious censors to obſcure his actions, and few to humble their abilities to obsequious services, all bearing themselves rather like Tutors or Controllers, than like Subjects or Counsellors. About which time, one William an ordinary Calumniator, and accuser of great men to the King, was for that impious practise condemned to die; though hee fought to peerce out his dayes by the helpe of new appeachments and false criminations; but that being discovered, he was hanged vpon a Gibbet in London. Now also the King beganne to smell out the vnderreife and false dealing of his beloued Legate, whose familiar friend (Peter Saracen) being taken Captiue by the Emperour, and to pay 10000 l. Sterling for his ransom; the shamelesse Legate counsell'd the king to bind himselfe and his Crown for that payment. Whereby the King perceiving what toiles were laid to entrap him, (the Romanes not caring what losse happened to the Kingdom, so they might be gainers) (wherein great rage, that it repented him he had euer admitted the Legate into the land, to dissipate the wealth thereof. But the Bishops of the land meeting in Council at London, to redresse the oppressions of the English Church, tolde the Legate flatly, that the Romanes importunity had so long exhausted their Church-goods, that they would no longer endure it. These English repentances seemed somewhat too late; but that prouidence which the King of Scotland (sooner after vied, was, as more tempestiue, so more commendable, when meeting the same Legate (for now into Scotland he is going to gather coine) he denied him entrance into his Kingdom, telling him, he was the first Legate which euer entred that Kingdom; yet by intreatie to saue the Legates credits, hee was permitted; first making a declaration, that his entrance should neuer goe for a President of any after; whereto the Legate should put his Seale at his departure; but hauing gotten what hee came for, hee disdainly stole away without leave of the King, and carried his writing with him. By all which vile and indigne vlagages, a man might thinke the Church of Rome did purposely strue to draw the hatred of all nations against her; especially, fith (as we shewed) the Greekes were fallen from the Roman union, so now the Church of Antioch had both excommunicated the Pope, the Church and Court of Rome, and challenged the Primacie above the Pope and the Roman Church, as being an ancienter See, wherein S. Peter first sate Bishop for seven yeeres, and more excellent and deare, fith there Peter lived with loue and reverence, whereas both he and Saint Paul were continually persecuted in Rome; which Church was now also defiled with Simonie, Vsurie, Auarice, and other heinous offences.

(61) But (doubtlesse) it was worthy of reproofe in the King; that after so manifold trials of faith and constancy in Hubert Earle of Kent, hee should now againe afflict his honourable old-age with reuival of accusations, when hee rather ought to haue tendered him as a Father. Among other the Articles (engines of vexation) which the King bent against him, these were 3. new ones, by which any reasonable man may takea scanning of the rest. 1. That Hubert had taken the money out of the barrels which were sent for the reliefe of Rachel and Poitou, and stuffed them with sand. 2. That to dissuade a great Lady from marriage with the King, he had said the King was a Quaint-eyed foole, a lewd man, and a kind of leper, deceitful, periuious, more faim-beated then a woman, only seruible to his owne friends; and utterly unfit for any faire or noble Ladies company. 3. That at Wadstocke, when the King was alone, hee rust in with a naked knife to murder him: Which and many other accusations the Earle did modestly and cleerely refute. But with the last (being most wicked of all) he was so greued, that making low obſequence to the King, he could not forbear to say, that hee was neuer importor to his father, nor to him, which by Gods grace hee would appear in the King: as if he should haue said, (quoth Paris) That if the Earle would haue become a Traitor, the King had neuer obtained the Crowne. This seemed to haue beene a publicke trial, vpon a Suit or Action of trespassse, brought against the Earle by the King in the Kings Bench, at which trial the King him-himselfe was also present. But howsoever the Earle answered, hee was condemned to glue to the King * foure his * dearest Castles, Blanch Castle, Grey mount in Wales, Skeneſfrith and Hasefeld; and then also (as it seemes) hee was * depriv'd of his Title of Earle.

(62) After so many mischiefs patiently brooked, at last the King vpon receipt of letters from the Emperour (whom as his brother in law, hee was loth to offend,) commanded Otho the Popes Legate, in regard of the great enmities betweene the Pope and Emperour, to depart out of England. There was also strait commandement given to the Italian Vsurers, to leaue the most * pure earth of his Realme (meaning that his owne people was most innocent and free from such a sinne,) but (saith * one, who durst write any thing he thought) by giuing the King money, which is too much used to iustifie the wicked, they for a great part remained still, as loth to forsake such fat pastures. And the Legat himselfe also staid so long, till the Pope by wily inducements and * forged calumnies had drawne the King, both to relinquish the Emperour his brother in law, and to suffer the Papal Excommunication to passe here against him, and money also to be gathered to his impeachment. A briefe taste of all the Popes proceedings against this glorious Emperour, we may take from the Nobilitie of France, who (when the Pope offered the Empire vnto Robert the French Kings brother) in their grand Council refused to accept it, charging the Pope with the spirit of audacious rafhnesse for deposing the Emperour, not convicted of any fault, and whom a General Councell only ought to censure, not the Pope, to whom no credit ought to be given, being his Capital Enemy. For that themselves knew he was a vicious and vitious Emperour, and one who had in him more religion then the Pope had. Our Legat Otho (who now at length is gone) was no sooner departed, but Peter of Savoy the Queens Vncle arrived, to who the King gave the Earldome of Richmond, and entertained other wise most magnificently. This and the like largesse to strangers, drew on the King much euill will, who also in fauour of his Queene, procured her Vncle Bonifacius to be chosen Archbishop of Canterbury in place of * Edmund, who weary of his life in England, by reason that he could not redresse the Popes detestable exactions and oppressions, made choise of a voluntarie Exile at Prouincey in France, where he died with the honour and opinion of a Saint.

(63) The Kings imploiments hitherto haue (almost wholly) been taken vp either in the impatientie of ciuill disturbances, or in the too-patient sufferance of some forraigne greouances, nourished within his Kingdom; which gaue him perhaps little leasure, minde, or meanes, to pursue any transmarine designe. But now better provided with money, then with men, (and yet not sufficiently with money) he takes shipp immediately after Easter towards Poitou, where the Earle of March (now husband to Queene Isabell his mother) expected his arriual. Hee committed the Government of the Realme in his absence to the Archbishop of York. Thirtie Hogheads or Barrels fraught with sterling money were shipt for that seruice. There also went with him Richard Earle of Cornwall, (who was returned with much honour out of the Holy-land not long before) and seauen other Earles with about three hundred Knights, besides other souldiers. Toresist the English, the King of France (who had giuen Poitou to his brother Alfonso) assembled an Armie royall of foure thousand men of Armes, excellently well appointed, and about twenty thousand choise Souldiers; with a thousand Carts to carrie their other necessities. King Henrie vnderstanding that the King of France lay before Frontenay, (a Castle belonging to the Earle of March,) seeking to force it by assaults, sent a messenger of defiance to him as a breaker of Truce. Lewis a most iust and valiant Prince, denied that euer hee brake the truce, but that the King of England by maintenance of his Rebels, did rather seeme to infringe the Peace. Neuertheless hee offered (so as the English would not protect his enemies the Earle of March and others) to giue him Poitou, and a great part of Normandy, in satisfaction of his * Fathers Oath; and moreover, to enlarge the last truce with a longer terme of yeeres. These so honourable, safe, and profitable conditions, by the practise of the Poiteuines (who feared the French Kings indignation would proue too heauie for them to beare, if the English abandoned their cause) were unfortunately refused.

(64) When the French King heard hereof, it repented him that he had humbled himselfe to farre; telling his Lords, that he neither feared his Cosen of England, nor all his forces, but only that Oath, (for restoring of the lands in France) which his father made when hee was in England. This scruple did trouble the Kings mind, on the behalfe of his dead Father, that hee would admit no comfort till one of his Lords told him, that the King of England, by putting Constantine Fitz-Arnold to death, for hauing spoken some words in honour of King Lewis (his Father) had first broken the truce. This satisfied the French. That whole businesse is thus concluded by * Tilius; Hugh Earle of March overcame with the pride and persuasions of his wife Isabel, would not doe homage to Alfonso the French Kings brother: for shee was a cause to draw the English thither, where things shruing on his part but meanly, Hugh is constrained in the end to doe both homage and fealty vnto Alfonso. This only must be added, that he did vnfaithfully provide for his priuate safety without the knowledge of the King of England, at such time as he * pretended otherwise.

(65) This treacherie lost the King all Poitou, for whereas he principally tooke care for money, presuming vpon the Earle for men, when it came to the point, the Earle was not only not provided, but swore by the throat of God, he neuer promised any such matter, and denied he had set his Seale to any writing concerning such promises, and that if any such sealed writing were (as the King and his brother the Earle of Cornwall affirmed) their mother his wife had forged it. They were now in sight of the French Host before Taillebourg in Xaintoing when this imprudent expostulation was made. The King of England manifestly seeing his perill, and hauing by his brother Earle Richards mediation (whom many of the French did greatly honour because he had by composition beene a meane at his arriual to free them from the Saracens in the holy-land,) raised his camp by night, and retreated with much more haile then good speed. Not long after this, the faire Citie of Xaintes in Xaintoing, vpon displeasure conceiued by the Cittizens against the King, because he had giuen the same to the Lord Hugh his halfe-brother (sonne to the Earle of March) first contriued a perfidious reuolt so close, that if first the said Lord Hugh, and then Guy de Lusignan his elder brother, had not in good time signified the danger, the King and all the English had been surprized by the French. There was none (among all the mutable Poiteuines) found respectiue of honor and loyalty, but only one called Hertold, Captaine of the famous Castle of Mirabell, who in great sorrow repaired to the King of England, praying counsell and assistance, where the King with a downcast looke gaue him this answer: Thou dost see (O Hertold) that my forces are scarce sufficient to defend my selfe. Our Lord and Saviour was betrayed by his Disciple Iudas, and therefore who shall be safe? Behold the Earle of March, whom I tooke and reuerenced as my Father, hath giuen a pernicious president. I haue trusted in a staffe of reed, and the splinters thereof haue wounded my hand. I am the only man who hath behaued thy selfe honestly: what soeuer therefore thou dost possesse of mine by any iust title, take it to thee as thine owne, I giue it thee: Provide otherwise wife for thy selfe, as thou dost thinke it most expedient. The King of France, in whom all magnanimities, bountie, and Christian vertues did shine, hearing what Herold had said and done, commended the man, and manner to highly, that, saying, He loved and allowed such as hee. The Castle was entrusted backe to the same Captaine, when with many teares and other signes of sorrowe, he had surrendered himselfe and it to Lewis. The farther prosecution of that warre was empeached by sicknesse and penurie which fore afflicted the French armie. An ouerture therefore for sue yeres truce being made, Lewis returned into France, and Henrie to his City of Burdeaux in Gascoigne, where his Queene Eleanor (who bare him Prince Edward about two yeres before) bare to him a daughter called Beatrix.

(66) Meane while the King looking carefulle into the double dealings of the Poitouins, who were the limitarie or border-subjects of the English dominions in Aquitaine, and by a nature proper to free March-men which lie between the hammer and the Anvill, are enured to all sorts of devices how to save themselves and delude others, wisely withdraws his large Pensions, which they by deep dissimulations and unprofitable shewes of assistance had shared among them, for which they repayed nothing but secret coffers of their Patron and Pay-master. The Earle of March whatsoeuer his Fees were from the King his Sonne in Law, made but an euill bargain in the end: for, besides that the French King tooke from him no small portion of his Estate, hee was openlie appeached of Treason in the French Court, by a valiant Knight, who offered to proue the truth of his accusation by Battell. Isabell, whom the French in passion called Isabell, because her pride and turbulent practises had procured all those evils, fled vpon the newes to a Nunnerie. In the end yet her husband being aged, by the diligence & care of friends auoided the Combat, and was suffered to returne home. The king (whose comming had bene long expected in England) hauing ordained one Sir Nicholas de Molis his Leifetenant in Aquitaine, is now vnder Saile, although the Gascoigne, because his presence was greatly beneficiall, had fought all the waies they could to detain him longer. Being returned, by reason of that vnadvised and losseful voyage into France, hee was compelled to be burthenous to his Subjects, aswell by the leuie of Escuage, as of loanes and otherwise. The Lewes also felt the gripe of his wants so farre, that euen Christians commiserated: whose gold hee receiued with his owne hands, but their siluer by others. These and other importunate corractions, were not made onely to fill vp such breaches as the French affaires had produced, but also to spend in entertainments and shewes.

(67) Neither will the Maiesty and honour of the Kingdome permit, that such kindes of expence should bee wanting, when publike occasions do require; in which respects they are not onely vifeful, but absolutely necessary, because Common-weales are partly founded vpon the opinion which Subjects and neighbours haue of their power and riches, and their estimate is commonly made by that which is outwardly seene at such times. This care, besides the great loue hee bare to his wiues kindred and Countreimen, made him puruey for money in this manner; for in December the Lady Beatrix Countesse of Prouince* mother to the Queenes of England and France, hauing with her the Lady Cincia, Cynthia, or Scientia (for by all those names shee is called in Authors) and a princely traine in all points excellently well furnished, landed at Dover, where innumerable of the best sorts gaue her welcome and attendance. London was hung with rich Ornaments, from the Bridge thereof to Westminster. This noble young Lady Cincia, was brought hitherto to be married to Richard the Kings brother

Earle of Cornwall: At whose Nuptiall feast, there were thirty thousand* Messes provided in the Cookery onely, and of all other things there was incredible plenty. All which notwithstanding did manifestly proue (as Paris saith most truly) that the world is but a very Iugler, and the pompe thereof but an idle shadow, seeing the next morning blew away the whole varietie of so great preparations like as if it had bene a Clowde. Nor much vnlike is the life euen of greatest Princes, which hangeth on very vntrusty termes, as Griffin, eldest brother of David Prince of Wales did find, when hoping by a chaine of Blankets, and such like stufte to escape out of the Tower of London, where the King had emprisoned him, the line breaking, hee pitcht vpon his head, which the weight of his great body draue (as it were) into his shoulders, and miserably slew him. The King therefore punishing the Keepers for their sloth, commanded that the Sonne of Griffin (prisoner with his father) should from thenceforth bee more narrowly watched. Not long after the which, David Prince of Wales prouoked by wronges, (chiefly done by the Earle of Hereford) invaded the English Marches, whom the Earles of Gloucester and Hereford, and other mighty men in those parts, hauing the Kings consent and assistance, did withstand, yet fighting but with variable fortune: It was Prince Davids purpose to haue freed himselfe from the obedience or tenure which hee had acknowledged to the Kings for which purpose hee exhibited his complaint to the Pope, pretending that the King of England compelled him vnjustly to hold his Principality and Lands of him. But the Kings credite, cause, and workings, easily overweighed the Prince of Wales, and preuailed.

(68) The States of the Realme were in those dayes nothing supple, when the King sought to handle them for money: for hee about this time labouring to draw some from them, vpon faithfull promise to keepe and obserue the liberties, vnto which hee had sworn at his Coronation, and whereof hee had granted his Charter, they beought him to remember, how often hee had wrong from his faithfull liege people (whom hee ought to cherish, not utterly empouerish) without performing his promise. That forthwith after the taking of Bedford, hee had Carrowage, that is, two shillings vpon euery Ploughland; the next yeere after, a fifteenth of all their Moucables: vpon his passage into Brittain, no small summes of money from the Prelates, Religious orders, Burgesses and Iewes: after his returne, hee had Escuage, that is, vpon euery Shield (or knights Fee) three markes: then a fortieth part of all their Moucables: within a while after a thirtieth part; By and by, for the marriage of the Lady Isabell to the Emperour, two Marks vpon euery Ploughland; at his Sonnes birth, hee by Prefents heaped vpon no small store of money. Again, when hee went into Gascoigne, hee raised almost infinite heapes of money from all sorts of Subjects: vpon his returne, where hee had bene deluded and dishonoured, hee heeded almost manner of Subjects. They now also (vnder the name of aide for the marriage of his eldest daughter) granted him vpon euery Knights Fee, which held of the King in chiefe, twenty shillings, the one halfe to bee paid at Easter, the other at Michaelmasse. But (say they) how well the King will keepe and fulfill his undertakings and promises, in requital of the past and present contributions, hee onely knowes to whom nothing is vnknowne. But such as trauelled to strengthen the Popes designs, with collections of money among the English Clergy, found a stern and constant opposition, not onely for that they were unwilling, but also for that the Emperour had written to the King in plaine phrase, that if hee suffered any such matter, hee would not faile in grievous sort to punish all the English hee could get, in reuenge of that partiality.

(69) About which time many feditious persons were in the Court of England, which * hoped that warre with Scotland would bring them this commodity, that the oppressions they did to the people should rest unpunished; for Lawes and Justice haue no place in time of battell. Their hope thus tooke beginning, Alexander King of Scots had married the Lady Mary, a goodly Gentlewoman daughter to the Lord Ingeirum de Cowie, who (as all Frenchmen) being a deadly enemy to the King of England, had laboured to weaken that strength of amity, which was between the two Kings of England and of Scots, as a point necessarie or profitable for the tranquillitie of France. Their hope thus had ending; the said Ingeirum by the stumbling of his horse in a Foord, being cast out of his Saddle, and pitcht into the depth of the riuer, while his foot hung fast in the stirrop, his sword at the same time falling out of his sheath, and running him through, did most strangely end his life by a triple death, with whom it seemed the humour of battell between the two sister-Nations likewise died: for not long after, (notwithstanding the great preparations on both sides) all quarrels were absolutely * concluded, with relation to such Articles as had been formerly made between them at Yorke. The King of England had with him five thousand horsemen most fairely armed and appointed; besides a most puissant number of seruicable men on foot. The Welshmen feared and expected that vpon this agreement, the King would turne all his forces against them; but hee knowing it needlesse to vie such numbers for that seruice, sent onely three hundred men of Armes, vnder the conduct of Sir Hubert Fitz-Matthew, to repress their attempts, but through their own rashnes, & the Welshmens valiance, hee and his people were with losse at that time scattered. The newes of this bad successe troubled the King needrely, for final remedy whereof, hee resolved to lead a full Arme thither. But when, to furnish this designe hee prayed more Subsidie of the States of his Realme, they with one voice and with one mind contradicted; though also his debts to Merchant-strangers for wines, and other necessities, were so many and so continually called for, as hee could scarce passe abroad without their clamors. Neuertheless, the newes which hee receyued out of Aquitaine, where his Senechal Nicholas de Molis had wonne the day in a battell against the King of Navarre, did somewhat mitigate the sorenesse of these ouerthwarts; and for replenishment of coffers, Robert Passellon so ordered the matter, by fining such as had encroched vpon the Kings Forests, that hee vnexpectedly beganne again to make them overflow.

(70) The great helps which the King found by the new supply of his Treasure, made him dayly consider, how to augment the same, and how to stoppe all vndue Outlets, by which it was ordinarily impaired. Vpon the departure of Outho the Popes Legate, who had well stuffed his owne and his Masters coffers, (and had no lesse filled the Peoples heartes with repinings, and their mouths with curses of him) there was some hope the Romish Horse-leaches would for a while haue left sucking the best iuyce of the land; but it proued otherwise, new Agents, Legats, & Factors, still comming ouer, as if England had bin a wel which could neuer be drawne drie, and Rome a bottomlesse gulfe which could neuer bee filled full. Whereupon, before this, the King writ his letters both to this Pope, and to his Predecessor Gregory 9. desiring them to successe from this afflicting England with their exactions; but neither one nor other of them would vouchsafe to bridle their owne wilfull motions, as if God and Saint Peter (whose steps they follow) had euen bent their bowes against that Church of Rome. With which contempt the King had the more reason to bee incensed, because the Pope had endea-uoured to free David Prince of Wales from his homage made to King Henry, pretending that if it were done by force or force, it was of no force but utterlie void. Notwithstanding the Pope seeing the King and State resolved to the contrary, was delicious not onely to hold fast the Kings good-will, but also to come into England, to which purpose hee caused his Cardinals to write their perswasory letters to the King, as a thing tending much to his safety, and to his Kingdomes immortal glory, to enjoy the Lords Popes presence, who did long to see the delicacies of Westminster, and the riches of London: but the kings Council told him, that the Romans rapines and Simonies had enough stained Englands purity, though the Pope himselfe came not personally to spoile & prey vpon the wealth of this Church and Kingdome. The like denial of entrance hee had found both in France and Arragon, it being said, that the Pope was but like a mouse in a sack, or a snake in ones bosome, who did but ill-repay their Hostes for their lodging, & the infamies of the Popes Court defured no other whole filth (saith our Monk) sent forth a stench & stench as hee as the very Clouds. The Pope, though hee could not come himselfe, yet hee had his pipes & conductors to conuay this stench into this land, and the wealth of it backe in lieu thereof. Which was now so fauoured by his Chaplaine Martin, that certaine of the Peeres commiserating the incessant depredation of the land, tooke order for strict watch at all the Ports in England, that all letters comming dayly from the Pope to picke men purses, should be stoppt. But soone after a more general redresse was intended against so vnmercifull tyranny: the King finding by diligent inquirie in every Shire that the annuall revenues here, where with the Court of Rome had fraudulently and violently enriched Italians, amounted to three score thousand Markes, to the great both wonder and anger of the King; which made him now beginne to desire the insatiable greedinesse of the Court of Rome. Hereupon, for that the Pope had now summoned a Generall Councell at Lyons, Embassadors were thither sent, there publickly in the name of the whole Kingdome, both to complaine and crave redresse of the Popes too long suffered extortions, (which were particularly there rehearsed, and which as being detestable to God and man, they would no longer endure); and to disauow all subiection vnjustly pretended from King John, as whereunto both the then Archbisshoppe openly contradicted, and the Nobles and State neuer consented nor would. The Pope (as shamed belike to bee so taxed in so great an assembly) is noted to haue sat long silent, not so much as lifting up his eyes from the ground, till at length hee cut off their importunity with this briefe answer, that so difficult a matter would aske longer deliberation; which vaine delay so enraged Earle Bigod, and the rest of the Kings Agents, that with threats and terrible oaths, they sware to remedy that themselves, which the Pope would not. And indeed the Nobles at home had already begunne so to doe; hauing commanded Martin (the Popes Agent) to depart out of hand, for if hee stayed, hee and all his company should bee cut in peeces; who presently packing away, (the King also wishing the Diuells to take him, hauing thus preyed vpon his land) so enraged the Pope with tidings of this vllage, that his Holinesse said; it is high time that we make a quick end with the Emperour, that so we may crush these petty Kings (meaning the English and French, who both denied him entrance into their land) who burne against vs; for the great Dragon being once crushed, those lesser poore snakes will soone bee troden under.

(71) The Welsh affaires by reason of the casuall death of Fitz-Matthew growing daily less tractable then other, the King againe prepares to repress their insolencies in person. Before hee sets forward, hee came into London to the Church of Saint Paul, to the intent that before his departure hee might take his leaue of the Citizens in a popular and louing manner. And because neither warre nor uertered to aliens, and our houses to strangers. The matter seemed the more grievous, for that their pride and violence were intolerable. About this time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken vp in England by the King, in his grants and other writings, as * Non obstante priore mandato, Non obstante antiqua libertate, &c. This our ancient Author calls an odious and detestable clause; and Roger de Thurkelby Iusticiarius, fetching a deepe sigh at the sight thereof, cried out both of the times and it, saying, * it was a streame deriued from that sulphureous fountain of the Clergie.

(78) Another of the Kings Iusticiars, and a learned Knight, Sir Henry de Bath, (whose Lady, because herselfe was well descended, filled him with pride,) was so confidently greedy, the better to satisfie her ambition, that in one circuit, hee appropriated to himselfe about two hundred pound lands. Corruption in Iustice (which must needs be suspected to be there, where excoessive wealth is gotten by the Officers of Iustice) is but a fandie ground-woke of a vainly-hoped greatness, and may well be reeputed in the number of crying finnes; and this moued a Knight, Sir Philip de Arey, to appeach him before the King, both for vnfaithfulness in his office, and treason against the King. The King had no hold of himselfe, after hee was once thoroughly kindled. Bath knows it, and therefore writes to his wifes friends to come strong in his defence, that the King should not dare to call him to his triall; yet withall hee seekes all secret meanes how to appease the King, who vnderstanding of this combination, was the more enflamed. The Earle of Cornwall his brother could not appease him; no, not though hee knit vp his intercessions with these minatorie words; Wee must not forsake Gentlemen in their right, nor in preferring the peace of the tottering Kingdome. In March there was holden a Parliament at London; there the King caused Bath to bee sharply prosecuted. Thither Sir Henry Bath repairs, strongly attended with Knights and Gentlemen of his owne friends, and his wifes, to daunt the edge of Iustice, which hee desferedly feared. The accusations were many, (for all me were called to say what they could against him,) and among all, these two, most hainous: that he troubled the whole Realme, and stirred all the Barons thereof against the King, so that a generall rebellion was to be feared, (which one of his fellow-Iusticiars did openly testify); that hee had for reward discharged a committed Malefactor out of prison without punishment, in preiudice of the King, and to the perill of his associate Iusticiars. The King was so enraged herewith, that seeing no other way to punish him, being so strongly backed, hee mounted into an higher place then before, and cries out, Whoso-uer kills Henrie de Bath shall bee quit of his death, and I here doe acquit him; and presently departs. Neuer-theless, although hee left behind him many men, who would have readily executed the Kings terrible doome; yet by the widome of Sir John Mansel, (one of the Kings priuate Councillors) they were restrained. His wordes are worthy to bee remembered; *Gentlemen and friends, it is not necessary for vs to put that presently in execution which the King hath in his anger commanded. It may bee when his wrath is ouerblowne, hee will bee farye hee said it. Moreover, if any outrage be done to Bath, hee here are his friends who will take all sorts of reuenge. Sir Henry elcaping thus from so present a danger, found meanes vpon promise of money and great mediation of friends, to obtain his peace & safety; for at this time, Iustice and all things grew saleable. The North-East part of Wales was committed to Alan de Zouch, who had it in Farme for cleuen hundred Marks yearly, whereras John de Gray (whom hee supplanted in the place) paid but five hundred; so * *miserable Wales was let out to such as would giue most.

(79) Alexander the third, succeeding his Father in the Kingdome of Scotland, comming in Christmas to Yorke, there espoused, though very young, the Lady Margaret, daughter to King Henry. There were present the two Kings in person, with a most choyce multitude of either Nation, the English being in number about a thousand Knights, beside greater States, as Prelates, Earles and Barons, and of the Scots about fixe hundred Knights and Gentlemen, all of them well appointed. There was also two Queenes, the Mother of the Bride, (who was to be Queene) and the widow or Queen Dowager of Scotland, who for that cause was returned out of France, attended vpon in royall manner with many Lords and Gentlemen of France. The Scots were lodged in one place of the City by them felus. Vpon Christmas day the King of England gaue the order of Knight-hood to the King of Scots, and at the same time to twenty others richly apparrelled. Vpon the next day the princely couple were espoused. Take a cantling of the cheere and multitude of guests by this. The Archbishoppe of Yorke, who was Prince (as it were) of the Northerne parts, and the common host of all that most noble fellowshippe, which cost him about foure thousand marks) gaue toward that feast six hundred fat oxen, all which were spent in the first generall seruice; and whatsoeuer the vaine Stage-play of the world might afford eyther for pompe or delight, was there all enjoyed. More worthy to bee remembered, then that magnificent gluttonie, (the natural vice of these our Nations) was the orderly and no childlike action of the young Bridegrome, in reconciling Philip Louell (whom King Henry had lately fined and discounted for taking Bribes) to the King his Lord. K.

Alexander vndertaking the businesse, and finding a fitt time, presents himselfe to the King of England vpon his knees, holding vp his hands, neither would hee rise, though earnestly requested, but with a gesture which seemed to draw teares of ioy and loue from the eyes of such as * face round about, prosecuting his intent, saith; My Lord King, your Majesty knowes, that though I my selfe am a king, and through your goodnesse honored with the girde of Knight-hood, yet that I am withall both a Child, as well in age as in knowledge, and also an Orphan, my father being dead, and my mother leaving me, though at your sending for, she is now pleased to bee present; therefore from henceforth, and for euer after, I here doe take you, both for Father and Mother, that you may supply both their wants, and with your paternall care be-protect all mine insufficiencies. The King scarce able to refrain from tender teares, or to hold down his throbblings, said no more but only this one word, Willingly. The princely Child replied therupon: I will make experiment of that, and know it by proofes; seeing you have graciously heard mee hitherto, in trying whether I shall reape the effect of my first suit.
Then hee declared his request, and had it; so that Louell was afterward Treasurer.

(80) The State and fidelity of the Gascoignes was so desperately shaken and plunged by the re-uenges which Simon de Montfort (to whom the king had giuen the government of their Country for sixe yeeres,) had exercised vpon them, for that they had accused him to the King of tyrannous & proditorious dealing, and affirmed that his name ought rather to bee Simon then Simon, that but for the venter of their wines, (in which respect their subjection to England was verie beneficiall to their Common-weale) it was thought they would generally have revolted. But the King though readie thus to leese Gascoigne, would yet needs hope to obtaine Normandie, and his other lands in France without blowes. The King of France (whose conscience was wonderfully tender and sincere) had indeed written out of Palestine to that purpose, as thinking King Henries title was better then his owne; but the French, among whom their Kings for money released those who should have aided him,) had brought him into lesse regard then his excellent vertues merited, did vnmercifully and constantly refuse, adding, that before the King of England should haue any more land among them, hee must passe through a thousand sharpe Lances, and a thousand blowdy Swords when the Lances were burst. On the other side, the King of England was but in little credit with his people: for, whereas (by an agreement betwene the Pope and him,) the Tenth of the Clergie through England during three yeeres should haue bene receiued toward his charges in his pretended iourney to the Holy-Land, yet in a generall assembly at Westminster very few were drawne to giue their names to that seruice, notwithstanding that two Bishops and the Abbot of Westminster laboured in their Sermons all they could to stirre the people to that martiall Pilgrimage, and though the King himselfe in all their view took a most tolemon or, that within three yeere he would set forward; the onlie reason of their vnwill-ingnes growing vpon suspition, that hee onely sought (as the Pope had giuen him example) to draw by this colour the treasure of the Realme into his hands.

This their diffidence of sinceritie in him, made him rather incline to foster and fauour strangers, & that with a kind of periuicacie, though himselfe by manifold neglects of his word, had worthilie bred that diffidence.

(81) The King could more hardlie find followers in such an enterprise, for that his people had no conceit of his valour, but said: What reason encoura-geth him, who was neuer trained vp in Marshall discipline, nor hath managed an horse, nor drawn a sword, nor charged a staffe, nor shooke a Target, to hope for a triumph over the Sarazens, against whom the Chenevalrie of France hath misfarrid? or wherefore dreames hee of recovery of more land, who could not keepe that which hee had in forraine parts? concluding, that he was a man onely borne to draine their purses, to empty his own, and to multiplie debts. This was the opinion of men, & behind his backe; but not onely of men, for Isabel Countesse of Arundel, widow of Henry Earle of Arundel, a young Lady receiuing the repulse at the Kings hands in a matter which hee alledged to be hers in equity, durst say thus to his face: *O my Lord King, why doe you turne away from Iustice? we cannot now obtaine that which is right in your Court; you are placed as a mean between God and vs, but you neither gouerne vs, nor your selfe, neither dread you to vex the Church diuinely, as it hath not onely felt in present, but often heretofore. Moreover you doubt not manifestlie to afflict the Nobles of the Kingdome. The King fir-red at so free a speech, with a scornfull and angry countenance, answered with a loud voice; *O my Lady Countesse? What? haue the Lords of England, because you haue tongue at will, made a Charter, and hyred you to bee their Orator and Advocate? where-vnto the Countesse replied: Not so my Lord, for they haue made to mee no Charter, but that Charter which your Father made, and which your selfe confirmed, swearing to keepe the same inuolubly and constantly, and often extorting money vpon promise that the Liberties therein contained should be faithfully obserued, you haue not kept, but without regard to honour or conscience broken. Therefore are you found to be a manifest violator of your faith and oath. For where are the Liberties of England so often fairly engrossed in writing? so often granted? so often bought? I therefore though a woman, and all the naturalloyall people of the Land, appeale against you to the Tribunal of the fearefull Iudge, and Heaven and Earth shall beare vs wit-nesse, that wee are used vnjustly, and God the Lord of reuenges right vs. The King abashed at these words asked her, if shee did not looke to obtaine her suite vpon fauour, in regard shee was his Kinswoman? wherevnto shee answered: *That seeing hee had demid that which the Law gaue, how could shee hope to obtaine her suit by fauour? Therefore (saide shee) I doe appeale to the presence of Christ, against also the your Connectors, who bewitch and dull your iudgement, and draw you out of the path of truth, gaping onely after their owne commodity. But the King (saith Paris) remained incorrigible, and the Lady lost both her charges, hopes and trauell.

(82) Thus harsh were the former yeeres to the King and Kingdome: let vs see what more gentle or rougher accidents rise vnto vs in the next. But it then the first little better appeares, for the King hauing bought out the time which Simon de Mont-fort had in the government of Gascoigne (which now he giues to Prince Edward) was truly aduertised, that Gualtero de Biard was turned Spaniard, and labored by all the meanes hee could to plucke that part from the English obedience. Alfonso K. of Spaine, claimed the same by vertue of a Charter made ther-of by Henry the second, confirmed by Richard and John Kings of England. Simon Earle of Leicester thus displaced, to let the world see that hee would not for any preferment incur the suspition of disloyalty, refused most honorable offers, which, (after the death of Lady Blanch, Queene Dowager, and Redrix of France,) the French Nobility made him, if hee would with his counsell and Force helpe to sustaine that Monarchie, while Lewis their king was absent. In the meane time the king of England (all old matters being buried in obliuion, vpon hope of future amendment) for aduancement of his mar-tiall Pilgrimage had large aides granted him in Parliament; but vpon condition that hee should now at last, once for all, submit himselfe to gouerne by a Law, not at his pleasure, confirming the Charters of Liberties, against the breakers whereof a most solemne curfe was pronounced by the kings assent.
The Archbishoppe, Bishoppes, and the rest of the Prelates pontifically apparelled, pronounced that curfe with Tapers burning, which when they had throwne away vpon the pavement, where they lay extinguished and smoking, the King (hauing laid his hand on his breast all the while,) Iware to keepe all Liberties vpon pain of that execratory sentence, as he was a Man, a Christian, a Knight, and a King anointed and crowned. The businesse of Gascoigne foone after called him to a neerer warre, whether vpon his promise made to the Gascoignes, hee set faile, leaving his sonne Prince Edward, and his kingdome to the government of his Brother, the Earle of Cornwall, and the Queene his wife: his arrival there gi-uing a light and stay to all the affaires therof. Such Holds as held against him hee reduced to obedience, but with too faulty a Clemency sparing most open Traitors, whereas if an Englishman had offended, hee was sure to smart for it, and that rather more then lesse.

(83) His feare now was, lest the Gascoignes should draw in the Spaniards, and relinquish his Soueraignty.
To prevent this, hee verie prudently and reasonably sent Ambassadors to Alfonso King of Spain and Castile, to desire that the Lady Elianor his sister, might be giuen in marriage to Prince Edward.
The motion was well approued, and besides that they brought Letters Patents from the King of Spaine, in which, among all other Clauses it was contained, that the King of Spaine did quit his claime and whole right, which by vertue of any Grants from Henry, Richard and John Kings of England, hee had, or ought to haue. Herevpon hee sends both for his Sonne (whom the king of Spaine desired might be conuayed to him, onely with a noble intent to see and doe him honour) and for his wife the Queene.
Among other Acts of sinceritie and loue, Alfonso sent to the King of England good aduise: that, after the example of good Kings and Princes, hee should be a Lambe toward his Subiects, and Seruitours, and a Lion to Aliens and Rebels. Simon Earle of Leicester with a gallant Troupe of Souldiers offered his seruice to the King, who admiring the Earles charity, receiued him with all ioy possible: at which reconciliation the Gascognes who feared him like lightning, were so appalled, that they came dropping in, and became good Subjects. That valorous Earle was thereunto moued by that great, free, and noble Prelate, Robert Grosseteste, called the Maule of the Romans, as being a great curbein those dayes of the Popes vngodly courtes towards his State of England: against which hee writ a famous letter to his Holinesse, learnedlie prouing, that his detestable, abominable, soule-murdering actions, did euince him to be an Heretike, worthy of death, to be Antichrist, and to sit in the Chaire of pestilence, as next to Lucifer himselfe, and that he had no power to excommunicate such as resisted those his actions. With which Catholike Letter, the Pope was besides himselfe for rage, swearing by Saint Peter and Saint Paul, that he could find in his heart to make that dotting Prelate a mirror of confusion to all the world for his sawynesse. But some wiser Cardinals aduised him from any sharper course against him; telling the Pope that all was true he said of their Courts abuses; that he was holier then any of themselves, and one who had no Peere amongst all other Prelates for sanctity or learning; and therefore it were best to hush the matter, for feare of stirring coales, especially sith it was knowne, that at length there would be a departure from their Church. This noble Prelate dyed this very yeare, with opinion of a Saint (in despite of the Pope, who would haue had his bones throwne out of the Church) leaving this Prophecie farewell to his verie last gasses, that the Church would neuer be set free from such her Egyptian seruitude, but by the dint of bloudy sword.

(84) Soone after the Queenes arriuing in Gascogne, when all things were rightly prepared, Prince Edward was thence sent into Spain, where, at the City of Burgos hee married the Lady Eleanor, sister to the King with great honour, hauing first receiued Knight-hood at his hand; which done, hee returns with his Bride to Burdeaux, from whence they all together came safe through France into England. What treasure this noble young Princeesse brought in portion to her husband, wee cannot say; but the King forthwith gaue his sonne Gascogne, Ireland, Wales, Brislow, Stanford, and Grantham. He had drawne vpon himselfe a debt, in this and other his actions of about three hundred thousand Marks; the King of France being not long before returned from the Holy-Land, gaue them both safe-conduct in their passage, and did to him, & his whole noble company all the honor which the wit of man, or the most goodly kingdom of France could afford. There were at Paris in this entertainment Beatrice the Countesse of Provence, and foure Queenes her Daughters. The King of England had in his owne Household traine, a thousand choice & excellent horse, beside Carriages, Sumpters, and Couriers. Hee was lodged in the Pallace of the olde Temple, being an house almost capable of an Armie, where the next morning hee commanded that all sorts of poore should be relieued with his charity and Almes. The magnificence of the great Feast of the Kings, at the King of England charge, shall be expressed in our Authors owne words, who is bold to affirme, that Affuerus, Arthure, Charles the Great, had neuer any such. After dinner, the King sent to the French Lords, and men of Armes, Plate, Buckles of Gold, and other royall presents. The King of England late at the Table on the right hand of the French King, and the King of Nauarre on the left. But the French King contended much in curtesie to the contrary; till K. Henry obstinately refused saying, the King of France was his Lord, & should be for there was reason, meaning, because hee held his Lands in France of him. To whom the most iust and gracious King Lewis with a soft voice answered; Would to God every one had his right without offence, meaning such other lands as the English Crowne had right vnto. At another time he gaue the reason, why the Peeres of France would not consent to the restitution of Normandy, for that the Normans would neuer learne to keepe their Borders in quiet. The English King did to himselfe, and to the English name great honour, in his whole behaviour and carriage, which was full of charity towards the poore (a vertue for which in those dayes Kings chiefly sought to be commended) of Majesty, Magnificence, and all sorts of royall liberality and gentleness. The King and Court of France brought him an whole daies iourney vpon the way. He staid a while at Boislogne for a wind, but returned safe, hauing peaceably measured a way through France, out of Gascogne, which his martiall Nephews kings of England trode afterward in another manner, drawing lines of bloud and fire ouer all France, the most pleasant, rich, and spacious realm of Christendome.

(85) Eleanor Prince Edwards wife landed at Douer in great State. On the other side, Edmund the Kings second sonne, by a King, which the Pope sent (to engage King Henry in his warres against Manfredus, the sonne of the late Emperour Fredericke) was solemnly inuected in the kingdom of Sicilie. The Ambassador was a Bishoppe, who forthwith departed, for indeed his errand was in few glorious, but in truth both delusory and vnprofitable, allwell because the King had already vnreasonably interested himselfe in this quarrell, (the Pope hauing changed his vow against the Turkes, into this against Christians,) asallo, for that the Roman Armie which (by the Popes fetches) warred most at his charge, was (notwithstanding the Popes blessings) vtterly ouerthrowne, before this airy honour could be setled in the Lord Edmund, whom yet his Father (whose credulity the Pope for his owne ends had shamefully inuigiled, by drawing him into obligations of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds) openly teamed and vfed as the King of Sicily, (for which also he vfed this annexed Seale) highly pleasing himself in the varietie of a wastfull Title to his owne, and his whole Kingdomes extreme impoverishment.

(86) The Calamities of the Kingdome in these exhaustings, was the more lamentable, because they were countenanced by the King, who should haue repelled them. But the Pope hauing no so easie way to be supplied as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King were well accorded to grinde the people each for the others vses; the King to satisfie the Popes Auarice; the Pope to aduance the Kings Ambition. The gayning of the Kingdome of Sicilie must be the colour, for which the King was resolu'd to goe in person; and therefore Rufandus (the Popes Agent) sent to gather the Tenth of all England, Scotland and Ireland, for the Popes vse and the kings, indifferently, had called called a great Councel the former yeere, and adioyned it till this; where he also required all the Prelates to binde themselves to the Popes marchants, as hauing receiued of them a great sum of money, which was imploied to the vse of their Churches. At which guilefull and vntre deuse the Prelates replied they would rather die then suffer such oppression, and that they held it a manifest Martyrdom to die in such a cause, then was the death of Thomas Becket. The Nobles also peremptorily refused either to recouer Sticlie, or to beare the charge thereof, being both impossible; the one for the strength of Manfredus, the other for the present pouertie of England. And indeed soone after the Pope and Manfred were made friends, and so King Henry and King Edmund beguiled one of his great expences, the other of his high hopes. The King was herewith wakened out of a sweet dreame wherein till then he continued, feeding his minde with the hope to leaue to either of his sons a kingdom; though neither so he rested quiet till he had almost throwne the Crowne into the gulphes of irrecoverable debts and vsurie. The young King of Scots and his Queene, about this time came into England to visite their best friends, the King and Queene of this Kingdome, which lay wholly open to their honor and vses. The King to let his sonne in law see how welcome he was, did bestow vpon him the Earldome of Huntingdon; They and their Queenes with almost all the great Lords and Ladies of England met at Woodstocke by Oxford, from whence they came to London. The King was vnwilling to denie his sonne in law and daughter any thing, for at their earnest suite he pardoned Sir William de Lile, Knight Sheriffe of Northamptonshire, who was proued to haue practised by most foule suborned treacherie to spoile another Gentleman of his estate: for which the said Lile had died a shameful, but a worthy death, by drawing and hanging, had not his wifes teares and prayers made the King and Queene of Scots their intercessors. Thus the young Prince returned into Scotland, worthily well contented.

(87) The King much the fresher to vndergoe serious affaires, by reason of the late comfort he had in his Childe the Queene of Scots, bestirres himselfe, and comes in person into the Exchequer among the Barons thereof, when the Court was set, and made sharpe orders against all Sheriffs and Baylies of Towns incorporate, who did not yeerely appeare at the Exchequer, to pay such money of the Kings as was come to their hands. At the same time all the Sheriffs of England were amerced, because they had not disretained all those which had such estates in land, as the law limitch to take the order of Knight-hood, or pay their fines. Which of the Lords could say now, that the King would not proue a good husband? Howbeit the case of the people seemed nothing releued, for (saith Paris) there were so many petty Tyrants by the negligence or conuience of one, that the ancient State of England, when it had many Kings, seemed to be brought in againe.

trety horsemen, and many more on foot, tooke a solemne Oath, that they would stand together for their libertie and ancient lawes, holding it better to die with honour, then to live a wretched life in shame and seruitude. And indeed they did great things vnder Prince Llewelyn ap Gruffyth, by whose meates they valiantly recovered all the Inland-countrie of North Wales, with other places; and in one fight slew about two thousand Englishmen, and draue the rest out of the field. They also spoiled the land to the very gates of Chester. This they had the greater opportunitie to doe, for that the King, while he built Kingdomes in the Clouds, and plunged himself into the Abysses of Vsury, suffered some few, his sonne, his brother, the Earle of Glocester, and his halfe-brothers with their families to trample right and reason vnder foot, and with his hatred to enrich themselves, his owne meanes daily confuming, and mens mindes more and more alienated from him, as men that despaired of redresse and iustice. The Welth also persisting in their enterprise, made Prince Edward retire in a bataille, and he complaining to his Father, had no other comfort but this: what is that to me? the land is thine of my gift. Put forth thy strengths at first, and get honour in thy youth, that from thenceforth thy enemies may stand in feare of thee. As for me I haue somewhat else to doe.

(89) The greatest worldly forrein honour that (since Constantine) euer fell vpon anie English subiect, was at this time, in regard both of his birth and riches, deriued and tendred to Richard, Earle of Cornwall, brother to the King, to whom was sent an honorable Ambassage out of Germanie, who, in humble manner declared, that the Princes of the sacred Roman Empire had elected him King of Romans, beseeching him to accept of that their common choise. In testimonie whereof the Archbishop of Colen, high Chancellor of the Empire, Prince Elector, and other great Lords of Almaine had sent their writings vnder seale, affirming, I hat neuer was anie one with so generall consent and vniuersall good liking elected to that place as he, his name carrying it clearly without anie contradiction among them. Vpon receipt of this most honourable inuitation and offer, there was much debate in the Chappell where they fate vpon the Earles behalfe, whether he should accept thereof or no; but while all of the stood in doubt the king puts in a deciding voice, saying: Left my brother be thought saint haried, my opinion & request is, that he wold not refuse to accept this honor, which God & man haue redered vnto him. This made the Squadron of the negatiues to giue way, and at leastwise to become Neutrals, till all objections were answered, as they were all of them by one or other, concluding in their speeches to the Earle; I hat hee should be warned, and withall stirred up to the seruice of God, in acceptance of this highest place, by the example of Robert Curthoise Duke of Normandie (eldest sonne of William the first, King of England) to whom the Kingdome of Ierusalem, for the intent to rule the inheritance of Christ, was offered, which he refusing to accept, did afterward feeble the grievous wrath of God, and neuer had happy daies after. To these and many other reasons, the King, his halfe brothers, and speciallie the Elect of Winchester encouraged him with one voice, affirming that this honour would exalt the English name for euer: The Earle therefore putting on the man with a free and cheerefull voice answered: And I relying vpon the goodness of Almighty God, though I am insufficient, & unworthy, to auoid the note of faintnesse, doe thankfully accept this burthen and honour, which Heauen (I hope) hath put into my hands. And then turning himselfe to the Bishops who were present, among which Richard Bishop of Bangor (from whose mouth our author wrote those things) was one, hee concluded and said: Let mee before I depart out of this Chappell, die, and suddenly be burnt with the fire of Hell, if I doe accept thereof either for ambition, or avarice; but onlie to restore the Empire (which God grant)

The high and noble nobility of the Welth.

(90) In the meane time, while his brothers royall preparations were in hand, the King being for a weekes space at the Abbey of S. Albans, certaine matters of Oxford brought a great complaint against the Bishop of Lincoln, for some encroachments vpon the ancient liberties of that Vniuersitie, to whom the King was gracious, and assigned a day; & Matthew Paris, whom the King in honor of his learned paines, admitted euery day to his table, and Chamber, said to him vpon this Complaint;
* My Liege, for Gods lone haue a care of the fishen State of the Church. The Vniuersity of Paris (the Nurse, and mother of so many holy Prelates) is not a little disquieted. If at the same time the Vniuersity of Oxford should be disturbed, which is the second Schoole of the Church, yea the fundamental base thereof, it is greatly to be feared, least the whole Church do fall to ruine. Whereunto the King made answer, God forbid that should happen at all, but chiefly in his daies. Which the Parliament then at hand, he accordingly prouided for, to their contentation. The memory of the King seemes by this to haue bene excellent, for beside that hee recounted to Paris all the Kings of England which had bene Canonized Saints, all the Princes Electors, and great Princes of Germany and France, he called to minde the names of about two hundredth and fifty Baronies in England.

(91) At this Parliament, (which was exceeding great) holden at London, the King in sight and view of all the people, brings forth his younger sonne Edmund attired like an Italian of Apulia, (which Country is a member of the Kingdome of Sicilia) and vied this speech: Behold here good people, my sonne Edmund, whom God of his gracious goodnesse hath called to the excellencie of kingly digniti; how comely and well worthy he is of all your fauors, and how cruell and tyran-nicall they are, who at this pinc, would deny him effectuall and timely helpe, both with aduice and money. The summe of all was to draw a vast contribution from the Clergie for attenuement of this shadow (it pro-(saith Paris) was in a sort agreeable to the Almain tongue) they found entire, and with that certitude returne. The King of England hereby seemed to haue his desires for recovery of Normandy, great-lie strengthened, the Almaines and French hardlie brooking one the other; but howsoever, sure it is that his brother the new King, had occasion to spend the golden Oyle, which was so long in gathering, to maintain the light of this Imperiall lampe; and without question hee might bee liberal, for he was reputed to possesse so much ready coine, as would euery day for tenne yeeres afforde him an hundredth marks vpon the maine stocke, without reckoning his rents & reuenues in Germany, and the English dominions. The Earl * was soon after crowned King of the Romans, at Aquigrane, by Comrad ued no better) into his Coffers. Neuertheless he obtained a grant of aboue fiftie thousand Marks, vpon covenant that the liberties of the Realme should be really and finally once for euer established: which was done. There were present in this Parliament six Archbishops, Canterbury, Yorke, Dublin, Colin, Messina in Sicilia, and Tarentum in Apulia. The politike Germans knew what they did in choosing Richard their King, for they saw a cloud of gold and silver would disolue it selfe into shoures among them at his ar-riuall; and all elections of strangers turne to their profit, because none is chosen that relies wholly vpon the rents of the Empire.

(92) It was a worthy care in this King, that when by the prouision of his brother Richard King of Romans, there arriued in the riuer of Thames fiftie saile of German Ships, laden with corne to relieue the great dearth, which then raigned through the Land, he caused proclamation to be made, That no Citizen of London should buy any of that corne to store up, which they were wont to doe, to the intent they might sell it the dearer afterward, so such as wanted. But no warning, prayers, aduises, nor sense of wants were able to make him frugal of his expence; whereby he was miserably streighted, neither would the Laitie in Parliament contribute anything, but (hammering some great attempts in their thoughts) in plaine words concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure such (they called them) extorsions.
Morcouer they there vttered many greouances, and Simon Earle of Leicester complained of the dishonor and injury done him by William de Valence, calling him Traitor, so that against the Session to be holden vpon prorogation, he, the Earle of Gloucester, and Marshall, confederated themselves and (pretending the fear of strangers the Kings favorites,) determined to come strong to Oxford at Saint Barnabas day.
They also sent messengers to the King of France, praying at least to much assistance, as that he would not hinder the good purpose which they held of ordinance and feeding the troubled estate of England.

They had also taken order to watch the Ports against strangers. Thus they prepared to abate (as it seemed) or banish the loftinesse and infolence of Poitouines and of other Forreiners, by whom the King was powerfully led, for they despaired of redresse at his hands, who like another Proteus (as Paris saith) tooke all shapcs vpon him to serue his turnes, and then slipt out at his pleasure, no promises, or ties being strong enough to hold him. These were the beginnings of bloody euils, and the feedesparks of those factious fires which afterward brake forth, from the sight and sense whereof, many thousands were taken by death, whose mortall stroake of pestilence raged ouer England, specially among the poore through scarcity of food.

(93) When the time appointed for the Parliament at Oxford was come, the feditious Earles and Barons (with whom sundry Bishops had taken Counsell against the King the Lords appointed) repaired thither, and sternely propounded sundry trayterous Articles to the King, to which they required his assent. The chiefe points were, That the King would vniuersally keepe and obserue the Charter of liberties, which he had so often granted, and sworn to maintaine inuolable; That such a one should be in the place of Chiefe Iustitiar who would iudge according to right, without respect to poore or rich, &c. Then they renewed their confederacie, solemnly swearing, That neither for life nor death, nor lone nor hate, they would be awaue to relent in their purpose, till they had cleared England (in which themselves and their Forefathers were borne) from upstarts and aliens, and had procured laudable Statutes. Those turbulent Nobles had yet a further plot, then all this; which was first broached (saith Paris: Westminster) by the disloyall Bishops, which was, that 24. persons should there be chosen, to haue the whole administration of the King and State, and yeerely appointment of all great Officers, referring only to the King the highest place at meetings and consultations of honour in publicke places. And because they would not be croffed in their purposes, they came exquisitely armed and appointed, that so the King and his Aliens should be enforced, if they would not willingly assent. To all these their ordina:ns the King and Prince Edward was enforced to weare, for fear of perpetual imprisonment, the traitorous Lords hauing by an Edict, threatened death to all that resisted. Whereupon all the Peeres and Prelatestooke their Corporall Oath to be faithfull in this their infidelitie, and made all who would abide in the Kingdome, to swear they would stand to the try-all of their Peeres: the Archbishops and Bishops solemnely accursing all that should rebell against it. The Monkes themselves detesting this impudent treason, aske with what forehead, especiallie Prelats, durst thus impair the Kinglie Maiestie, expresse against their sworne fidelitie to him? This conuiration they so prosecuted, that when William de Valence the Kings half-brother, denied with Oathes to render vpon any Cattle which was giuen him, the Earle of Leicester, and therof the Barons answered, they would either haue his Cattles or his head. This violent proceeding so terrified the Poitouines, that suddenly they left Oxford, and shortly fled into France, where also the Barons had made them odious. Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marshall, was made chiefe Ius-titiar. The people, seemed wholly theirs, which made the Barons so rough and peremptory in all their conferences, that when the Lord Henrie sonne to the King of Almain, refused to combine or take their oath, without his Fathers consent, they roundly bad him know, That if his father himselfe would not hold with the Barons of England, he should not haue a furrowe of earth among them. And least anything which might tend to their securitie, should seeme to be omitted, they vnting the Kings name, commanded London to stand vpon her guard, by keeping their Cities gates carefully shut, & by maintaining strong watches night by night, vpon pretence of danger to the Realme through the practises of strangers; and after they dispatched thither certaine fit Agents, who in the Guilde-hall made known their commission, which was directly to vnderstand, whether they would immutably adhere to the Barons and obey their constitutions, by manfully aiding and effectually supplying them in the common cause. Whereunto the Citizens condescended, binding themselves thereunto vnder the publike seale of London.

(94) The Barons did as yet forbear to declare, what those reformatory Prouisions should be, because the Earle of Gloucester (a principall man among them) was in danger of death, whose sicknesse did perplex & suspend their proceedings, & the manner of his maladie did put them in doubt of their owne safeties, making them grow in distrust of their Cooks, their butlers, and feners, for the Earle his body breaking out into pustules, and his haire, nailes, teeth and skinne it selfe, falling away, was (as many others, of which some died) thought to be poisoned. But whether they were or no, the Poitouines and strangers had the blame laid vpon them, to make them the more odious to the Commons. But the Earle partly recou-ered his health in time by the benefit of medicines and diligent attendance. The poisons were said to haue bene tempered in the house of Elies a lew afterward baptized. The King himselfe perhaps would not haue bene sorry, if that he, Simon Earle of Leicester and some few others of the Barons had bene with God, for howeuer his body was among them, yet his heart was not at quiet, which in this wise well appeared. For being in the month of Iune vpon the riuer of Thames in his barge, the aior suddenly grew darke, and there ensued a terrible shower with thunder and lightning, of which the king impatient commands himselfe to be let on land at the next place which was Durham houte, whereas then, the Earle of Leicester lay. The Earle being therof certified came out to entertaine him, saying, Sir why are you afraid? the tempest is now past: whereunto he answered with a seuerer looke: I feare thunder and lightning aboue measure, but by the head of God, I doe more feare thee then all the thunder and lightning of the world. Whereunto the Earle replied: My liege, it is inuision and incredible, that you should stand in feare of me, who haue alwaies bene loyall both to you and your Realme, whereas you ought to feare your enemies, such as destroy the Realme and abuse you with bad Counsels. The Barons therefore remaining firme in their first purpose, send messengers abroad to will all such as had bene wronged by the Kings half-brothers and other Poitouines and frangers to present their greouances to the Barons, and to prosecute them. Morcouer (because sundry other petty-tyrants of the English nation, encouraged by their example, had exceeded their limits, in oppres-sing their inferiours) they procured the King to appoint foure Knight Commissioners in euery shire, to enquire of all such iniuries, and certifie the same vnder their seales within a certaine time limitted.

(95) The Barons in the meane time neglect not their enterprize, at whole instance (principally of Hugh Bigod the new chiefe Iustitiar) Philip Louel the Kings Treasurer, for abuses committed in the Kings Forreits and game about Stony-Stratford, and many Officers of the Exchequer, were likewise remoued, to giue roome to such as the Barons better liked. The Sheriffs likewise of Shires, their practises, and extorsions, were diligentlie scene into, and it was ordained, that aswell the gliers as takers of bribes should be seuerely punished. The welth seeing these round proceedings in England, the peace & restorifiment whereof they feared, labored for reconciliation but could not then obtaine it.

(96) Richard King of Romans, hauing a desire to see the King his brother, and his lands in England, not without a purpose to bring an Armie, or such a number of men as might greatly strengthen the King against the Barons, as they suspected, was aduertised that they provided for his resistance as well by land as sea. This made him, his wife, and sonne, to lay aside that purpose, and to arrive in a private manner at Dover with a small traine, in which there were only two Earles, and about nine Knights. The king met him with great congratulation at the Sea side, but nor King, nor hee could be suffered to enter into Dover Castle, because (forsooth) it was the principall Key of England, for the safeguard whereof they openly exacted an Oath of him at Canterbury in this manner. The holy Gospels being laide vpon the Pulpit in the Chapter-house of Canterbury, the Barons reuerently brought in thither the Kings of England and of Aimaïne, then Richard Earle of Gloucester (for Simon Earle of Leicester was gone with others into France, to deale with the King and States thereof about a perpetual league) standing in the midst openly, and in humble sort calls Richard King of Romans vnto him, by the name onely of Richard Earle of Cornwall, who obeyed accordingly, to whom hee distinctly minitred the Oath following: *Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall sweare vpon the holy Gospels, to be faithful and forward to reforme with you the Kingdome of England, hitherto by the counsell of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an effectfull Coadiutor to expell the * Rebels and troubles of the Realme, from out the same. This oath will I obserue vpon paine to forfeit all the lands I haue in England.* On the other side (had the King known how to vie it) there fell out such diffension between the Earles of Gloucester and Leicester, that Leicester departed from England discontented, saying, hee tooke no joy to liue among men so mutable and deceitfull. Neuertheless such means were vied, that these two chiefe Captaines of the Barons, brake not forth into any farther diuision. Thus whiles the Barons vsing the Kings name, disposed of all things, and Simon de Montfort Earle of Leicester, was gone with others to transact with the French about an indissoluble league; the King himselfe through desire not to be interrupted with foraine matters, if warre should rise at home, or through want of money or better aduise, was induced (if not betrayed) to an act of little honour, though it carried with it the face of profit and setled quiet.

(97) For (the affairs of the realm thus strangely managed) the King in person sailes ouer into France, there to demand a peaceable restitution of such Signiorities as Philip & Lewis (Father of this Lewis) had iniuriously withdrawn from his father King John. The French replied, that no restitution was due for many respects, specially, because the * ancient grant made to Rollo the first Duke of Normandy, was not voluntary, but extorted by feare and force of Armes, in the dayes of the weak state of France. The King hauing * no disposition to recouer his claimies by battell, and destitute of money where-with to wage an Armie, but principally for that his owne Peeres and people stood on their guard against him, did * vnwillingly ratifie a conclusion; the Articles whereof were, that the King of France should quietly hold the Dukedom of Normandy and Earldome of Angiou (* Main allo, Taurain and Poitou) for * three hundred thousand small pounds of Taurain, and vpon promise to recouer other lands to the yeerly value of twenty thousand pounds. Vpon these Articles the king acquitted, and for euer renounced all his challenge to Normandy & the other lands, and thenceforth abridged his Stile, and changed his Seale, vsing a Scepter in place of a Sword: whereon these Monkish and mockish verses were written.

was notwithstanding brought about againe by the Queenes speciall diligence; and Douer and Rochester Castles (whither hee went in person) are deliuered vnto him. This makes him resolute to pursue the Barons; the rather also for that the French King (who much condemned the Barons vnjust courses) had promised his assistance. Henry therefore thrusts out the Barons Chancellor, & Chiefe Iusticiar, placing Walter Mers & Philip Bassett, men of much more loyal affections in their rooms. The Barons hearing of this, hasten in Armes to Winchester, where the King was, who (hauing intelligence by his faithful Clerk, Sir Iohn Mansel) got back into the Tower of London. The King of France was made Vmpire in the quarrell. The * cause was heard at Amiens, where hee gaue iudgement with the King of England against the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford, to be utterly void: provided neuertheless, that the Charter of Liberties which King Iohn had made to the English nation, should in no sort be thereby infringed. This prouiso animated Simon Earle of Leicester, and the Barons, to maintain all the Statutes of Oxford, (because they were pretendedly founded vpon that Charter) notwithstanding that iust iudgement which King Lewis had giuen. The secret confederacy with Lewelin Prince of Wales, ministred to the Barons no little encouragement; who about this time waiked the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales. This iudgement of the French King did much diaduantage the Barons, of whom diuers being drawne with persuasions, gifts, and promises, reuolted from Simon Montfort. There was now a taking of Townes and Prisoners on all hands. Prince Edward (who now was wholly for his Father in despite of the Barons) takes the Castell of Bristol, and fines the City at a thousand pounds. Simon Montfort executeth his greatest reuenges vpon the Queenes friends which were Aliens, not sparing the Kings. Marching forward, he recouers Gloucester Castell, enters Worcester and Bridgenorth; lastly, surpriseth the Ile of Ely, subduing that fastnesse or fenny strength to the Barons vse. Sir Iohn Mansel the Kings Councellour, fearing the euent of things, flies secretly from the Tower where the King was. Henry sonne to the King of Aimaïne, was after this taken by the Barons. Meanwhile Prince Edward fortifies Windsor Castle with strangers. Mutuall wearinesse at length begat a desire of peace, and the * King had yielded that the Statutes of Oxford should stand: but the Queene was utterly against it, not without cause; for it did enfeeble the arbitration which the French King had made. The Queenes opposition in this point was knowne to the Londoners; which put the baser sort into so lewd a rage, that hee being to shoot the Bridge from the Tower toward Windsor, they with durt and stones and villanous words forced her to returne. Prince Edward vnder the conduct of the Bishoppe of Worcester, came from the Castle of Bristol (by reason of quarrell betwene his men of warre and the Burgers) and contrary to his promise entred into Windsor Castle; but afterward going forth to meet Simon Montfort at Kingston vpon Thames, with purpose to offer peace, the laid Simon got Windsor Castle, & would not permit him to depart. At London yet in a Parliament, matters were pieced againe, and the Kings side grew stronger dayly.

by reason of their multitude, * being about 15000 (saith William Rishanger who then liued) of whose names were entered into the Matriculation booke, amongst whom being so many young Nobles, the King doubted how they might bee affected to the Barons. Whereupon many of them went to Northampton, where then the Barons were strong; and thither the King comming with his host, and breaking in at the Towne-walles vpon Passion Sunday, encountered his enemies, amongst whom the * Students of Oxford had a Banner by themselves advanced right against the King, and they did more annoy him in the fight, then the rest of the Barons: which the King (who at length preuayled) had vowed sharply to reuenge, but that his Councellers told him, those Students were the sonnes and kindred of the Great-men of the Land, whom if hee punished, even the Nobles who now stood for him, would take Armes against him. The King there tooke Simon Montfort the younger, and foureteeen other principall Barons and * Knights Banerets, forty other Knights, besides Esquiers, &c. Encouraged with this successe, hee aduanceth the Standard royall toward Nottingham, burning and waiking the Barons lands wherelocuer hee came. To diuert this tempest, Simon Montfort hastneth to London, and attempts the taking of Rochester Castle, which Iohn Earle of Warren defended for the King: who comming to raise the siege, takes Kingston Castle, which belonged to the Earle of Gloucester; then vnexpectedly falling vpon such as maintained the siege of Rochester, while Simon was absent, kills verie many, and scatters the rest. Then seieth hee the Castle of Tumbidge, and therein the Countesse of Gloucester, whom, notwithstanding hee nobly set at large, as professing not to warre against Ladies; from thence the Cloud of power borne vpon the winges of indignation, speedes to Winchester, and receiues the Cinque-Portmen to grace, settling at last in Lewis, where himselfe rested in the Priorie, and his sonne in the Castle, whither the Barons sent letters to him, protesting their loyal obseruance to his person, but all hostility to their enemies which were about him.

(100) But the King flaming with desire of reuenge, sets slight by these vowed (but fained) fidelities; and returns a full defiance as to Traitors, professing that hee takes the wrong of his friends, as his owne, and their enemies as his. The King of Aimaïne, Prince Edward, with other of the Kings chiefe friends, sent their like letters of defiance. The Barons, loath to let it come to the hazardous and vnkind trial of Steele, (though they then encamped about fix miles from Lewis,) not acquitting themselves in this repulse, iterate their message, with an offer to pay to the King thirty thousand pound, in satisfaction of such hurts as their people had done through the Realme, so as the Statutes of Oxford might stand. The king of Aimaïne (whose honour they had toucht, and spoild part of his inheritances) hindred all harkening to any their offers.

(101) It came to a battell, wherein Simon de Montfort commands his traitorous Army to weare white Crosses on breast and backe, to shew they fought for Iustice; great was the effusion of blood on both parts; chiefe of the Scots vpon the Kings side, & of the Londoners vpon the Barons side; whose Battalion, (lead by the Lord Segraue,) Prince Edward most furiously charged, and had the execution of them for about foure miles, which he pursued the more bloudily, in reuenge of the extreme disgrace which they had offered vpon London Bridge to the Queene his Mother, and after that the Garison of Tumbidge folloves, and slew many at Croyden. But while the Prince spent himself in that reuenge, his Father (who, hauing his Horse slain vnder him, had yielded himself prisoner to Simon de Montfort) his vnckle the king of Romans, and others great Peeres were taken, and the whole hope of that day lost. There fell in all on both sides, about five thousand. Prince Edward returning from the slaughter of the Londoners, would would have reenforced the Battaille, but the Barons offered peace, which vpon the next day was concluded for the present, so that Prince Edward and Henry sonne to the king of Romans, should also render them felices prisoners, and the two kings, till such time as all quarrels might receive an happier conclusion by calme deliberation. Thus was Simon Earle of Leicester in possession of both the kings and of their elder sonnes, so fortunate may Treason and Rebellion bee for a time, but in the end it speeds as it deferves.

(102) By this advantage this Kingly Rebel got all the chief Castles of the Kingdome into his hand, leading his Soueraigne as his Prisoner about the Country (yet with all outward respect and honour) the rather to procure a more quiet surrender. The King of Romans hee imprisoned in the Tower, Prince Edward and the Lord Henry in Dover. The Earle feeling now his owne greatness, began to be leffe tractable; neither could the Popes authority interposing it selfe for the King, prevaile. For as the Pope by Apostolike sentence before had absolved the King and others from his Oath to the Provisions of Oxford, so now he sent his * Cardinal Legate to excommunicate all the Fauourers of those Aties, & impugners of the King; but these men * having the material sword to trust unto, made no reckning of the Spiritual, pretending they appealed to the Pope, or to better times, or a general Council, or to God himselfe: so great account made these crossed fouldiers of the Popes curle. Notwithstanding the loyall blood of Roger de Mortimer, and many other high spirited men of Armes, could not brooke their Kings so base vylage and dangerous estate, but make head, in vaine. For Simon treacherously combines himselfe with Lewelin Prince of Wales, and with their joint forces takes Hereford Castle; thence they remoue Prince Edward from Dover. The loyall band was hereby compelled to capitulate, and deliver hostages. Of the fearfull point, to which England was brought at this present, but God (in whose protection it was) deliuered it. Simon and the Earle of Gloucester fall at debate about their Diuidend and shares in the spoiles, (for what euer they pretended for the Kingdome, their owne greatness and gaine was the motive, and somewhat also the vnequall altitude of his said partner the Earle of Leicester, together with the perill of his Country moued him. Who thereupon confederates, with Roger Mortimer and his associates, to whom not long after, John Earle of Warren, Surrey and Sussex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembroke with others are ioyned; and not long after, Prince Edward by escape from the Castle of Hereford, commeth in safetie to Wigmore. There were that laboured to atone the two Earles of Leicester and Gloucester, but of fence and indignation had taken too deepe roote. Meane while thou, & Henrie are shewed vp and down by the Arch-rebellious Earle of Leicester, to countenance thine owne destruction.

(103) The Prince therefore seeing that he must resolutely stand for the liberty of the Realme and of his Father, friends and posterity, raiseth an Armie, confederates himselfe with the people and Countiees of Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire and Chester. Gloucester hee enters by force, and drives the defendants into the Castle, which after yeelds. Simon Montfort with Lewelin Prince of Wales, doe in the meane time spoile their enemies lads in * Monmouth & Glamorgan shires, the King in person, not in spirit being present. Prince Edward, and the Earle of Gloucester on the other side, speed to the Castle of Kenelworth, kept against them by Simon, sonne of the Earle of Leicester; there they intercept the Earle of Oxford with about thirteene Knights Bannerets before they could reach the Castle, whither they were hastning. News came then that the Earle of Leicester was returned with the King in his companie out of Southwales, neere to Worcester. Thither the Prince advanceth to fight with him. The Earle hearing of his approach, encampes at Ewelham with his whole power. Vpon the third of August the noble Edward sets out of Worcester, and strikes betweene Simon Montfort and his way to Kenelworth, and the next day turnes back toward Ewelham, the Earle of Gloucester with his force, and Roger de Mortimer (as they had agreed) with his battalion, drawing thither by two other waies; so that Simon thus shut vp and enclosed, must either fight or yeeld. They ioine in battaile in a goodly large field before the Towne of Ewelham; where the Earles host being assailed on all sides, was with much slaughter (of the Welsh speciallie) utterly in the end distressed and difcomfited. At the houre of his death it thundered and lightened, and so great a darknesse spread the skie that men were amazed. The Earles head, (which was sent to Worcester Castle to the Ladie Mortimer) his hands, and feet, were chopt off. In this cruell Battaille the King himselfe (being wounded vnawares with a launcel) was almost slaine. Let vs now behold how this victorie vsed. The King being thus restored to liberty, calls a Parliament at Winchester, by authority whereof hee seith into his hands the Charters and freedoms of the Citie of London, and of many other Townes for their Rebellion. Those that were taken in the battel are committed to safe Custody, and all such as had been vpon the Earls side were disinherited, a ratable distribution being made of their estates to the Kings well deferving friends. Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Earles sonnes, were chiefe of the attainted; their mother the Countesse with all her goods was sent in safetie out of England neuer to returne. Simon the eldest brother fought to preferre himselfe, and the remains of his Fathers misfortunes in the Ile of Axholme.

(104) The King meaning to take all refuge from him, is together with his brother the King of Romans, Ottobon the Popes Legate, (who was lately arrived), and a puissant armie, at Northampton, with purpose to oppress him by warre. Simon had friends about the King, but the Earle of Gloucester maligning his restitution to full grace, it was concluded (vpon his submission) that he should liue in exile, and for his maintenance receive ouly five hundred marks by the yeere. But the Castle of Kenelworth would not yeeld, driving the King to an halfe yeeres garrison; who also in the end was content to giue the fierce pardon for life and limme, licensing it to part with bag and baggage. In the meane while the other outlaws and disinherited men, made sundry excursions out of the Ile of Elie. Temperate men, desirous to pacifie all these evils, would gladly haue had the king to pardon those transgressions, and restore their lands vpon reasonable fines. This proposition found a fowre enemy of Roger Mortimer, who had by the kings gift gotten much of their land; which moued the Earle of Gloucester (who fauoured the other courle) to indignation and distrust, so that he withdrew himselfe. Not long after which, hee by his messengers befought the king, to remoue strangers from about him, to see that the Statutes of Oxford were observed through the kingdome, and to keepe such promises as he had made at Ewelham. Otherwise the king must marcuile, if he did that which himselfe thought best. The Legate Cardinal Ottobon, about the same time (to hinder the growth of anie new rebellion) excommunicated the Bishops of Winchester, Worcester, London and Chichester for hauing adhered to Simon Montfort, and also declared that the Clergie were to pay their tenths, for seuen yeeres next ensuing, to the king. On the other side, all the vndone and disinherited men (except the sonnes of Simon Montfort and Robert Earle of Derby) were offered to be put to ranfome, and for certaine fines to be restored to their lands; but they required to haue them without redemption, expostulating with the king and Legate many greivances. When words had no better operation, the King and Prince Edward beliege the Ile of Ely on all sides. This being known to the Earle of Gloucester, who (although hee had vnder his scale promised neuer to take armes against the King and Prince, but only in his owne defence) gathers a force force in Wales in fauour of the disinherited, marcheth vp to London and taketh it, the Citizens fauouring him. Then commands he the Popes Legate, who lodged in the Tower, to yeeld vp the same; but he, as taking no knowledge of any such matter, repaired quietly to Pauls, there, by preaching to stirre vp people against the enemies of Christ in the Holy land. Peace ensued not long after, by mediation of the King of Romans, and the Noble Lord Philip Basset, the Earle binding himselfe in ten thousand marks to the King, neuer to moue any tumult. Lewelin Prince of Wales, who had greatly supported the Earle of Leicesters rebellion, for thirty thousand pounds sterling was restored to foure Cantreds, which the King had taken from him in the warre, and reconciled.

(105) Domesticke peace now beginning to shine in the English Hemisphere, Prince Edward his brother, the Lord Edmund, the Earle of Gloucester with many other Noble men of England, with intent of a more honourable warfare, take the Crosse vpon them at Northampton, by the deliury of Ottobon, who not long after returned into Italie. Then was the Kings peace proclaimed through England, all men being vpon paine of death commanded to forbear to make spoiles, or take booties violently, as they of late had been accustomed. The Prince, seeing the Realme thus acquitted, doth the more willingly (hauiing his Fathers content) yeeld to goe with Lewis King of France, into the holy land, who, toward his furniture in that voyage, lends him thirty thousand marks: for assurance whereof the Prince morgageth Aquitaine vnto him. But what true letted peace may we iudge it, when John de Warren Earle of Surrey the Kings halfe-brother (vpon the increase of words betweene them) durst kill Alan le Louche the chiefe Iustice, with his owne hand in Westminster Hall? A plaine and fearefull example of fauorites potencie. That all things yet might not run out of square, the King held a Parliament at Marlborough where the Statutes called of Marlborough were enacted. The old King and his Quene henceforward enioyed the blessing of a quiet estate at home, with the more leisure to pray therein for their sonnes faire successe in Palestine, whose virtues had there raised an admiration of him among the Infidels. That quiet neuertheless was a little interrupted by an incendiary outrage at Norwich, where the Citizens set fire on the Priorie Church. The king being kindled with another kind of fire, (ware he would in person see a reuenge taken; and dispatching first away Sir Thomas Trivet, (before whom a great multitude were found guilty, and condemned to be drawne and hanged) himselfe, hauing in his company one Bishop and the Earle of Gloucester, followed; where beholding the deformed ruines, he could hardly refrain from teares. The Bishop hauing therefore excommunicated the noient, and the King condemned the Towne in three thousand marks, toward the reedification of that Church, as also to pay one hundred pounds for a Cup weighing ten pounds in gold, he purposed to returne toward London. This publike act of zeale to religion and Iustice, was the last which he did, as a King; for now he was come to that, which hee was to enter into as a mortal man: At the Abbey of S. Edmund in Suffolke, he fell greuously sicke, where he lay, * he caused the Earle of Gloucester to be sworn to keepe the Realme for his sonnes; the Prelates, Earles and Barons of the land, being assembled to be present at his departure. Therefore after hee had in Christian manner prepared his soule, by acknowledging his sinnes, and receiving fit spirituall consolations, he rendered vp the same to his Redeemer. His will was short, for his Creditors and the Poore shared all his goods. The space of time which he reigned, is almost an old mans age, and absolutely the longest number of yeeres, that euer any King of England reigned, not excepting Eshelbert the first Christian King, if (which is * written by some) he reigned fiftie fixe yeeres, and as manie daies more, as are between the feast of Simon & Jude, and * Saint Edmund the Archbishop, which are about twentie. A Prince whose * deuotion was greater then his discretion, as we see in his permitting the depredation of himselfe and his whole kingdome by Papall ouerwings, the error of whole Government, concurring with the tumultuous treasons of his Nobles, did precipitate him into many mischiefes, out of which yet God almighty did strangely deliuer him; for if he had not bene diuinely protected, there is no cause for a reasonable man to doubt, but that his end had proved as headlong, as some of his own, and his Barons actions seemed to threaten. The royall remains of this happily-dying Prince were with all the due pompe of exequies interred in Westminster, the great and sumptuous new worke whereof he began, but finished not; the description of whose life, being full of diuerticles and abrupt passages, as a maze or labyrinth, here at last hath found a place of rest for it selfe and vs.

His Wife.

(106) Eleanor the wife of King Henry, was the second of the five daughters, of Raymond Earle of Provence, sonne of Earle Alfonso, sonne of Alfonso the first king of Arragon; her mother was Beatrice, daughter of Thomas Earle of Savoy, sister of the Earles Amee, and Peter, and the Archbishop Boniface of Canterbury. Shee was married to him at Canterbury, January 24. An. 1236. regn. 20: Crowned at Westminster the 19. of the same moneth: was his wife 37 yeeres, his widow 19. died a Nun at Amesbury, the 25. of Iune, in the 20. yeere of her sons raigne 1291, and was buried in her monastery, the 11. of September following.

His Issue.

Edward their eldest sonne was borne at Westminster, the 28. day of Iune, the 24. yeere of his Fathers Raigne; 1239, hee was furnished Longshanks of his tall and slender body, made knight in Spaine of Alfonso king of Castile, created Earle of Chester by his Father, after the Issue male extinct of the former Earles, and succeeded his Father in the kingdome of England.

(107) Edmund their second sonne, borne Jan. 26. A. 1245, and of his Fathers raigne, 29, was surnamed Crouched-backe, of bowing in his backe, say some, but more likely of wearing the signe of the Crosse, (anciently called a * Crouch) vpon his backe, which was usually worne of such as vowed viages to Ierusalem, as he had done. He was invested titulare King of Sicilia and Apulia, and created Earle of Lancaster, (on whole person originally the great contention of Lancaster and Yorke was founded) and hauing of the grant of his Father, the lands of Simon Montfort and Robert Ferrers, (disinherited in the Barons warres) was by vertue of the same graunt Earle of Leicester and Derby, and high Steward of England. He had two wiues, the first was Avelin, daughter and heire of William Earle of Albemarle, by whom hee lost no issue, the second was Queene Blanch, daughter of Robert Earle of Artoys; (brother of Saint Lewis King of France) widow of Henry of Champagne, King of Navarre, and mother of Joane Queene of France and Navarre, the wife of Philip the faire. By her hee had issue three sons and one daughter. Thomas who after his Father was Earle of Lancaster, and hauing married Alice, daughter and heire of Henry Laue Earle of Lincoln, was beheaded at Pomfret without issue: Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his brothers death was Earle of Lancaster, and father of Henry, the first Duke of Lancaster: John, who died without marriage: and Mary, married to Henry Lord Percie, mother of Henry, the first Earle of Northumberland. This Earle Edmund died at Bayon in Gascoigne, Iune. 5. An. 1296, and of King Edward his brothers raigne 24. when hee had liued fiftie yeere, foure moneths and nineteene daies; whose body halfe a yeere after his death, was conuaid into England, and lieth entomb-

CHAPTER X.

Edward, who followed K. Henry in wearing the English Crowne, but far out-went him in all regall vertues, was abroad at the time of his fathers death, still pursuing his high desires for the Holy Warres: wherein what he performed, (being yet but a Prince,) against the public enemies of Christians, it shall not bee impertinent to touch, before wee come to his actions as a King; hauing already remembred, with what valour and felicity hee had subdued his Fathers domestick enemies, settled the peace of his Kingdome, and reestablished the raines of Soueraignty in his Fathers hands, which those potent Rebels had formerly extorted.

(2) King Lewis of France, whose persuasions had enflamed this noble-spirited Prince to associate him in this glorious quarrell, hauing first set forth for the enterprise, lay now in siege of Tunis in Africa; where Prince Edward with all his forces arriuing, the French King (greatly reioicing in his wished presence,) together with the King of Nauarre, and other Princes of his Army, went forth to meet him, and receiued him in the kisse of Peace. This place which they beleaguered, was (as then) not great, yet by reason of the situation,* it greatly impeached the Christians in their passages through those Seas; being built out of the scattered ribs, and wasted ruines of that mighty and famous City Carthage, tial once in Matesty and Ambition with ancient Rome, as contending with her about the Empire of the World. Therefore to secure the Mediterranean Seas, it was thought necessary to beginne that enterprise for Asia, with this in Africa; but not long after Lewis yielding vppre his holy Soule to God at the siege, and sicknesse (by reason of the heates in those Regions, for it was August) raigning in the Christian Campe, Charles King of Sicilie, whom Lewis (before his decease) had sent for, to take charge of the whole enterprise, armies; and after sharpe reinforcement of the siege, (where Edward gaue frequent prooffe of his great valour and prudence,) Charles is content to forebare extremity, (to which the Sarazens were brought) vpon capitulations with them, contrary to Edwards mind, being wholly set to subdue, conuert or root them out.

(3) Yet the points of the treaty & truce (though granted for many yeeres) carried shew of honour, being these: 1. that all Christian Captiues should bee free without ransom: that in the Cities of that Kingdome, the Christian faith might freely be taught: 2. that all such as were willing, might freely receiue sacred Baptisme: 4. that the Sarazens should repay to the Christian Kings, their charges: 5. that the King of Tunis should remaine tributarie to the King of Sicilie. The siege hereupon was raised, to the griefe and indignation of Edward, who would not (as is reported) partake nor share in any of the treasure, which by reason of the truce was payed by the Sarazens, as accounting it to be wickedly gotten, and contrary to the Tenor of the vow, which for the honour and aduancement of Christian Religion had beene made. The euental so seeming to confirme no less; for the wrath of Heauen (saith our * Author) pursued King Charles, brother to the late King Lewis, and finding him out vpon the sea in his returnetoward Sicilie, tooke seuerer reuenge by terrible weather, awfull vpon him, as almost his whole Army, which perished in the waters, together with the impious treasure brought from Tunis, and all other his furniture of State and Household. Which when Prince Edward vnderstood, hee sware by the blood of our Lord, that though all his Companions in Armes and Countreinen should abandon him, yet hee and Fowin his * Lackey alone would enter into * Ptolomais, and keepe the vow which he had made, whilst soule and body held together. A noble resolution, and as faithfully performed, but not with so final attendance; for the English hearing his feruent assertion, promised with one heart to accompanie him, and that (in all likelihood) the more willinglie, because it is not obserued, that the tempest had any way danished Edward, or his fellowship. He forthwith therefore sets sail toward Acron, into which hee entered safe not about four daies before the City should haue bene yielded to the Sarazens, from which precipitation their succours out of England withheld it. The Sultan of Babylon, who lay about Acron with a puissant host, and had begun to assault the breaches; hearing this, not long after raised his siege, and without the fruition of his desire withdrew to his owne Dominions.

(4) Edward vndoubtedly was not more tall of personage then stout of courage, and vpon trust thereof, doing some things, which perhaps a Prince of his hopes, and fortunes, might with good reason haue forborne. His vndaunted courage against those Infidels may be gesseid by the like against a domesticke Rebelle. Amongst those who were out-lawed for Rebellion & Treason, after the battell of Eueham for partaking with Simon Earle of Leicester, was one Sir Adam Gordon a Knight of the parts about Winchester, who with certaine his Complices kept out of the way of the Kings officers, but made the Kings high-way betwene Wilton and Farnham (which by reason of woods and windings was fitte to shelter enemies) very dangerous for such, as meant to passe, but doing most mischief to the lands and goods of such as were the Kings friends. Edward hearing of this mans singular courage, gets intelligence of a fit time, and comes vpon him with a strong band of followers, but he, nothing terrified, prepares himselfe to fight for his life to the last gaspe. The Prince hereupon commands that none of his men should dare to interrupt their Combat, and forthwith with equall courage exchanged mighty blowes without winning ground each of other. Edward delighted with the brauery of Adams spirit, and prooffe of his manhood, had him yeeld, promising him life, and his lands again; who presently throwing away his weapons, enioyed the full benefite of Prince Edwards promise. The happinesse of that age, wherein Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much assurance in fight, might somewhat excuse the Prince from the note of temerity, which otherwise, in hazarding his princely person against a priuat Gentleman, hee could hardly haue escaped. But here at Acron hee refused no occasion of putting forth the naturall strengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreat the most honourable opportunities were subtracted.

(5) All this while did that renowned and vertuous Lady, Eleanor, wife of Prince Edward, endure with him an inseparable companion of all his fortunes, and was at Acron deliuered of a daughter, baptized there by the name of Ioan. But if God had not better provided for him, shee was not likely to haue enioyed any longer the deare company of her louing Lord and Husband. Amongst that bloody Sect of Sarazens, called Assassini, who, without feare of torments, undertake (vpon command of their * Superior) the murder of any eminent prince, impugning their irreligion, was one Anzazim, often vited by the Saracen Admirall of Toppe, as a Messenger betwene him and Edward, whom the Admirall pretended exceedingly to honour for his heroicke parts of mind and body. The desperate wretch by this employment getting credite and access, vpon his insinuation of certaine secrets to be imparted, Prince Edward commanded all men to void the Chamber, when looking out of a window, the Assassine sodainly with a poisoned knife giues him three wounds, two in the arme, and one neere the arme-pits, whom Edward presently with his foot threw to the earth, wrung the knife from the Traitor, (nor without wounding himselfe in the hand,) and with the tressel of a Table smote out his braines. Then calling in his people, hee commands that the body of the villain should bee hanged vpon the Cities Wall, and a liue dogge with him. The Admirall hearing of this trayterous attempt, is * said to haue sighed for sorrow, for that hee neuer knew thereof, but meant himselfe to haue become a Christian. But when the Christians vnderstood of this cursed assault vpon the person of so renowned a Prince, they ment in reuenge thereof, to haue forthwith invaded the Pagans wherefoeuer. But the Prince (whose first care was the safety of Christians) said, I forbid you on the behalfe of God, that none of you yet presume to infect the Pagans Armie, because many of our people are gone to visit the holy Sepulchre, who shall euery one of them bee murdered by the Sarazens, if they shall now sustaine any (though but small) vexation at our hands. The second care was of his wounds, which by reason of the envenomed blade were feared to be mortall; wherein the Lady Eleanor gaue so rare example of coniugal affection, as her immortal memory doth iustly impart glory to that whole Sex. For when no medicine could extract the poison, shee did it with her tongue, licking daily, while her husband slept, his rankling wounds, whereby they perfectly closed, and yet her selfe received no harmes; so saueraigne a medicine is a wifes Tongue, anointed with the vertue of lowely affection.

(6) Thus while Edward abode in forraigne parts for the generall service of Christianity, against the encrailing Enemies thereof, (contending then to that lamentable Greatnesse, wherein our vnhappy times beheld them;) his Father king Henrie dies, and Prince Edward had the defect of his presence supplied by the faith and care of such venerable and noble persons, as his Father left behind him at his death. Therefore Robert Kilsarby Archbishop of Canterbury, Gilbert Earle of Gloucester, with other the chiefe Prelates and Peeres of the land, assembling together at the New Temple in London, acknowledged and proclaimed absent Edward for their Soueraigne Liege Lord; and by the assent of his Mother, the Queene Dowager, provided for the common affaires of the King, and the good estate of the Kingdome. The first newes of his Fathers death were brought vnto him, when after his return from the Holy Land (which seruice hee was * enforced to forsake, having long in vaine expected the promised aids of Christians, and Tartars,) he rested himselfe in Sicilia, with Charles the King thereof; where to the immortal commendation of his pietie, and filiall affection (rare in Princes) it is recorded, that the death of his Sonne and Heire, coming first to his care, and afterward of the King his Father, hee much more sorrowed his Fathers departure, then his Sonnes: whereat King Charles greatly maruailed, and demanding the reason, had of him this answer: I were; The losse of Sonnes is but light, because they are multiplied euery day: but the death of Parents is irreparable, because they can neuer bee had againe.

(7) Now, whether it were the terrour of such reuenge as followed the captiuation of his valiant Predecessor King Richard, or his owne wilier carriage, or the calmer condition of the times, or all of them together, which secured him in his returne: certaine it is, that hee trauelled in great safety and honour ouer land from Sicilia to Rome, where hee was met vpon the way with all the Cardinals, gratulating the honourable successe of his Chaeualrie against the Turkes, his safe returne, and new Kingdome. At his instance Pope Gregory * excommunicated the bloody-handed Guy Monford (because * his person could not easily bee gotten, by reason of his Greatnesse, and power) with all his receiuees, and (vntill amends were made) put their whole Dominions vnder interdict, for that the said Guy, (sonne to Simon, late Earle of Leicester, slain at the battell of Eueham) in reuenge of his Fathers death (for which he mortally hated all King Henries race) had most butcherly murdered * Henry of Almaine, King Edwards neere kinsman, vpon his returne toward England, in the raigne of the late King Henry, as hee was devoutly seruing God in the Church at Viterbo in Italie; which horrible act induceth a * iudicious Author to suspect, that Guy also had a hand in that Assassination on Edward, who had slaine his Father. This Guy being afterward taken by the Admirall of Aragon, to gratifie King Edward, was kept in prison, & the death of Henrie reuenged * with his. From Rome hee iourned through the Cities of Italy, where hee was generally entertained with exceeding ioy and honour; and as hee was * entering into Sauidy, at the roope, or descent of the Alpes, very many of the Prelates, and Peeres of England met him, acknowledging their gladnesse for his safety, and their duties to his Soueraignty. In his passage, hee gaue notable prooffe of his great prowess and strength at a Tournament (or rather * battell) against * the Earle of Chaboun, and his Burgundians: for the said Count being a gallant man at Armes, after many blowes with the sword betwene King Edward and him, throwing away his weapon, graspt the King about the gorger, and hung vpon him with the weight of his masie body, in hope to cast him to the earth; but the King, sitting vpright, without any bending, put spurres to his lusty horse, and lifted the Count to hanging about his necke, quite from his Saddle, carrying him away, till hee had forcibly shooke him off to the ground, who recouering himselfe, & comming to redeeme his disgrace, had such entertainment, as hee was contented to yeeld. In our effeminate and degenerate age, to omit such an achievement of a King of Engnd in his owne person, had bene hainous and pinculum. Thus his renowne encreasing with his progresse, hee had magnificent entertainment in France, of Philip the king, to whom (vpon condition to haue such territories restored, as were promised to his Father King Henrie, when he sold Normandie to the French) hee did homage for such Signiories, as he held of the Crown of France.

(8) And as well to shew his owne moderation & princely temperance, (a vertue which makes euery man a King in himselfe, and Kings like to Gods) as also his reuerence to the Crowne of France, whose Homager hee was for his transmarine Dominions, Gausco de Biern, a valiant man of Armes, being in actual rebellion against K. Edward in his Dutchie of Gascoigne, was admitted to appeale for triall of his pretended causes to the French King, as the superior Lord. Many of King Edwards friends and Counsellours were vtterly aduerse to this fauour, aswell because the said Gausco had drawne the King to no small charge, and labour, as also for that now hee was brought by strait siege to such extremities, as tht hee could no longer hold out, and himselfe, hauing all that while put his confidence in walles of stone; and the weapons points, there was also little reason to allow him an ordinary ciuill triall of his pretexs for taking arms; and many perhaps, both thought the example prejudicious to King Edward and his Successors, by giuing way to such appeales, and distrust the iustice of the French Court: Contrary to all which, the King decreed, and it was fortunate with him; for Gausco (not long after) was condemned in France, and sent with * an halter about his necke, to prostrate himselfe to iustice, or mercy at King Edwards feete in England, who pardoned him the forfeiture of life, & (when hee had for certaine yeeres kept him prisoner at Winchester) set him at liberty, and sent him backe to his own, who remained for euer after gratefully firme and loyall.

(9) King Edward (his transmarine affaires thus being settled) arrived in England, where hee was after so long desirings most ioyfully welcome, and there, in the Church of Westminster (the magnificent newwork of his deceased Father, who had with great cost, and after about fifty yeeres spent therein, almost finished the same) he and his dearest Eleanor were anointed, and crowned by * Robert Kilsarby Archbishop of Canterbury. There were present at this solemnity Queen Eleanor the Kings mother, * Alexander King of Scots, the Duke of Britaine, with multitudes of Peeres and others: where (as * one saith) for the more royall celebration of this great feat, and honor of so martiall a King, there were five hundred great Horses let loose, euery one to take them for his own, who could.

(10) The finall abolishment of succession of the Welsh blood in the Principality, or chieftdom of Wales now ensued: but yet (as great matters vie) not first without some time, and certaine degrees. The original was this; King Edward hauing sent for Lewelin Prince of Wales to his Coronation, there to doe him homage; he, excusing the same, was againe (for that cause) admonished to repaire to the Kings Parliament at Westminster: whether likewise hee forbore to come, pretending it was danger to his person, but * directing his excuse to the Archbishops of Canterbury and Yorke, and their Suffragans, professed his readinesse, if it would please the King, *either to send a Commission for taking his Oath, and Fealty, (who bare him a deepe displeasure, euer * since Lewelin had put him, being then but Earle of Chester, to the worke) or else, to appoint some indifferent place, or giue to him for hostages the * Kings sonne, and Robert Earle of Gloucester, with Robert Burrell the Kings Chancellor.* But King Edward dissembling the arrogance of the demand for the present, went forward in his Parliament, where the first Statutes, called of Westminster, and among them the Statute of Mortmain were enacted. But after the Parliament, the King repaired to his City of Chester, being very neere to Wales, and Lewelin forefollowed his comming thither also; wherefore the King, resolving (for deniall tary single fight with Sir Adam Gordon.

Edward delighted with the brauery of Adams spirit, and prooffe of his manhood, had him yeeld, promising him life, and his lands again; who presently throwing away his weapons, enioyed the full benefite of Prince Edwards promise. The happinesse of that age, wherein Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much assurance in fight, might somewhat excuse the Prince from the note of temerity, which otherwise, in hazarding his princely person against a priuat Gentleman, hee could hardly haue escaped. But here at Acron hee refused no occasion of putting forth the naturall strengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreat the most honourable opportunities were subtracted.

Edward J. ENGLANDS MONARCHS. Monarch 47.

(20) The names of the Competitors were these, according to Walsingham, Erick, King of Norway, who appeared by his Attorneys; Florence, Earle of Holland; Robert le Brus, Lord of Amundale; John de Baliol, Lord of Galway; John de Hastings, Lord of Abergueny; John Comin, Lord of Badenaw; Patrick de Dunbar, Earle of Mar; John de Vesci, on his Fathers behalf; Nicholas de Sules; William de Rosse. These all peaceably submitted themselves, for so much as concerned their feudal titles to the Scottish Crowne, to the final award and arbitration of King Edward, passing thereof an authenticke Instrument vnto him; who hauing giuen caution to restore the realme of Scotland, (within a certaine prefixed time,) to that party to whom the Crowne thereof should be adjudged, had feisid deliuered to him, the better to put the sentence in execution, or (say the writers of that nation) they giuing him power to constrain the parties to stand to this sentence. The whole carriage of which weighty business, being so diuerly related and censured by the writers of both nations, (though for the present it be not material, both Kingdoms now blessedly acknowledging one absolute Superiour) wee will fo trace the steps of truth in a middle way, as resolving neither to impeach the action of that glorious vmpier, nor preiudicate the right of our noble sister nation. The State of Scotland now was not without manifest perill; for the Scots * denying that their Kingdom was in anie point subalterne to the Crowne of England, and King Edward either perswaded that it was so, or resolving and plotting now to make it so, would not neglect the aduantage of this * Acephalis or want of a known head in Scotland.

(21) Vpon full ventilation therefore and scanning of all rights, the maine doubt rested vpon Lord Brus and Baliol, for the residue might seeme rather to affect the honour of hauing pretended title in blood to a Diademe, then to haue colour to contend with either of them. Great was the aduise, and deliberation (as there was cause) which King Edward tooke therein, for not trusting to his owne iudgement, hee called (saith * Heitor Boetius) twelve of the best Clerks or learned men of Scotland, and twelve of England to concurre as Assessors with him in that great decision.

(22) While this weighty cause was in debatement, there fell out deadlie strife betwene the English and Normans, occasioned by one of them casually slaine by the English; which mischiefe the King of France forwardly nourish, as thirsting for the dutchy of Gascoigne, which he might attain by troubling the forreine affaires of King Edward, whom they saw now entangled at home in so weighty employments. Whereupon the Normans slew sundry of the English, and hang vpon one vpon the mast of a Shippe, whom they had taken at Sea; but, ere long after, threecore English ships encountering with two hundredth saile of Normans, laden with wines, after a most bloody batel (wherein many * thousands of the French were slaine) tooke, with their whole fleet, their full reuenge, and brought them into England.

(23) At last yet King Edward returning to Berwick, hauing with him the said twenty foure Assessors, as it were a iury of either nation, * and, with the good will and assent of the Scottish Lords, gaue solemne iudgement with Baliol, as being defended of the eldest daughter of David, Earle of Huntington, a younger sonne of Scotland; whose issue (the line of the elder brother being extinct) was to inherit, without question. But the strife being betwene the descendents of the said David, of which the Lord Robert Bruce was also a principall, reasons of importance were produced, which drew many mens iudgements, to incline to him, as hauing a nearer interest to that Crowne. But according to the sentence, Baliol was solemnly crowned King of Scotland vpon S. Andrews day, and, in Christmas following, repaired to King Edward, at Newcastle vpon Tyne, and * there (against the minds of many Scots) did homage vnto him for the whole Kingdom of Scotland.

(24) Meantime the French King pursued the reuenge of the Normans, demanding restitution, and citing King Edward iudicially to appeare to answer such wrongs, as were done in Aquitaine; who, (desirous to settle his owne affaires at home, or, as some write, * eager vpon a match for himselfe in France) while hee discounted either his unwillingness to appeare in that kind, or to warre, suffered himselfe by a French deuisse, to be merely deceived, and put out of his possession of Gascoigne, to the great mischiefe, and disaduantage of the English: whereupon K. Edward highly incensed, called a Parliament at London, where John King of Scotland was present; and had the full consent of the whole Realme, to reigne that himselfe by the sword which was craftily gotten away by a cunning trick, * renouncing to the French his homage for Aquitaine. Wales also was at the same time full of troubles; but the fires of rebellion, there rashly kindled, were, not long after, quenched with the blood of the Actors, and thousands of their Complices.

(25) Baliol hauing thus obtained the Crowne of Scotland, and finding his party, by the homage which hee had made to King Edward, much empaired among the Scots, who greatly repined thereat; for regaining their loues, * attempted a secret combination with the French against the English; which Edward ignorant of, and * requiring him by vertue of his homage to aid him with all his powers against the King of France, * discovered (by Baliols delays, and traueises) the said conspiracy. Whereupon hee aduanced forward against the Scots with a puissant armie to Newcastle vpon Tyne: The first blood which was drawne was of the English, of whom, the Scots * slew almost one thousand in a village vnder the leading of one Robert de Ros, who had fled from King Edward: The City of Carlisle likewise was assaulted, and the County of Cumberland spoiled by seuen Earles of Scotland, and their companies, which to Edward was not greatly displeasing, (as was said) for that the first hostile acts were done by them, whom hee had a full purpose to subdue, that at last he might see sole in Albion, which, had not God refused for other times, we might wonder he effected not.

(26) King Edward therefore presented himselfe before the strong Towne of Berwick with a mighty host, there to aulpicate his entrance to a conquest of Scotland; and, after summons sent to the Towne, abode one whole day, without offer of violence: The Townesmen refusing to render, had a victory of the English Mariners, who rashly entering, with twentie and foure Ships into the harbour, were repelled with the losse of foure of their vessels, which was soone reuenged by the forceable taking of Berwick, where * Heitor Boetius saith, there was exercised great cruelty by the English. In the Towne, the Flemish Merchants (who were smothered by the English with fire) had a very strong house in the manner of a Tower, from whence they leueld, at the entering of the English, with darts, and iaculins, one of which casually slew Richard of Cornwal, a gallant Gentleman brother to the Earle of Cornwal, which, in an army heated with former contumelies, for the Scots vpon the slaughter and repulse which they had made of the English mariners, published certaine rimes in derision, as together with the remembrance of many fresh strewd turnes, might stirre vp bloody effects. After the Towne was thus taken, the Castle after stood not long out, but rendered it selfe. * Sir William Douglas, capitaine thereof, was detained prisoner, and (as * some write) Sir Robert Bruce: others were suffered to depart, vpon oath to beare no armes from thenceforth against the King of England. The losse of this important Towne, and Castle was very great, for it was the key, and common Bulwarke of Scotland.

(27) While

(27) While the English, at this place, were busied to cast a very deepe ditch, to hinder the fodeine inroads of their enemies, John King of Scotland, sent two religious men to the King of England with * letters; in which, alledging that he was by Oath bound to defend his owne kingdom, and people, he renounced his homage, and fealties, as extorted by violence, and void in it selfe, being made without assent of the three estates of his Realme. The resignation was admitted, King Edward commanding his Chancellor to record the same for perpetuall memorie, as a iustification of his proceedings.

(28) The Scots hereupon, vnder the conduct of the Earles of Bucchan, Meneth, Strathern, Ros, Arthol, Marr, and other of their nobility, made an incursion into England, whence with the spoiles of two religious houses, and other booties they returned: But Patrick Earle of Dunbarre came to King Edward submitting himselfe; and the Castle of Dunbarre (by this submission being vnder King Edwards protection) was regained by Scots: For recouerie, or surregaining whereof, the King sent John Earle of Surrey, and Suffex, and William Earle of Warwick, who were entertained with batted by the Scottish nation, of whom the English, * after cruell fight, obtained a victory of great importance, the chafe holding about eight miles, in which the slaughter was not small. The siege of Dunbarre being reinforced, King Edward had it yeilded vnto him, at his coming, wherein were taken three Earles, fixe or seuen Barons, besides many knights, and Esquires, which were all sent prisoners to diuerse Castles of England, and (if some say true) not put to the sword (as Heitor transported perhaps with hatred to Edward writes) contrary to his word, and faith giuen.

(29) King Edward knowing as well how to vse a victorie, as to get it, hauing a present spirit vpon all aduantages, and turnes of fortune, takes the Castle of Rocksbrough, and (for a small end to this affaire) marcheth to Edenburgh it selfe (the chiefe Towne of Scotland) which * was shortly rendered: Then tooke they Striueling also, and draue Baliol to the * Castle of Forfar: where John Comin Lord of Sirabogie submitted himselfe to King Edward. About this time there came to the English campe great numbers of Welsh souldiers, with whom hee releued many of the English footemen, tyred with seruice, sending them backe into England. Thither also came the Earles of Ylster with bands of Irish.

(30) The King of England prospering thus, past with his army ouer the * Scottish Sea, where while he kept the feast of Saint John Baptists * at Perth (or Saint Johns Towne) there came messengers from Baliol, and the Lords his factors, to sue for mercy, which was granted vpon condition, that they should render themselves to him as his subiects. * Heitor Boetius saith, that after this agreement (wherein * Anthony Bishop of Durham was vied) John Comin brought Baliol, void of all kingly habiliments with a white rod in his hand, to the English campe at Montror, where hee resigned his whole right that he either had, or might haue to the Crowne of Scotland, into King Edwards hands, and made thereof a formall Charter in French, and at the same time also (for feare of life) gaue his sonne Edward for hostage, and assurance of his fealties; by which final disclaimer, the Lord Bruce right might seeme now vnquestionable. But this resignation being thus made, King Edward returns to Berwick, where * all the Nobles of Scotland (at a Parliament there holden) were sworne to be loyal, and true subiects to King Edward for euer after: and * hereof a solemne instrument was sealed by the said Lords (of whom John Comin of Badenaw was first) bearing date at Berwick in the twentie fifth yeere of the reigne of their Soueraigne Lord King Edward.

(31) John the late King, was sent to the Tower of London, and there was honourably attended, hauing liberty for twenty miles about. The Scottish Lords were confined within Trent, ouer which Riuer they might not passe toward Scotland, vpon paine of life: The custody of Scotland was committed to John de Warren, Earle of Surrey and Suffex, and the Treasurership thereof to Hugh de Cressingham; but William de Ormesby was ordained Iusticiar, with this particular commandement, that hee should take the homages and fealties of all such as held lands of the King. And the more to shew his purpose, vtterly to dissolue the distinct Regality of Scotland, and to write it to the English Monarchie, as hee had done Wales, hee tooke out of Edinburgh the Crowne, Scepter and Cloath of State, offering them vp at * Saint Edwards shrine in Westminster, if the Author mistake not, for at Saint Thomas at Canterbury, * hee offered vp Baliols Crowne saith another, and (besides many other Acts tending to the abolishment of the Scottish Name, which * Heitor relates, as the burning their Records, abrogating their lawes, altering their forms of diuine seruice, and transplanting all their learned men thence vnto his Vniuersity of Oxford.) hee tooke out of the * Abbey of Scene the * Marble Chaire, in which the Kings of Scotland were wont to bee crowned, and sent the same to Westminster, for Priests to sit therein at Celebration. This Chaire is the same vpon which was engrauen, the famous Propheticall Distichon:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunque locatum Inuenient lapidem, regnare tuncntur ibidem,

If Fates goe right, where ere this stone is pight, The Regall race of Scots shall rule that place.

Which by whomsoever it was written, we who now liue, finde it happily accomplished. But these great Acts of this yeere brought to the Commones of England small commodity, vpon whom the charge of the warres lay heauily, and it is not often found, that the people gaine much by their Princes Conquests.

(32) The force of Scotland with a greater force being thus for the present broken, who would suppose, that it could once again haue lifted vp the head, and that chiefly by the particular vertue of a priuate man, as it after hapned? which hee had the more opportunity to doe, for that the King of England was diuerly diuerted by occasion of warres in Gascoigne for recovery of his owne, and for aid of his friends in Flanders, whom the French did afflict in hostile manner. The Captaine of the reuolted troupes in Scotland, was one William Wallace (the sonne of * Sir Andrew Wallace of Cragie Knight, though some * vpon heere say, write contemptibly of his course of life, as of a publike robber) who, by the assistance of such as were outlawed, for refusing to doe their homage to King Edward, draue William de Ormesby (the Kings Iusticiar) out of Scotland. Which King Edward hearing, discharged John Comin of Badenaw, and the Earle of Bucchan from their confinement, to the intent, that hee might by their endeouours, the sooner settle matters, but withall hee gaue John de Warren Earle of Surrey commission to leue an Army: and the king (loath to bee hindered from his other definitions) easily yeilded to such requests as were propounded on the Scots behalfe for that time. The voyage which hee had then in hand, was to transport from Winchelsea an Armie, to assit the Earle of Flanders his confederate.

(33) England at this time was not without great discontentments, which Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex Constable of England, and Roger Bigot Earle of Norfolke, Marshall of England, did countenance; for present satisfaction whereof, the King yeilded (among other things) to confirme * Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, and that * there should no Subsidie nor taxation bee leuied vpon the people, without the consent of the Prelates, Peeres, and people. But before this time, and while the King was absent out of the land, the Scots vnder the leading of * William Wallace, put to * flight, the Earle Warren and all the English Forces which were with him.

of their Monarchie in Britaine, upheld, in some sort, their liberty, when the English had twice by Danes, and Normans, in the meane time, utterly lost it.

(46) Scotland (saith Heftor*) being in this manner subdued and all the strengths of buildings, and the Nobility thereof at King Edwards disposition, he having ordered the affaires thereof as himselfe thought best, left the custodie thereof againe to Seigneur*, and in his triumphall returne through England from Dunfermlin in Scotland where he kept his Christmas, caused the Courts of the Bench, and Elchequer, which had bene seuen yeere kept at Yorke (for the more commoditie of his Scottish expeditions) to be reduced to London, their ancient residence. Moreover he ordained Justitiars for Traillbaston, who were to inquire of man-slaughters, Ruffians*, Disseisors, Boot-halers, Incendiaries, and other perturbors of the common quiet, and them to punish, by fine, death and otherwise, which brought to the Realme much rest, and to the King much riches.

(47) But, the more to secure King Edward in the Scottish kingdom, it was not long, but that William Wallace (whom an Earle of Scotland in the beginning of his resistances had honoured (saith Walsingham) with the girdle of Knight-hood*) was brought vp prisoner to London, being treasonably taken at Glasgow by one Sir John Menteith (though Polydore Vergil* saith the English took him in warre) where he had publicke triall at Westminster, and denying* that he was a Traitor to the King of England, was there for other his crimes (as burning of Townes, taking of Castles, killing the English, &c.) adjudged to death, which sentence was executed vpon him, and his head and quarters set vp in severall places over the land, his right leg at Perth or Saint Johns Towne in Scotland, and his left at Aberdeen. This was the end of Wallace, whom his Country had once by common consent chosen for their defender, and Captaine Generall*, and, for his deserts towards her, doth place in glory farre above the starrs, as the only person, by whose example, the Scots had their spirits kept awake, and quicke vpon all occasions, by which they might recover the Government out of the hands of the English, whose reigne over them this Wallace neither by faire means, nor by force could ever bee drawne to endure, or looke vpon with a patient eie, whom though (with Heftors translation*) we doe not call a Martyr, yet must we thinke his Country honoured in him, wishing many the like in our owne.

(48) Let no man now make doubt to write vp King Edward among the greatest of our English Monarchs, for (besides the whole lands of Britaine and Ireland) hee also held Aquitaine, which about two yeeres before, the King of France (entangled with troubles otherwise) did restore, and the City of Burdeaux of the owne accord submitted it selfe againe to the English Scepter, as that wherewith it had formerlie bene so long, and well acquainted; and to gratifie the same Edward the King of France also banished the Scots out of his dominions. Thus was King Edward possessed of Scotland; which nevertheless (that the world may see Gods hand in translating of Kingdomes, being a point of his prerogative) was not long after plucked from his sonne; and the calamities which the Scots had suffered, whelmed backe vpon the English. Which peculiar art of diuine providence: you will more easily acknowledge, when you shall behould by how naked an instrument he raised againe the Scottish Common-wealth out of that dust, in which for a little season it seemed to lie buried.

(49) Wallace therefore being taken out of the way, the Lord Robert Bruce (betweene whom, and the unfortunate Baliol the maine strife lay for the Diadem) beholding the state of his Country, for which Wallace, without interest to the Crowne thereof, had stood so nobly, and desirous to giue it a new head by making himselfe King (whereto by Baliols surrender his other right was made more passable) had for that purpose entered into a conspiracy with Cumyn, whose disclosure thereof (as Scots doe write) brought into apparent danger the Lord Bruces life, who was then attendant in the Court of England. King Edward vpon the first discovery of the plot not crediting the same, Bruce, most constantly denying it, and calling the accusation, with good probability, vpon Cumyns enuie, had time, and warning to escape. For an Earle (saith Boetius) sent vnto him twelue Striueling pence, and a paire of sharpe spurs, presently vpon his departure from the King, which he wittily interpreted to be a Symbole of speedie flight. According wherunto he forthwith sped from London, where King Edward kept Christmas, shooing his horses backward, that he might not be followed by their prints vpon the snow, and with his owne hand thrust his sword into Cumyn in the Church of the Friars Minors at Dunfermlin in Scotland, whom two of Bruces friends with other mortall thrusts dispatched. Bruce knowing now no way to answer the fact, but by open defection, which he did refuse vpon, did thereupon procure himselfe to be crowned King of Scotland about our Ladies day in March in the Abbey of Scone.

(50) Such an attempt as this could not be long hidden from King Edward, who hauing at the Whitsonide next after honored Edward Prince of Wales, his eldest sonne, with the order of Knighthood at London, sent him against King Robert into Scotland, attended with a troupe of noble young gentlemen, Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke; Robert de Clifford, and Henry de Percie being gone before with an Armie, and King Edward preparing to come after, appointing the Remedeous of his owne host to beat Carleil. Where, in a Parliament, besides prouisions for the warres, sundry consultations and courses were entred, for repelling another kind of enemye no lesse dangerous to the State, to wit, the Pope, and his still continued extorsions in this Land whereof greuous complaints were made in that Assembly; and both the Clergy there appealed* from the Popes Bull, and his Cardinal-Legats exactions: and also the Kings Councell was driven to enact some orders for bridling their excessive depilations.

(51) Meane time Aymery de Valence at Perth in Scotland had put to flight King Robert Bruce, & pursued him so neer, that he tooke his wife, his brother Nigelus, and others, but himselfe escaped into the most fles of Scotland. This handle taken at the entrance to his Regalltie, draue his people into such despaire of his future better fortunes, that there remained only two friends vnto him, the Earle of Lenox, and Gilbert Haythe rest, as the Earle of Athol, at London, (who had twise reuoluted) and his brother Nigelus at Berwick, were put to death as all others his chiefe partakers were, or else kept prisoners in England. In which number was King Roberts wife (daughter to the Earle of Vester in Ireland) and his daughter, the Bishops of Glasgow, and Saint Andrewes, the Abbot of Scone and others. The Countesse of Buequhan, sister to the Earle of Fife (then absent in England at his mannor of Whitwick in Leicestershire, whose office it was to haue crowned the Scottish King) was also taken; and because (in her brothers absence) shee had stolne from the Earle her husband, with all his great horse, to set the Diadem vpon Bruces head, it was deuised that shee should be set in a wooden Cage (made Crowne*-wife) vpon the wals of Berwick Castle, for all to wonder at. This ridiculous reuenge was held sufficient, without taking her life, though shee were a manlike woman, and did herein but the part of a noble spirited Lady. Thus was King Robert (saith the Scottish translation* of Boetius) brought to such misery, that hee was sometime naked and hungry without meat, or drinke, saw only water and roots of herbs, and his life perpetually in danger. Howbeit, hee neuer forsooke himselfe, but as one that had firme trust in God, cherished an hope in his minde, at one time or other to recover the Crowne. In which condition hee exhibited himselfe so noble a spectacle as in which which euen the mortal* Heathen doe teach, that the Gods themselves took pleasure; how then can Christians looke off? Certainly, all generous spirits, whom cruell injuries oppress, haue reason to dwell in this patternne of Christian magnanimity and patience.

(52) King Edward also on the other side (like a Christian Prince) as hee had some yeeres before, by his speciall letters (directed to the Archbishoppe of Canterbury,) requested that publicke prayers should be made to Almighty God for him, his Realme and people, that the heavenly Maiesty would direct his way and workes to the glory of his holy name, and advancement of the Kingdomes; so now repayed hee with his Lords to Westminster, after this discomfite of his enemies, there solemnly to render vnto God his humble thanks for the Conquest, wherof hee thus held himselfe assured. Which confidence drew him on so farre, that now (his turns being serued, as he thought against the Scots) hee refused to stand to the confirmation which hee had made to the Barons, of such lawes and liberties as haue before bene mentioned, pretending that they had forced his consent: and doubtles, as great was the Kings fault thus to renounce what hee had solemnly sworne, (though indeed it was on some necessity and enforcement*) so the Popes warranting thereof (which certainly encouraged the King therunto) is most execrable, who afterward absolved him (as other Popes had done to his Predecessors) from obseruance of that oath.

(54) That he should be mercifull, iust and courteous, constant in word and deed, familiar to the good, and toward such as were in distresse alwaies pitifull. That* after his death he should not hasten to take the Crowne of England, till hee had honourably reuenged the injuries of his Father, and accomplished the present seruice. That hee should carry his Fathers bones about with him in some coffin, till hee had marched through all Scotland, and subdued all his enemies, for that none should bee able to overcome him while his Skeleton marched with him. Moreover, hee commanded the said Prince to loue his Brethren, Thomas* and Edmund*; but specially to tender and respect his mother Queene Margaret. That* vpon paine of his malediction, and curse, hee should not presume without common consent to repeale Piers de Gaueslon, who for abusing the tender yeeres of the Prince with wicked vanities, by common decree was banished. That whereas himselfe, by the continuall; and new attempts of Bruce, could not in person (according to his vow) make warre in the Holy-land, therefore hee should fend his Heart thither, accompanied with seuen score Knights, and their retinues, for whose support hee had prouided thirty & two thousand pounds of siluer. That his Hart being so by them conuayed, hee did hope in God, that all things there would prosper with them. Lastly, That vpon paine of eternall damnation, on the said money should not be expended vpon any other uses.

vident was hee to the very end of his late affaires) the marriage with the French Kings Daughter, which had bene formerly agreed vpon between the Parents; hee advanced neerer to the enemy vnto Burgh upon Sands, where his lingering Discontent encreased (for that was the sickness wherof hee died, though one maliciously sayth, hee died suddenly, without shew of repentance for his finnes) hee tooke his leau* of this world, after no lesse preparation (no doubt) for his owne soules health, then careful premonition for the carriage of his sonne, and ordering of his Kingdom. Which pious Prince raigne and life, we cannot here shut vp with a nobler Euloge, then that wherewith our Great and Iudicious Antiquary hath already depicted him, as a Prince of chiefe renowne, to whose heroicke mind God proportioned (as a most worthy mansion) a body amforable, so that as well in beauty and goodly presence, as in wisdom and valour, hee was suitable to the height of his Regall Dignity, whose flourishing youth his Destinie did exercise with many warres and troubles of the State, so to frame and fite him for the Britis Empire; which, being King, hee managed with the glory of his Welsh and Northern victories, that by due desert hee is to bee reputed a chiefe honour of Britannie.

D. 1317. was buried at the Gray-Fryers in London before the Altar in the Quire which her selfe had built.

His Issue.

(58) Iohn the eldest sonne of King Edward and Queene Eleanor was borne at Windsor in the raigne of King Henry his Grandfather, before his Fathers voyage into Syria, and in his absence, was committed to the charge of Richard King of Romans, his great vnclie, and others, who procured principall men of euery Hundred in each County within the Realme, to sweare their fealty to his father and him, but hee died shortly after, being a Child, & was buried at Westminster by the wall, betwene S. Edmunds and S. Bennets Chappell, August 8. in the last yeere of King Henry his Grandfathers raigne; there is remaining ouer him a Tombe of Marble inlaid with his picture in an Archedoier.

(59) Henry the second sonne of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, deceased also being a Child, the newes of whose death was brought to his Father, being then in the Isle of Sicill in his returne from the Holy Land, not long before the report of his owne fathers death came to his knowledge: he was buried in Saint Peters Church at Westminster, the twentieth day of November, in the first year of his Fathers reign, Ann. Dom. 1272. in the same place, and vnder the same Tombe where his brother John lies with his picture also in the Arch about it.

(60) Alphons, the third sonne of Edward and Queene Eleanor was borne at the Towne of Maine in Gascogne, as his father and mother were in their returne towards England from Jerusalem, November 23. in the second yeare of his fathers reign, 1273. hee deceased at Windsor, August 4. in the twelfth yeere of his age, 1285. and was buried at Westminster in Saint Peters Church by Saint Bennets Chappell, where his body lieth vnder the Tombe of his Brothers, John and Henry, his Image also there portraied with theirs.

Edmundsburie* in Suffolke, hath recorded in his booke of English Annales, but other mention there is none, but onely from him: whereby it is likely that shee did not lue to be married, but that shee died in her childhood.

(66) Alice the fiftth Daughter of king Edward and Queene Eleanor, is by Thomas Pickering of the Monastery of Whitby (who wrote the large Genealogie of the Kings of England and their issue) reported to haue deceased without Issue.

September 8. shee was made a Nunne in the Monastery of Ambresberie in Wiltshire, at the instance of Queen Eleanor her Grandmother, who at that time liued there in the habite of the same profession, although her Parents were hardly enduced to yeeld their consents to that course.

(69) Beatrice, the eight daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, bare the name of Beatrice Dutchesse of Britannie her fathers sister: she is by some Genealogists mentioned to haue liued till shee was marriageable, but yet no mention being made of her match it seemeth shee died unmarried.

left to the disposition of the King his father. He had two wiues, of which the first was Alice the daughter of Sir Roger Hayles of Harwich in Suffolk, by whom hee had issue Edward, who married Beatrice the daughter of Roger Mortimer the first, Earle of March, but hee died before his father without Issue, and two daughters, Margaret twice married, first to John Lord Segrave, by whom shee had Elizabeth Dutchesse of Norfolke, wife of John Lord Montbray (from whom the Montbrayes & Howards Dukes of Norfolke, and Earles Marshall descended), secondly, to Sir Walter Manny a Knight of Cambray, and by him had Anne wife of John Hastings the elder Earle of Pembroke, and mother of Earle John the younger, that died without Issue; his yongest daughter Alice was married to Sir Edward Montacute, and had by him three daughters, Elizabeth and Joan married to Walter and William two of the Wiffords, and Maud that died unmarried. This Earle Edmund was beheaded at Winchester the 19. of March, in the fourth yeere of King Edward his Nephew.

Edward.II.

EDVVARD THE SECOND.LORD OF IRELAND, AND DVKE OF AQVIL-TAINE, &c. THE FORTIE-EIGHTH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XI.

Hat the Mind is not deriued from Parents, certainly the second Edward (called of Caernarvon) might (if nothing else) abundantlie shew, being of a most valiant, wife and fortunate father, an vnlike sonne; yet not to beginne our description of his courses, with prejudice of his person, we will so temper our stile, that by his owne actions sincerely related, rather then by any verball censures the man may be iudged. This cannot be denied, that whereas from the Conquest till his time, England thought endured (by Gods iust iudgements) many bitter, sad and heavy stormes through some headinesse, ambition, or other sicknesses of mind in the Princes thereof, yet had the Men to sway and gouerne her, and those distempers were as the perturbations incident to vigorous dispositions; whereas vnder this Edward, who could neither get nor keepe, it seemed to endure the leuities of a Child, though his yeeres, being about twenty and three, might haue exempted him from so great infancie of iudgement, as his raigne discovered.

(2) Neuer came Prince to the crowne with more generall applause then he: so great hopes of doing well, his Victorious father, Edward of Winchester had left vpon him, besides the right of succession, whose last warning and terrible adiuations you haue heard: with the vtr contempt and breach whereof, to the destruction of himselfe, and his friends, hee in a manner auspicated his gouernement.

(3) After that Edward had in his best maner provided for the affaires of Scotland, where (at Dumfries) many of the Scottish Lords did their homage to him, as they had to his Father; the first taske which hee gaue of his future behauiours at home, was a rigorous reuenge taken by him vpon Walter de Langton Bishoppe of Chester, Treasurer of England, and principall Executor of the last Will of the deceased King, whose body was not as yet interred, but by the care of the Executors, conuied with funnall pompe to Wallingford, and (after sixteen weekes) to Wallingford, where vnder a plaine monument the same at this present rests. The Bishoppes crime was a kind of good freedom, which hee vsed in the late Kings daies, in grauely reprouing the Prince for his misdemeanors, and shortning his waste of coine by a frugall moderation; and particularly, for that he had complained of Peirs Gaussefion, whereupon ensued Prince Edwards imprisonment, and the others banishment, and therefore comming now to the Crowne, hee arrested the Bishoppe by Sir John Felton Constable of the Tower, and imprisoned him in Wallingford Castle, seising vpon all his temporall goods and credites, there being not a man in the Realme who durst speake a word on his behalfe, (so great displeasure hee had conceived, seeking vterly to ruine him) till afterward by means of the Papall authority, hee was restored, and in a faint sort reconciled.

(4) The thing which suited best with his youthful affections, to wit, the marriage of young Isabel, daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France, he performed with wonderfull magnificence at Boleyn, at which solemnity were present besides all others, The King of France Father to the Bride; The King of Nauarre his sonne; The King of Almaine; The King of Scill; Marie Queene of France; Margaret Queene Dowager of England, her daughter; The Queene of Nauarre. There was also present (as no Sunne-shine but hath shadow) Peirs of Gaussefion, the beloued Minion of this Edward, whose reentertainment the dying King had so seriously forbidden, whom notwithstanding, together with his own new wife, he brought into England.

(5) This fatal fauourite of this young King was a stranger borne, but a Gentleman, and (in regard of good seruice done by the Father of Peirs in Gascogne, brought vp (at old king Edwards owne appointment) with this Prince: from whom not to derogate in any point, as if hee had without some appearances of worth and value embraced Peirs, it is certaine (by that which a Knight and seruitor of this very King hath left written) that he had a sharpe witte in a comely shape, and briefly, was such an one, as wee vie to call very fine; Neither yet was he vnhardie in Arms, but of commendable performance, whereof (saith de la Moore) hee gaue proofe against the Scots, (to whom hee was alike hateful as to the English) till hee was recalled to satisfe such as (saith their Courtier) did enue his graces, and good success; but of his Christian or morall vertues (which onely make men truly commendable) there is great silence in Authors, though not of his vices, whereof wee shall haue occasion enough to speake hereafter.

(6) At the Coronation of the King and Queen, (which the Lords would haue empeached, had hee not promised reasonably to satisfie them about Gaussefion) none was neerer to Peirs in brauery of apparel, or delicacie of fashion, which (and for that the King gaue him S. Edwards Crowne to carrie in that pompe,) greatly increased the offence of the Lords against him: But hee that (hauing a King to backe him) knew no other means to extinguish hatred, but by daring it to the vttermost, spared not afterwarde to scoffe and reproach the principall Peeres, calling Thomas Earle of Lancaster, Stage-plaier; Amerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Tospe the Jew, because hee was pale and tall; and Guy Earle of Warwicke, the blacke doge of Arden: all whom, and others, hee at a Turnement by him proclaimed and holden, handled vilely.

(7) But King Edward was dayly more and more possessed with the familiarity of Peirs, who to establish his interest in the vnprudent Prince, by sensuallities and riotous practices, filled the Court with buffons, parasites, and the like pernicious instruments, drawing Edward from the thought of al great enterprises, in accomplishment of his fathers will, or discharge of his particular dutie, to all sorts of vnworthy vanities, and sinfull delights; while himselfe in the meane space reuelled in all outward felicity, wasting the riches of the Kingdome, or conuerting them to his priuate vies. For (fearing belike that the time might come againe to vndergoe banishment) hee transported much treasure into forraine parts, and much hee had to transport; for not onely by the sale of his fauour with the King, to which there was no speeding approach but by Gaussefion, (who vsed to peize the gifts, more then the causes) but also by the kings prodigality, hee had whatsoeuer could be powred vpon him: for (though it might seeme incredible) hee both gaue him his iewels and ancestors treasure, and even the Crowne it selfe of his victorious fathers, not sticking to professe, that (if it lay in him) hee should succeed him in the kingdome.

(8) The Lords (who for reuerence of the King face downe by their priuate iniuries, in hope there would be a season, in which their Soueraign might by timelie and sweet admonitions recouer the vse of himselfe,) not thinking it tollerable to bee now any longer silent, (and the rather, lest that Peirs, farther abusing his greatnesse, should bring in Forreiners, not onely to the prejudice of the English lawes and customes, but of their authority also and places,) preuailed so much with the King, in a Parliament holden at London (where sundry prouisions concerning the liberties of the people, and execution of Iustice, were enacted, and by corporall oath confirmed by the King himselfe,) that among them, the decree of Gaussefions perpetuall banishment, was by the king (ouercome with a meere necessity for satisfaction of the Kingdome, to whom the said Earle of Cornwall was odious) vnwillingly suffered to passe; and the king was thereupon regratified with a Subsidie of the twentieth part of the subiects goods. The king also rooke his Oath not to reuoke the said Earle of Cornwall fro banishment (if it may be called a banishment) wherein hee had the kingdom of Ireland entrusted to his charge, and forthe securing thereof against rebels, was furnished with men & money by the king.

(9) Yet forgetting, that those affections, which oftentimes deserue praise in a priuate person, are subiect to much construction in a publike, and neglecting both his deceased fathers so solemn adiuations, and also his owne oath, as carelesse of the sequele, hee calls Earle Peter home, with whose loue hee was most fondly, and most passionatellie transported, and (as if hee had recieued some diuine benefite) gaue him most ioyous welcome at the Castle of Flint in Northwales, and bestowed vpon him for wife Isabel of Acre, Countesse of Glocester his sisters daughter, resolving with himselfe to retaine his Gaussefion, maugre all his Earles and Barons, or (for the loue of him) to put his Crowne and life in perill when time should serue. In which, whether the king or his fauourite shewed lesse discretion, it is not at the first sight easily determinable; it being as vnlike for the one, with so offensive behauiour, to affect immoderate shew and vse of grace, as for the other, to the injury of his name and realme to bestow the same.

(10) The contemptibillitie and vanitie of this effeminate argument detaines vs longer, then for the qualitie thereof were fitting, did not so much mischief issue out of it. For Peirs (of his owne nature insolent) being thus (about reason, or his own daringes) advanced to alliance with the bloud royall, was so far from all amendment, as hee rather seemed to strue to outgoe himselfe in his former courses, consuming so much of the kings treasure and meanes, that he had not wherewith to defray ordinarie charges.

ges, or to pay for the necessities of his Court. The young Queene also tooke herselfe not to be a little wronged by this vngacious mans predominance, & thereof sent her complaints to the king of France her father, which concerned injuries in the highest kind, as in her bed (the King being drawne by Gauelson to *adultery) and in her honour and *mainenance. Whereupon the Peeres of the land, animated by the King of France, so confidently dealt with Edward, that his Earle now the third time did abjure the Realme: but (the King of France and his enemies making foraine parts vnfore to him to abide in) he returned in Christmas to the general perturbation of the Kingdom, and to his owne certaine ruine, for that the Barons (his aduersaries) had gotten him banished with this Prouiso, * that if at any time afterward hee were taken in England, hee should be forthwith apprehended and suffer death. But an Angell from heauen could not seeme more welcome, then this most faithful friend (as that * Courtier calls him) was vnto King Edward, who * forthwith advanced him to be his principall Secretary.

(11) Vpon report of Gauelsons returne, the chiefe Lords, atwell Ecclesiasticall as temporall (Walter Bishope of Coutree excepted, * who allowed the Kings affections towards Gauelson, and procured him to breake the former agreements, which were made and sworne in the Parliament at London,) consulted vpon a deperat course of reformation in this point, and made choise of Thomas Earle of Lancaster to be their leader. This Thomas was sonne of Edmund Earle of Lancaster, Leicester and Ferrers, second sonne of Henry the third King of England, and in right of his wife (after her fathers decaile, which hapned about this time) Earle of Lincolne, Salisbury, and (besides many other great Lands in Yorkshire, Cumberland, and Wales) hee had the Earledome of * Artoys in Picardy, so that without comparison hee was the greatest lubiect of the Kingdom.

(12) The Issue of which combination before we pursue, wee may nohere in our way ouerslippe a strange alteration both here in England, and in all Christendome, by the vniuersall extinguishment of the Order of the Templars, wrought about this time by the procurement of the French King, who being so gracious with Pope Clement, that formerly * hee sent Ambassadors to craue of his holinesse with great importunity, that the bones of his Predecessor Pope Boniface might be burnt as being an Heretike, so now also hee so farre prevailed with him, that in the Councell at Vienna this so highly esteemed Order, was vpon clear prooffe of their generally odious finnes, and scarce credible impieties, vtterly abolished through Christendome. The French King * caused 54. of that Order, together with their Great Maister to be burnt at Paris; and though that King hoped to conuert all the Lands of that Societie to his sonnes vse, whom hee intended to make King of Ierusalem; yet the Pope and Councell annexed their possessions to the Order of the Knights Hospitallers, called commonly Knights of the Rhodes. Notwithstanding, in England (where such Papall commands were not always for lawes) the heires of the Donours, and such as had endowed the Templars here with landes, entred vpon those parts of their ancient Patrimons, after the dissolution of the Order, and (saith our * Courtier) detained them vntill not long after, they were by Parliament wholly transferred vnto the Knights of the Rhodes, * or of S. Iohn of Ierusalem.

(13) King Edward was now at York, and Earle Thomas, according to that which had bene concluded among the combined Lords, who refused to trie all extremities, rather then any longer to endure Peirs Gauelson, as being perswaded while that King-bane breathed, peace could neither be maintained in the Realme, nor the King abound in treasure, nor the Queene enioy his loue) sent humble * petitions by honourable messengers to their Soueraigne, requesting him to deliuer the man into their hands, or to driue him from his company out of England. But the selfe-wild King * preferring the dearenesse of one stranger before the loue of the whole Realme, would not condescend.

(14) Afterward, Peirs (whom * the Earles pursued with an Armie) being * entrusted for his safeguard to Amerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, was left by him but one night at a Village or Manour called Datbington betwene Oxford and Warwicke, (being a place neither * farre enough off, nor strong enough) pretending to haue conuained him on the next day to the Castle of Wallingford, the said Amerie in the meane space departing to lodge with his Countesse, who lay hard by: but, the said Amerie conuiuing thereat (as our * Courtier chargeth him, who also writes, that hee tooke a solemne oath before the king to doe his best to safe-conduct Gauelson, the king purposing in the meane time to labour his peace with the Lords * vpon any conditions) Guy Earle of Warwicke with his people surprised him the same night, and took him to his Castle of Warwicke, where in a place called Blacklow (afterward * Gauelhead) his head was stricken off at the commandement * and in the presence of the Earles of Lancaster, Warwicke, and Hereford, * as of one that had bene a subcort of the lawes and an open Traitor to the Kingdom. In which bold attempt, themselves (who yet pretended so much standing for the liberties of the land,) did most vnadvisedly infringe a Capitall branch of the same Franchise, in putting to death an Earle, and so deare a friend of the Kings, * without any iudicial proceeding by trial of his Peeres, which caused a lasting hatred betwixt the King and his Nobles.

(15) There wanted nothing now to King Edward but present meanes to reuenge the blood of his friend, or rather of his halfe-selfe, the lacke wherof did encrease the sorrow hee tooke for his death, which being well knowne to the Lords, they refused not to lay downe Armes, till they had provided for their security, and the performance of all such points, as concerned the temperance of the Regall power, that (vnder colour thereof) the Nobles themselves might finger some part of the Soueraigne government. The King was then at London, and the Lords at Dunstable: but by the continual interdealings of the Prelates, and of Gilbert Earle of Glocester, who stood neutral, the kindling disputes were for the present allayed, vpon condition that the Lords should restore to the King all such things, once belonging to Peirs Gauelson, as they had taken at Newcastle, which they accordingly did.

(16) King Edward neuertheless, as if his soule were ouercast with some blacke cloud, continued mourning, till it pleased God to enlighten the world with the birth of a young Prince, whose noble Acts did afterward redeme all the blemishes wherewith his Fathers infelicities had darkened the brightnesse of the English name, and at this present cleared the mind of the sorrowfull King his father: for * vpon Saint Brices day, Isabel his Queene brought forth her first sonne at Winford, which caused great reioycing through the Kingdom. Her French kindred and friends (which were therein in good numbers of either sexe) & among them as chiefe, the Queens owne brother, Lewis the French Kings sonne, would haue had the Infant at his Baptisme named Lewis, but the English Lords would * not permit, who therefore was after his Fathers and Grandfathers name, called Edward. This was hee who afterward rayed the honour of English Cheualrie to so high a point, by his famous victories in France and elsewhere.

(17) The euill will which the King bare in his mind against the Barons for their ouer-ruling his affections, and the death of Gauelson, by sundry bad offices and sycophancies of the * French at Winford was rubd so hard vpon, that it grew raw againe before it was halfe healed. Therefore in a Parliament at London the king sharply charged those presumptuous Lords with their contempt against him in the spoiles they had committed at Newcastle, and (which most afflicted his languishing spirit) in taking, and wickedly killing Peirs Gauelson. To all which, they stoutly answered, * that they had not offended in any point, but deserued his roial fauour, for that they had not gathered force against him, but against the publicke enemy of the Realme, &c. Howbeit, to prevent the feared mischief of ciuill Armes, by the working of the young Queene, of the Prelates, and Earle of Glocester, the Lords in open Court at Westminster humbled themselves to the King, praying grace; and the King granted to such of them, as would desire the same, his gracious pardon. The whole house of Parliament seeing the kings wants, of their own accord granted a Fifteenth & all parts hereupon returned with ioy and peace, but not long after the Lord Guy de Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke, who in this Parliament was appointed to be Priue Councell with the King, deceased, being (as by the Barons well-willers * it was said) impoisoned by such of the Kings secret friends as did maligne him.

(18) The mischieuous effects of the Kings former misgovernment, beganne now most perillously to discouer themselves. For the Scots his neighbours, who could not bee ignorant of all such griefes and maladies as fettered in the heart and entrails of England, had long since made their timely vse thereof, adhering so to the vndaunted Bruce, that by degrees hee had gotten a great strength, and was againe publickly receiued, and obied for King of Scotland, from most places whereof hee * draue the English, and (in contempt of Edward) committed great spoile by slaughter of People, burning of Townes in Northumberland, and other Acts of hostility. The principall charge of Scotland for King Edward had bene entrusted to the Lord John Cumina Scot, Earle of Buggham, whom * King Robert had vanquished in battell, and was now (while Edward fate bewitched with most vnworthy languishments) grown potent, sending his Brother Edward Bruce to besiege the Castle of Strirling, which was in the hands of the English.

(19) The King of England awakened out of his slumbers with these Alarums, marched thereupon with a very great Armie toward the said Castle. It pleased Hector Boetius (putting off, as it were the Historian) to report maruellous things of the numbers of Souldiers which came with King Edward in this iourney; for (if he say true) there were not fewer then one hundred and fifty thousand horsemen, and as many thousand footmen; and that we may not suspect the multitude to be far greater then either the cause required, or the realm of England could well afford, hee informeth vs, that besides the English there were in his aid at this time, Hollanders, Zelanders, Brabanters, Flemings, Picards, Bolonsers, Gascognes, Normans, with much people of many other Regions; and that besides these three hundred thousand men of warre, there were infinite families with their women, children, seruants, and household-stuffe: but because other Writers doe ingenuously grant, and containe probable matter enough for the honour of the Scottish Nation in this iourney, wee will as neare as wee can, (being things to vs neither vp nor downe, in regard of the long time since these hostilities hapned,) truly and freely, though briefly informe our selues hereof.

(20) The Earles of Lancaster, Warren, Warwicke, and Arundel (the greatest Peeres of the land) refused to attend their King in this seruice, for that hee had delayed to ratifie the points of their desired liberties, and prouisions for the pretended better government of England, by himselfe so often consented vnto. In whichas their loyall affection cannot bee much admired: so it is certaine, that King Edward hereby vnderooke that voyage with farr the lesse force eyther of men or counsell. Neuertheless his hoate was great enough (if numbers did sway in such affaires, more then religion, discipline, and valour,) to haue effected more then it selfe did suffer. But King Edward and his people rather seemed to goe toward a wedding or a Triumph, then to a battell, * adorning themselves with all sorts of riches, gold, silver, and the like toies, in a kind of wanton manner, correspondent to the humour of the Prince whom they followed.

(21) In this iourney it was made manifest, what true and sober valiance could effect against light brauery and insolvency. King Robert lodged with his forces (being inferior in numbers to the English) not farre off, where was nothing but a religious, * deuout and modest care, quickned (after manifold calamities, with a most noble desire to recouer the libertie of their Country, and to settle the same into the hope whereof they were the rather erected by a fresh victorie, which they had obtained that day vpon certaine of the English * horsemen. King Edward on the contrary part nothing esteeming so light a preface, reioiced vpon the very next (being Midsummer, or Saint Iohn Baptists day) to take a terrible reuenge vpon the Scots: but how to effect the same the care was not excessive; for in his Campe, * Wassails, and Drinkehailes were thundered extraordinarily, as accounting themselves sure of the victory: which kind of impious selfe-trust, if God Almighty did not sometime scourge with iust and terrible confusions, what outrages would not be executed.

(22) Farre otherwise the Bruces Army: which by his commandement spent * the euening in making humble confession of their finnes, that they might (saith our Author) bee ready on the morrow to receiue the blessed Sacrament, as accordingly they did: Moreover to leaue nothing vndone which might aduance their cause; the Scots had digged before their Battalions, certaine * trenches or dikes * three foot deepe, and three foot broad, which (hauing fixed * sharpe stakes in them with their points vprward) they couered so with * hurdles, that footemen treading warily) might passe, but not groupes of horse. Next to Gods anger against the English, (whom courtly Pride and Sloth had now effeminated) this stratageme was the cause of their ruine: for whereas they reposed much vpon their Cauallerie, in these Pit-falles, the fury of their charge was intercepted and broken, the riders being miscerably slaine by the Scots, whom King Robert marching foremost on foot, had presented most courageously to the enemy.

(23) The King of England not altogether careless, neither yet by his careable to doe much (as one whom God was not well pleased with) had ordered his battels with some aduise, but vpon the dismal and vnexpected discomfiture of his horse in those mischieuous holes or ditches, was enforced, (after some troubled resistance) to leaue to the Scots the greatest victory that euer they had before or after. * Hardly could K. Edward bee drawne to flie: the courage which it became such a Monarch to haue then first disclosing it selfe, till by his friends hee was enforced to seeke his preservation by that more necessary then noble meanes, and with him (besides others) the Lord Hugh Spencer (whom our * Courtier calls a saunt hearted Kne) betooke himselfe to like remedie.

(24) All things proued vnfortunate to the English in this iorney, for when they perceived their Cauallerie thus miserably ouerthrowne in the ditches, they shot their arrowes compasse, with purpose to kill or gall such Scots as came to the execution, but did them little or no harme, as they who were armed in the fore-parts, and in stead of that, * flew their friends, whose backs being toward them were vnarmed.

(25) The losse fell much vpon the Noblest, for there were slaine in this Battell, * Gilbert Earle of Glocester (a man of singular valour and wisdom) the Lord

Robert de Clifford, and besides other Lords, about 1500 men hundred Knights, Esquiers, and men of Armories. Of these the slaughter could not be but great, though much the less, in regard the Scots fought on foot. Heffor saith, that there were not slain fewer than fifty thousand English, no Writer else, that hitherto we can meet with, exceeds the fifth part of that number; the riches gotten by spoils and ransomes of the English, were doubtlesse very great. Among the number of prisoners, the principall was Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, but recovered afterward by exchange for King Robert's wife, who all this while was detained in England. This battell was fought at Banocksbourne neere Struelin in Scotland.

* Tpd. Neuf.

(26) From this overthrow King Edward escaping to Berwick, King Robert (who to his great glory, as hauing himselfe bene trained vp among the English, vsed such as were taken prisoners with singular humanity) sent thither to him the bodies of the Earle of Gloster, & Lord Clifford, that they might receiue honourable interment among their owne friends. But Edward (vnder whole vnfortunate leading the English name sustained so great dishonour and damage) withdrew to Torke, resolving (therein only Princelike) to assemble new force, and either to be reuenged, or to die. But *all enterprises and attempts of that nature miscarried, for about twelue yeeres after, insomuch that great feare reigned among the Northern English, who lay open to the first brunts and violences of the Scots, ouer whom many faire dayes shone. And to augment the calamities of the North, many of the disloiall English * conspired with the enemy, and jointly spoiled the west parts of Northumberland, nothing being secure, but that which was defended.

The worst estate of England vnder the three plagues of Sword, death and pestilence.

(27) God, to humble the English, who through long prosperities had forgotten both themselves & him, drew not backe his heauy hand so; for seldom hath so terrible a famine bene heard of here, as succeeded to this overthrow: so that for moderation of prices, a Parliament was assembled at London: but (saith Walsingham) as if God had bene displeased at the said rates (which not long after were repealed) things grew scarier day by day: and the dearth was generally such, that vpon Saint Laurences Eue, there was scarcely bread to be gotten for sustentation of the Kings owne family. This famine which lasted about two yeeres was accompanied with much mortality of people.

Gauelsons funerals.

(28) But neither the dishonours taken in Scotland, nor innumerable afflictions and discontentments at home, made Edward suspend the celebration of his Gauelsons funerals; whose Body with great pompe hee caused to be transferred from the place of his former buriall, (which was among the Friers Preachers at Oxford) to Kings-Langley in Hertfordshire, where hee in person with the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, four Bishoppes, many Abbots, and principall Churchmen did honour the exequies, but few were present of the Nobility, whose great stomackes would not giue them leaue to attend. Somewhat also to fifteen these generall acerbities, Lewelin Bren and his two sonnes, were brought vp prisoners to London, hauing burnt many towns vpon the Marches, and committed some murders with their Welsh adherents.

(29) Meane-while the state of the Kingdome was miserable, there being no loue betwixt the King and the Peeres, nor any great care in him or them of the common affaires; neuertheless they assembled at a Parliament in London, where no great matter was concluded: for the famine and pestilence encreased. The famine was growne so terrible, that horse, dogs, yeomen and children were skorne for food, and (which is horrible to thinke) the theecues newly brought into the Gaoles, were torne in peeces, and eaten presently halfe aliue, by such as had been longer there. In London it was proclaimed, that no corne should be conuerted to Brewers vses, which Aet the King (moued with compassion toward his Nation) imitating, caused to be executed through all the Kingdome; otherwife (saith Walsingham) the greater part of the people had died with penury of bread. The bloudie flux or disenterie caused through raw and corrupt humors engendred by euil meat and diet, raged euery where, and together with other maladies brought such multitudes of the poorer sort to their end, that the liuing could scarce suffice to bury the dead.

An.D. 1317.

(30) The King was now in so great dislike and distrust with the Lords and Barons, that they would not appeare at Clarendon, where hee held a great Councell. To augment this fatalle auersion, a certaine Knight belonging to John Earle Warren, stole away from Cansford in Dorsetshire, the wife of Thomas Earle of Launcester (chiefe of the Lords faction) not without the Kings consent (as it was said) and brought her to the said Earle Warrens Castle at Rigate, with great pompe, and in despite of the Earle, whom one Richard de Saint Maurice, a wretched, lame, and bunched Dwarf challenged for wife, pretending that he was formerly contracted, and had lien with her, which the (the greatest and noblest Inheretrix of her time) did openly confesse, to her immortal infamie, incurring alas (saith Walsingham) the publike note of a most filthie strumpet. This deformed Elfe (hauing mighty seconds) durst hereupon claime the Earldomes of Lincolne and Salisbury as in her right, and in the meane time, the name and honor of Thomas the great Earle was baffled, as it were, by a light and wicked woman.

(31) The parts of England beyond Humber, were now more and more afflicted; for such as till then had opposed themselves against the Scots in defence of the Country, perceiving all things left at large, in stead of Protectors became Tyrants, * saith our Author, of defenders, destroyers, and of valiant Champions, treacherous Chapmen; so that as betwixt the hammer and the anuile, the Scots vpon the one side, and these false English on the other, all was lamentable, and brought in a manner to nothing; and this face of things continued there about foure yeeres.

* Tho. Wallf.

(32) Neither did the King seeme to haue any will or power to relieue the common calamities, but rather to conuert his whole both wits and forces vpon reuenges against the Lords, who vnder pretence of their extorted prouisions, manifestly withdrew their loues, seruice and duties from him, wherefore feeling himselfe thus weak and diffurnished, hee soughte the spirituall assistance of Pope John the two and twentieth, who thereupon sent certaine Cardinals to set all things in quiet without bloodshed. Betwixt the King and Earle of Launcester they established a peace, who, in a certaine plaine neere Leicester met, embraced and kissed each other, but when they could not worke the like with the Scots, they put that Country vnder Interdict.

D. 1321.

(33) For they (as it is the manner of prosperity) after the victory at Banocksbourne, which clearly got them Scotland, did beginne to bethinke themselves of gaining new Empire in Ireland. Thither Edward Bruce Brother of King Robert had passed with an Army, procuring himselfe to be crowned King thereof by fauour of some of the Irish Nobility, whom neuertheless about three yeeres from his first entrance, the English vnder the conduct of the Archbishoppe of Armagh, and of John Lord Brinningham Iusticiar of Ireland, valiantly encountered, where, together with his late vsurped Kingdome, hee lost his life. There were slain in that battell many honourable Scots, besides the new King Edward, and about 50000 others: his head was cut off * at Dundalk (saith Walsingham) but Heffor Boetius writes that hee was slain in the battell itselfe. Thus did God temper one with another, and the iust reioycement which the Scots had conceiued of their so happie victory ouer the English at Banocksbourne, was soured with this loss.

(34) But King Robert (as a most expert and vigilant Prince) did not suffer this ioy to continue long to the English, for by practise with one * Peter Spalding to whom King Edward had entrusted the keeping of Berwick, hee recovered it from the English, saith * Harding, by treaitie, Peace, Spalding, and treasons; after it had remained twenty yeeres in their possession; which when King Edward thought to haue wonne againe, the Scots diuerted him from the siege, with incursions and slaughters of his people in other parts of England, not failing much of surprising the Queene in a village not farre from Torke, where the sojournd during the siege at Berwick, the plot being laid, and drawne between the Scots and some perfidious English, whom King Robert had monied for that purpose. But Spalding after the treason done had the reward of a * Traitor, for King Robert put him to death.

(35) To giue some breathings after these so manifold troubles, a truce was agreed vpon and confirmed betwixt the two Kings of England and of Scotland, for the space of two yeeres, which brought forth confusion and not refreshment. For thus it happened; The King vpon the commendation of the * Lords themselves, had made Hugh de Spenser Lord Chamberlaine, who being at the least of equal insolence, vices, and ambition to Gauelson, so wrought that hee succeeded in short time to all the graces of familiarity and power which euer Gauelson enioyed, as in like sort to all his hatred and enuie. Hugh his father an ancient Knight, the better to strengthen his sonnes courses, was likewise imploied, and grew in special fauour with the King, who afterward also created him Earle of Winchester, but the father in manners unlike to the sonne, was ruined rather by a natural tendernes, then any malicious will. The sonne, as hee was of shape most loosely, so the verie spirit selfe of pride and rapine, carried him to all sorts of intollerable behaviours and oppressions, that Gauelson might with good reason seeme to be wished for againe. Against these two, who wholly swayed the vnfortunate King, Thomas Earle of Launcester, and in a manner all the Barons of the Kingdome, (who meant the King should loue none but with their leaue) did swell with such impatience, that (not contented with the waite of their lands) they neuer rested till (by the terror of ciuill Armes) those two fauourites (father and sonne) were banished; they thus reuenging vnder publike pretences both publike injuries and * their owne.

(36) In all contentions which hapned betwixt the King and his Lords, Queene Isabel had euer hitherto bene a maker of Peace, doing therein worthy offices, but the euill starres of the Earles of Launcester and Hereford would not suffer her to continue any longer so: for the Queene being denied lodging one night at the Castle of Leedes in Kent, which belonged to the Lord of Badlesmere (one of the Earles faction) she withdrew her good conceits, and was an author to the King of presently reuenging that dishonour, who vpon her complaint, came in person with many thousand Souldiers before the Castle, tooke the * Captaine, and put both him and all the men therein to shamefull death. Moreouer, longing to be righted against the Lords for their late insolencies, marched on to Cirecester taking many Castles, and besieging others: The Lords (who little suspected any such sodaine assaults) providing in the meane time for their defence.

(37) Thither repaired to him (at his commandement) Hugh Spenser the sonne, who had hovered vpon the Sea, expecting from thence the successe of things vpon the land. The Lords, who had falne from their Soueraignes good conceit, and wanting now their wonted Mediatrice the Queene, lay open to all the mischief which enemies could work them by the King, who (as taking his regall power and authority to be in danger) resolved wisely and manfully, to die in the quarrell, or to bring the Lords to be at his commandement. Meane time the iudgement giuen against the Spensers was reuerfed as erroneous, and their reuocation decreed at London by the * Archbishoppe of Canterburie and his Suffragans.

(38) The Lords not all of a like temper began to misdoubt, and many of them forooke their Chief, (the Earle of Launcester) and rendred themselves to the King, or were apprehended; among which were the two Rogers Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Castle. The faction weakened by this defection made head in the North, vnder the Earle of Launcester, who now was to fight for his life. Thither the King marcheth, and with the onely few of his Armie, made the Earle to flee from Barton vpon Trent, whose forces in their retreat or flight behaued themselves outrageously.

(39) But Gods heauie displeasure, and the Arme of the Kings power left them not: for at Burrowbridge, Humphrey de Bohun was slaine by a Welshman, who thrust him into the body with a Spear from vnder the Bridge; and the Earle of Launcester him selfe with other principall men, Barons and knights, to the number of about 40000 and ten were taken prisoners, by a man of small fortunes, Andrew de Herckley Captaine of the City of Carlisle, and Sir Simon Ward, * Captaine of Torke, who with great forces out of those parts, stoop their farther passage at Burrowbridge, as the Kings forces tooke all safeguard from them behind.

(40) The third day after their apprehension, the * King in person being set in iudgement at Pontfract, and with him Edmund Earle of Kent, Amyer Earle of Pembroke, John de Warren Earle of Surrey, and among * others, the Lord Hugh de Spenser the Father, as also * Hugh Spenser his sonne; the Earle of Launcester was brought before them, and had sentence pronounced against him * by the said Andrew de Herckley (created afterward Earle of Carlisle) and the Kings Iusticiar, the * Lord Ampleforth, as against an Arch-Traitor; neuertheless, for reuerence of his blood (being the Kings neere Kinman) drawing and hanging were remitted vnto him, but his head was stricken off the same day without the Towne of Pontfract.

(42) As for the said Thomas Earle of Launcester, there are so many reasons why he cannot reasonably be iudged either a good subject or a good man, that we may worthily wonder why some at that time should repute him a Saint. Certainly, the wife and discreet old Writers are not so opinionated of him; but note his priuate life for * vicious, himselfe to be nothing * valourous, and of the publike * not well deferuing, omitting his contumelious behaviours toward the King his Soueraign Lord in his discomforts, which as Walsingham forgets not to relate, so thinks he that the like was worthily vied toward that Earle himselfe, who, when hee was brought prisoner to Pontfract (his owne Castle but then furrendred) the whole multitude derided, and called him in scorne King Arthur: by which name hee was designed (as some write) in the Scottish Cypher intercepted, prouing a conspiracy with Scots: but the very thoppes, where his and the other Barons original Treasons were forged, was the Parliament house, wherein from time to time, they forced on the King presumptuous and treasonous Ordinations, whereby the Peeres challenged, not onely to reforme the Kings house and Councell, and to place and displace all great Officers at their pleasure, but euenaoint interest in the Regiment of the Kingdome together with the King, which William Inge (a Iudge of the Common-Law) with other like sticklers, traiterously perswading them to be according to Law.

(43) Of his ill desertings toward the common-Weale (who for the good thereof could not digest any indignity) let this bee a kind of demonstration: for when King Edward having by strat siege brought Berwicke neere to termes of yeelding, chanced once to breake forth (after his vaine manner) into these words; The Lord Hugh Spenser shall be captaine of the Castle, when it is taken: the Earle forthwith with others of his affection abandoned the service: by reason of which departure, it was thought that Berwicke was not as then obtained, and that the enemy thereby had great advantage in all their attempts. Neuer did English earth at one time drinke so much blood of her Nobles in so vile manner shed as at this, which, whatsoever could be pretended. (as doubtlesse their offence was capital) yet all was taken to be done as in the quarrell of the Spensers onely, nor was it vnrenewed, as will appeare in the mean space their enemies not contented with their blood, procured also the * confiscation of their estates and inheritances.

(44) King Edward thinking that this exploit had made him terrible aswell to the Scots, as it had done to the English, marcheth with a mighty host into Scotland, from whence not long after (for want of victuals) hee was compelled to returne without the honour of any achievement, and being vpon his returne, was sodainly by Scots assailed in the night, very narrowly escaping in his owne person, and with a few saved himself by flight, leauing his * treasure & furniture for pillage, and so came sorrowfull to Yorke. John de Brittain Earle of Richmond, was taken prisoner by the enemy, and the rest of the Country defaced with destructions as farre as to the wals of that City.

(45) Thus * passed this yeere, to the English full of losse, reproach, and lamentation, by reason of their intestine discord and the shambles of their Nobles: to the King infamous, and hateful also for his vnfortunate iourney into the Northern parts, &c. But these bloody and tempestuous winds blew some to profit; so * during the space of about fife yeeres after, the fortune of the Spencers hugely encreased, and the Queenes decreased, who (for her relenting toward the Lords, & expressing some dislikes of these rankly-growing weeds) was grown to beare a share in the persecution. And that these with such like violent men working vpon the Kings inclination, were the onely Authors of that sharpe reuenge taken vpon the Lords, for their particular and inglorious enrichment (for what else can we call the same, since that they betraide thereby their Soueraignes Crown and Life to speedie destruction) let it by this in part appeare, and moue the world the rather to pity the seduced.

(46) Among them who were condemned for rising with the Earle of Lancaster, there was one of a meane Familie, for whose life neuertheless, because hee had once served in Court, and was pleasing to some of the Grands, or Potent fauourites therein, many interceded, and pressed the king to farre on his behalfe, that he brake out into these * most vehement words; A plague vpon you for cursed whisperers, malicious backe-biters, wicked counsellors, entreat you so for the life of a most notorious knaue, who would not speak one word for the life of my neere Kinsman, that most noble Knight Earle Thomas? Had hee liued, wee and our whole Realme should haue had speciall need and use of him. This fellow the longer hee liues, the more villanies he will commit, as hauing already filled my Kingdome with his desperate outrages. By the soule of God hee shall therefore die the death he hath deserued.

(47) By this then it is euident, that these tragedies against the Lords were exploited by others, in which it is plaine that this King (otherwise so deuout to God, so noble and so full of naturall good propensions) was fatally over-wrought by wicked counsell; though hee therein bee inexcusable, for good nature (as wee call it) cannot satisfie for publicke errors. But the condemned man was forthwith put to death accordingly, the King being most highlie offended, that none had entreated him on the Earles behalfe, whom (saith Walsingham) hee did inwardlie loue. Neuertheless, hee had not long before created the elder Spenser Earle of Winchester, and deckt the plume of his fortunes with a toppe-feather taken out of the said late Earle of Lancasters estate, that is to say, with the Castle and honour of * Donington, parcell of the Earldome of Lincolne. Hauing thus farre shewed the originall of the mischief, wee will hasten now to the last Act or Catastrophe of our Edwards tragédie, onely wee will first remember some inter-currant matters.

(48) You haue heard before, how that the Cardinals sent from the Pope, had (in fauour of the English) put Scotland vnder Interdict; wherefore King Robert now at last dispatched the Bishop of Glasgow, and Thomas Randolph Earle of Murray to Rome, for obtaining releafe and absolution, but they returned without effecting it. Whereupon King Robert moued to haue a truce for thirteene yeeres, which King Edward accordingly granted, and the Pope * then absolved the Scots. The matters of Scotland seemed thus to be sufficiently provided for during that time, and the rather for that somewhat before the motion for truce, the King had caused the newly created Earle of Carleile Andrew de Herley to be degraded, hanged, drawne and quartered for treason; which hee was conuicted to haue entred into with the Scots, vpon * whom he had before done speciall seruices, as hauing for that cause the Castle and Citie of Carleile committed to his gouernment. The truce with Scotland being thus confirmed, the King makes his progresse through the * Counties of Yorke and Lancaster, and the Marches of Wales, from whence the late sedicious had their nourishments, taking wife & carefull courtes for ministration of Iustice there, and prevention of like inconueniences, by punishing their Authors seuerely. And Iustices * void of all corruption, were appointed else-where.

(49) In the meane space, the new King of France Charles the fifth, a most earnest enemy to the English mens possessions there, sought occasions of quarrell with King Edward, who while hee consulted at home how to order that affairst, the yong L. Roger Mortimer, one whom the Diuell (saith our * Courtier) refused to kindle new diffention with, and to stirre vp a most miserable ciuill warre, hauing corrupted his Keepers, or (as some others wrote) hauing poisoned them with a sleepey drinke, escaped out of the Tower of London, getting ouer clearly without any empeachment into France.

(51) Thus was the matter, and as it were, the Embriou, of their common destruction laid, and begun in the impotence of a womans will, to helpe out the which with shrewd drifts and directions, they encrease her side with Adam Bishoppe of Hereford, by tripping him out of all his Temporalities as a Traitor, for that hee had supported the Mortimers in the Barons quarrell. This Adam (saith our Knight) was a man of most subtile witte, and in all worldly policies profound, daring to doe great things and factious withall, who for this cause conceiuing deepest hate, and therefore easily growing deare to the Queene, made a great secret party. To which Henrie Burmwalsh Bishoppe of Lincoln, who (for like causes) had beene kept from his temporalities (about two yeeres) ioyned himselfe. Neither would the Spensers auarice suffer them to weaken the multitudes of their enemies, for they sold the Kings gracious fauour to such as had beene in the Barons quarrell, at so great rates that they by granting away lands and Manours to the said Lords Spensers for their pardons &c. verie many of the Nobles were empowrished. To be short, the royall power being in the hands of the Spensers, and Roger Baldock Chancellour, or of their Creatures and Faouourites; this other faction had the generall discontentments of the Realme to worke vpon for their aduantage.

and negotiate her husbands affairst in France. Shee did so; and whereas before her departure, things were in great extremity betweene the two Nations, inso much that all the French were banished out of England, not they who were attendant on the Queen her selfe in neere place being spared, all matters by her negotiation and suite were quieted vpon condition that King Edward should giue to his sonne Edward of Windfor (afterward King) the Duchy of Aquitaine, and Earldome of Poitou, for which the king of France was pleased to accept his said yong Nephewes homage.

(53) This was done, and the Prince sent ouer for that purpose to his mother, to the vtter vndoing of the King his Father, and of all his fauourites. For the heire of England being in forraigne parts, among the contrary faction, all the consultation was (vnder colour of raising the Spensers), to accomplish farther matters. The Prince, hauing (at Boys de Vincens) done his homage for that Duchie and County to his vncke Charles de Valois King of France, was (as also the Queene his mother) sent for backe by the King about Michaelmas; but the Queenes conspiracy being not yet ripe, shee deferred to obay, detaining her sonne still.

(54) There went ouer with the yong Prince, among many others, Walter Stapleton, Bishoppe of Excester, who perceiving into what familiarity the Lord Roger Mortimer was growne with the Queene, which * seemed greater then either stood with her honour or dutie, and seeing both him and other of the Kings enemies, and fugitiues enioy that priuacie in counsell, which was sufficient to himselfe, who was now (as being none of theirs) * excluded, returned secretly (though vnseen for) into England, faithfully (as it became a good man) declaring his knowledge.

(55) The King now clearly beholding his error in his dangers * solicited the King of France to send home his wife and sonne, but that not succeeding, hee caused them * openly in London to be proclaimed enemies of the Kingdome, banishing them with all their adherents out of the same. For his more assurance also hee caused the Ports to be most narrowly watcht. Finally, to draw all his dangers to a short dispatch, there was (as was supposed) a plot laid for * making away the Queene and Prince, but Gods will was to frustrate it.

(56) The Queen, on the other side, fearing that the * Spensers gold had laid traines to blow her whole proceedings vp in France, kept her selfe out of the way, till with the Prince, the Lord Roger Mortimer, and other their adherents, they were safely gotten into Hennault: There might bee some other reason also and necessary to moue Queene Isabel to depart out of France, beside the doubt of that kind of corruption in the Peeres thereof: as to turne off a warre from thence being her native Country, which for her cause was afflicted in the Sea-strengthes thereof; for Sir John Oturwin, Sir Nicholas Kiriad, and Sir John de Felton, with the Nauie of the Ports, and of other places, had by commission from the King so scowred the narrow Seas, that they within a short time brought into England as lawfull prize, * an hundred and twenty Norman shippes or vessels. Moreover, whereas those two Bishoppes which the Pope had sent, were returned sorrowfull out of England, not onely without doing any good on her behalfe, but also without hope of doing any, shee might easily be perswaded that the sword must doe it, or nothing.

(57) But in Hennault shee found most honourable and louing welcome of the Earle, where, therefore (without the consent or aduise of the Peeres of England) shee ensured (saith our * Author) that delight and terror of the whole world, her sonne, being then about foureteen yeeres old, to Philippa the said Earles daughter, and with the money of her portion waged souldiers out of Hennault and Germany, so transported sport into England. There her friends expected her arrival daily, of which the Bishops of Hereford and Lincoln were not meanest: Her men and Naue being now ready, hee with her sonne the Prince, the Lord Edmund Earle of Kent his vnle, * Aimeric de Valence Earle of Pembroke, the Lord John de Hault, the Earle of Henaults brother (a valiant Gentleman) the Lord Roger Mortimer, and many other Englishmen of name and note, with about two thousand and feuen hundred Henowages and Germans, vnder the leading of the said Lord John, arrived at Ormwell in Suffolke vpon the Friday before Saint Michaels day.

(58) Her arrival being reported to the King (who was, poore Prince, not onely destitute of friends and meanes, but as it seemes, of courage, and counsell also) it did not at first seeme credible. The truth appearing, he demanded assistance of the City of London, whose answer was, That they would honour with all dutie, the King, the Queene, and Prince, but would shut their gates against forreiners, and traitors to the Realme, and with all their powers withstand them. In this answer the King and his few friends repoling no assurance, he committed an error worse then that former of sending his sonne out of England, by retiring himselfe into the West, with his inseparable fauourites the Spensers, Baldock and others there, to raise a force against the Queene: but before hee went, hee left his other sonne, the Lord John (called of Eltham) in the Tower of London with the Countesse of Gloucester, the Kings Nece, wife to the younger Spenser Earle of Gloucester, committing the Tower to selfe to Sir John de Weston, who was well provided of men and victuals. Hee commanded all men also to destroy and kill the Queenes partakers, none excepted but her selfe, her sonne, and Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings brother by the Father, and that none, vpon paine of death, and losse of all that they might leefe, should aid or assist them: and that hee should haue a thousand pound, who did bring the Lord Mortimers head. Thus tooke hee his last leaue of London, and in a manner also of his Rule or Domination.

(59) On the contrary part, there repaired to the Queene the Earle Marshall, and Henry Earle of Leicester, the Bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, Ely, and of Barons, Knights, and armed Souldiers no small multitude, whom aswell to retain, as to draw more, letters and rumors flew about, declaring (though falsely) that the King of France had in the aide of his sister sent so many Dukes, Earles, and others, that England could scarce suffice to feed them. This, for such whom the opinion of warlike strength would winne: but those whom shew of Religion might moue, it was as cunningly, and as falsely spread, that the Pope had excommunicated all such as did take armes against the Queene, and (the more to countenance the fiction) that two Cardinals imployed about the Premises, were seen in the Queens Campe. Then was it proclaimed that the causes of her committing were to deliuer the Realme from the misleaders of the King, which were named to be the Spensers, Roger Baldock Bishoppe of Norwich, Lord Chancellor and their Fautors; all others to be safe, and that nothing should be taken from any other subiect without true payment; but finally, that he who brought the younger Spenser head should haue two thousand pounds. These things first thus ordered, the Queen with her sonne and whole power pursues the King (as it had beene agreed by the Council of warre) taking first her way to Oxford: where the whole Vniuersity being called together, in the presence of the Queene, the Prince, Roger Mortimer and the rest of that troope, the Bishop of Hereford (the Queenes boosome Counsellor) preaching to them on this Text, My head, my head aketh, deliuered to them the reasons of the Queens coming with her Army, concluding (more like a Butcher then a Diuine) that an aking & sick head of a kingdom, was of necessity to be taken off, and not to be tampered with by any other physick.

(60) The Londoners in fauour of the Queene, and hatred of the Spensers committed sundry outrages, besides bloody sacrilege in cutting off the Bishop of Exeters head, and some others (whom the King had made Guardian of London) in their popular fury, among the which one of them was a Citizen of their owne Iohanne Marshal, who had bene of the younger Spensers acquaintance. The Tower of London they got into their possession, placing and displacing the Garrison and Officers therein at their pleasure, vnder the name of the Lord John of Eltham, the Kings second sonne, whom they proclaimed Custos of the City, and of the Land. They also set at liberty all prisoners, which by the popular Queenes commandement was done through the whole Realme: and all banished men and fugitiues were reuoked; who all flocking vnto London, brought no small encrease to her forces.

(61) Whether in the meane space doth wofull Edward lie? what force, what course, what way takes hee poore Prince? O fearefull condition of so great a Monarches State, when a Wife, a Sonne, a Kingdome are not trusted, and those onely are trusted who had nothing strong, but a will to lue and die with him. The Queene passing from Oxford to Gloucester (onward to the siege of Bristol Castle) grew all the while in her strengths like a rowled snow-ball, or as a River which spreads itself broader from the fountain to the Ocean, * vires acquirit cundo. For either repaired to her (for the loue of the young Prince) the Lord Percy, the Lord Wake, and others aswell out of the North, as Marches of Wales. But Edward (having left the Earle of Winchester, the elder Lord Spenser, in the Castell of Bristol for the keeping thereof) meditates flight with a few into the Isle of Lunade in Seuerne Sea, or into Ireland, & while hee wandreth about not finding where to rest safe, his roiall credite, name, and power, (like a Cliffe which falling from the toppe of some huge rocke, breakes into the more pieces, the farther it rolles) are daylie more and more diminisht as they scatter, till now at last they are come vnto a very nothing. After a weeke therefore spent vnto the Sea, Sir Thomas Blunt forsaking him, and coming to the Queene, he came on shore in Glamorganshire, where with his few friends hee entrusted himselfe to God, and the faith of the VVels (who indeed still loued him) lying hidden among them in the Abbey of Neath.

(62) Now had the Queene and her sonne (for his name was abused to all sorts of turne-serings) taken the elder Lord Spenser at the Castell of Bristol, who (without any forme of trial) was cruelly cut vp aliue and quartered (saith de la Moere our Knight) being first at the clamours of the people, drawne and hanged in his proper Armouries vpon the common Gallows without the City: but his grandchild Hugolin stood so valiantly in defence of himself within the Castell of Kershill, that hee had his life and the lues of all his assistants saved.

(63) The King not appearing, Proclamations were every day made in the Queenes Armie, declaring, * That it was the common consent of the realm that hee should returne, and * receive the gouernement thereof, so as he would conforme himselfe to his people. This (whether Stratageme or Truth) not prevailing, Henry Earle of Lancaster the late Earles Brother, Sir William la Zouch, and Rhes ap Howell a Welshman, who all of them had Lands in those parts where the King concealed himselfe, were sent with coine, and forces to discouer and take him: The Queene and her people lay in the City of Hereford, the Episcopall See of that great Arch-bishop of the courties Adam de Orton, where by aduise and consent of the Lords, her sonne the Duke of Aquitaine was made High-keeper of England, and they as to the Custos of the same, did sweare him fealty. And here also the Bishoppe of Norwich was made Chancellor of of the Realme, and the Bishoppe of Winchester Treasurer.

(65) What will not money, diligence and faire words doe; with corrupt dispositions, euen to euering of all bands of either religious or ciuill duties? By such meanes therefore the desolate, sad, and vnfortunate King, * came into his cofen of Lancasters hands, and with him the younger Lord Spenser Earle of Gloucester, Robert Baldock Lord Chancellor and Simon de Reding, there being no regard had to the detention of any other. The King was conueied by the Earle from the place of his surpris to Monmouth, to Ledburie, and so to the Castell of Kenelworth belonging to the Earle of Leicester, who was appointed to attend him, that is, to keepe him safe. The other three, Spenser, Baldock and Reding were strongly guarded to Hereford, there to be disposed of at the pleasure of their most capital enemies.

(66) Before whose coming to facisfic Roger Mortimer, the Lord Edmund Earle of Arundel, and two Gentlemen Daniel and Micheldene were beheaded at Hereford: The Lord Mortimer was so high in the Queens fauour, that hee could doe no lesse (as wee may suppose) then gratifie him with a few hated heads. But (Mortimer) there will bee a time, when the cry of this, and other blood sacrificed to thy priuate reuenge (while thou abusest the publike trust) will neuer giue ouer the pursiue, till it hath deferuently drawne thine in lieu thereof.

(67) The Lord Spenser and the rest, * on whom VVilliam Trussell the Iudge gaue sentence of death, being now drawne to Hereford, the said Lord being clad in his coat-armour, was most despitely dragged to the place of execution, where being first hung vpon a gallows fifty foot high, hee was afterward headed, and cut into quarters: they who brought him to the Queene, hauing the promised summe of two thousand pounds distributed among them for reward. His head was set vp at London, and his quarters in foure parts of the Kingdome. Simon de Reding was hanged ten foot lower then hee in the same place.

(68) This Execution (saith Walsingham) was done vpon a Munday in reuenge of the death of Thomas Earle of Lancaster, whose blood was likewise shed vpon a Munday. Robert Baldock late Lord Chancellor was committed to the keeping of the Bishop of Hereford, who after a time caused him to bee brought vp to Hereford-house in London, where the tumultuous people (not without the Bishoppe of Herefords secret approuement as was said) tooke him violently away, and (though he were a Priest) thrust him into Newgate, where they vsed him so vnhandfomly, that albeit they had no accusation, but onely for being faithfull to his Soueraigne, where-with to charge him, hee not long after died in prison; to whom (saith De la Moere) might be applied that of Quintilian, Torquentem vinctis quisquis occidit.

(69) The mournfull King being at Kenelworth Castle, there repaired thither the Bishops of Winchester, Hereford, and Lincoln, * two Earles, two Abbots, foure Barons, * two Iustices, three Knights for euery County, and for London, and other principall places (chiefly for the five Ports) a certaine chosen number, selected by the Parliament, which then the Queene and her Sonne held at London. The Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln (as it was agreed vpon) came thither before any of the rest, to giue the King to vnderstand what kind of Embassage was approaching, as to prepare him by the best Arguments they could to satisfy the desire, and expectation of their new moulded common-weale, which could onely be by resignation of the Crowne, that his Sonne (whom the body of the then confuted State had elected) might raigine in his stead.

(70) When they were admitted to his presence, (the Earle of Leicester being by) they together so wrought him, partly with shewing a necessity, partly with other reasons drawne out of common places, thoroughly studied for that purpose, that (though not without many sobbs and teares) hee finally did not dissent, if his answer were truly reported (which * som doubt vnto the Parliament. * For they tolde him that the Common-weale had conceiued to irreconcilable dislikes of his gouernment, the particulars whereof had beene opened in the general assembly at London, that it was resolu'd neuer to endure him as King any longer. That notwithstanding, those dislikes had not extended themselves so farre as his faketo exclude his issue, but that with vniuersall applause, and loy, the Common-weale had in Parliament elected his eldest sonne the Lord Edward for King. That it would be a very acceptable thing to God, willingly to giue o- uer an earthly Kingdome for the common-good and quiet of his Country, which they said could not otherwise be secured. That yet his honour should be no lesse after the resignation, then it was before, onely him the common-weale would neuer suffer to raigine any longer. They finally durst tell him, that vniuersally hee did of himselfe renounce his Crowne and Scepter, the people would neither endure him, nor any of his Children as their Soueraigne, but disclaiming all homage and fealty, would elect some other for King, who should not bee of the blood.

(71) The whole Company sent by the body of State (if it may be called a body which then had no Head there) from London, where it attended their returne, being placed by the Bishoppe of Hereford, according to their degrees, in the Presence Chamber at Kenelworth Castle, the King gown'd in blacke came forth at last out of an inward room, and presented himselfe to his vassals, where (as being Priuie to their errand) sorrow broke such a chille into him, that hee fell to the earth, lying stretched forth in a deadly swoon; The Earle of Leicester, and the Bishoppe of Winchester beholding this, ranne vnto him, and with much labour recovered the half-dead king, setting him vpon his feet. As rusll & heauy as this sight was, we read not yet of any acts or effects of compassion exprest towards him at this present, so settled (as it seemed) was the hatred and auersion. The King being now (we cannot say) come to himselfe, but to the sense of his misery, the Bishoppe of Hereford declares the cause of their present Embassie, and running ouer the former points, concludes as before, saying, (as in the person of the common-wealth) That the King must resigne his Diademe to his eldest sonne, or after the refusal suffer them to elect such a person as themselves should indige to be most fit and able to defend the Kingdome.

(72) The dolorous King hauing heard this speech, brake forth into sighes and teares, and being (saith his * most fauourable reporter) more ready to sacrifice his body for Christs cause, then once to behold the disinherison of his sonnes, or (through his occasion) the perpetuall disturbance of the Kingdome, (as knowing, saith he, that a good hepard should giue his life for his flocke,) made at the last his answer to this effect. * That hee knew that for his many sinnes hee was false into this calamity, and therefore had the lesse cause to take it grieuously: * That much hee sorrowed for * this that the people of the Kingdome were so exasperated against him, as that they thought vnto utterly abhorre his any longer rule and souerainety: and therefore he besought all that were there present to * forgive and spare him being so afflicted. That neuertheless it was * greatly to his good pleasure and liking, (seeing it * could none other be on his behalfe,) that his eldest sonne was so gracious in their sight, and therefore hee gaue them * thanks for choosling him to be their King.

(73) This being said, there was forthwith a proceeding to the short ceremonies of his resignation, which principally consisted in the surrender of his

T t t t Diademe

*Tb.de la Motte.

Diadem and Ensignes of Maicesty, to the use of his son the new King. Thereupon * Sir William Trussel (as being a Judge who could fit them with quirks of law to colour so lawlesse and treasonable a fact) on the behalfe of the whole Realme renounced all homage, and allegiance to the Lord Edward of Caermarthen late King.

*Polychr.lib 7.6.43

(74) The forme of that renunciation, as being obsolete, you shall haue in the like * obsolete words of Treuisa, which was this; I William Trussel, in name of all men of the land of England, and of all the Parliament Procurator, resigne to the Lord Edward, the homage that was made to thee sometime; and from this time forward now following, I desist thee, and proue thee of all yoyall power, so I shall neuer be tendant to thee as for King after this time. Which being done, Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, Steward of the houthold, by breaking his staffe, resigned his office, and declared that the late Kings family was discharged.

*Tbo.VValf.

(75) Edward being thus dekinged, the Embassie rode ioyfully backe to London to the Parliament, with the resigned * Ensignes, and dispatch of their employment. Here (for that this seems the last houre of his raigne and kingly state) wee will make a stop, referring you for the rest to the next Kings life, vnder whose name and abused authority they were acted.

*Tbo.Walsfingb.

(76) Notwithstanding, wee may not forget in all these doings to call to mind, who it was that fate at the helme of State, murtherlooking, and ouerthrowing Queene, Prince and all; to wit, the most ambitious and vindicative man liuing, Roger Lord Mortimer of Wigmore: for, as for the * Queene, when shee was (God knows how farre guilty,) aduertised of her husbands dethronization, she outwardly exprest so great extremity of passion (notwithstanding that at the same time shee was tolde of her sonnes surrogation) as if shee had beene distraught in her wities: which the Prince her sonne (then about fifteen yeeres of age) beholding, hee made an oath, neuer to accept of the Crowne against his fathers good will; and thereupon it was (saith Walsingham a Writer worthe of beliete) that the said Embassie was sent to Kenelworth Castle, (where the now no more a King remained) to worke his assent, whose answer therunto (saith * another) was by those Messengers related at full, and fuller then in truth it was sent by the King, but the Peeres then in Parliament made their vse thereof, in procuring such a Prince to take the rule of the, whom they hoped, by reason of his tender yeeres, themselves should be able to rule and ouermaster.

CHAPTER XII.

He sicknesse and wounds which the commonwelth sustained by the raigne of the late deposed king, vpon the change of her Leach and Physitian, recovered not onely health and strength, but beaurtie also and ornament; and the elements themselves, grew * gracious and propitious to the vse of man, the Aire becoming more healthfull, the earth more fruitfull, as if Nature herself were priuie to the worth of the succeeding Prince. But this his worth did not display it selfe, vntill hee had plucked the sway of things out of the hands of the Queene his mother, and of that aspiring danger and tempest of England, Roger Mortimer who wholly possessed her.

(2) This Edward of Windsor, being not fiftene yeeres of age, when (without any guilty thought in him) his throne was thus established vpon his Fathers ruine, tooke the beginning of his raign by publicke sanction at the * twentieth day of Ianuarie, and by direction of such as sought to colour their treasons against their deposed Soueraigne, proclaimed "his peace in these words. Edward by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitaine, to N.N. our Sheriffe of S. Greeting. Because the Lord Edward our Father, late King of England, by the common Councell and Assent of the Prelates, Earles, Barons, and other the chiefe men, and the whole Comminaltie of the Kingdome, did voluntarily remoue himselfe from the government thereof, willing and granting that we as his eldest sonne and heire, should take vpon vs the rule and regiment of the same, and we with the counsel & aduise of the Prelates, Earls & Barons before said, yielding therein to our fathers good pleasure

(6) Neuer was the fallacie of pointings, or ambiguity of Phrase more mischieuously vied to the destruction of a King, or defence of the Contriuers, then in this hainous Parricide, for it is said that a bloody Sophisme conceived in these words was sent;

* Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est

To shed King Edwards blood Refuse to feare I count it good.

Where the Comma or pause being put after Nolite, bid them not to make him away, but after timere, insinuates a plaine encouragement to the fact.

(7) The Sphinx who is said to be the Author of this ambiguous Riddle, sent by the Lord Mortimer, was Adam de Torleton, who * vtterly denied any such intention, when the Murthurers for their owne iustificatiion, produced the writing it selfe vnder Queene Isabels Scale, and the scales of the other Conspirators, and therefore the said Bishoppe Adam was the cause, why Gorney and Mattreuer was with terrible menaces shaken vp, pursued and outlawed, who more pursued with the memory and conscience of so hainous a Tragedie, fled out of England, Gorney after three yeres banishment, being discovered at Maffels in France, and apprehended, was conuaited backe, but had his head taken off at Sea, in his passage, * left he should reucale too much at his arrival, but Mattreuer lay hidden in Germanie a long time, doing penance.

(8) This Parricide was committed about S. Matthews day, and (that you may note what confidence they had in their Art of secret murder, as also an ordinary mockage of the people in like cases) the noble body was laide forth, and * many Abbots, Priors, Knights, and Burgesses of Bristol and Glocester were sent for to see the same; vpon which, although there appeared no manifest outward sign of violent death, but the skinne all ouer whole and vnbroken, yet the cry of murthre could not so bee smothered, but the meanes and manner came to light. This happinesse certainly the poore Prince had, that after his imprisonment hee reformed his life in so pious & Christian sort, that it gaue occasion when hee was dead of disputation, whether * hee were not to bee reputed a Saint, euenas (say our Authors) there was the like Question concerning Thomas Earle of Lancaster, though beheaded for apparant * reasons. His body * without any funeral pompe was buried among the Benedictines in their Abbey at Glocester, and so (saith * our passionate author) the * acely height of the Angels Kingdom receiued this Scholler, and Disciple of Christ, thus rest and spoiled of his English Kingdom.

(9) The young King was now vpon the borders of Scotland with a puissant Armie, where also the Queene mother, and Mortimer, with many other Nobles were present, and hauing enuironed the Scots (who had pierced into England with inuasiue armes) in the woods of Pyridale and Stanhope Parke, made sure account of a certaine victorie; but by the treason of the said Lord Mortimer (as afterward was laid to his charge) they were suffered to escape out of that mischiefe, and the young King with griefe returned inglorious after an huge waste of treasure, and perill of his owne person.

about * ten thousand paire of raw leather shoes, the haire fill vpon them. In King Edwards Armie were (as * some write) thirty thousand Archers, and five hundred good men of Arms, which perhaps is one of the greatest boasts that you shall lightly reade to haue been of our Nation, and the reason was, for that the world conceived such hope of the young King, that many more went * voluntary then constrained. All which puissance was notwithstanding thus eluded.

(12) About this time died stricken with leprosie, Robert Bruce King, and recouerer of Scotland, and the most approved Warriour of the world in that age, by whose losse it was soone found, how much the vertue and fortune of one man are worth in any Nation. But before hee died, that peace was made with the Scots by the meanes of the Queene and the Lord Mortimer, which is so much dispraised by our Writers, and in the end proued capital to the principal Actor Mortimer.

(13) For at this treaty it was that the King (then in his Minority) sealed Charters to the Scots at Northampton, whose contents were contriued by the Queene, the said Lord Mortimer, and Sir James Douglas, without the priuie of the English. There was also deliuered to them that famous Euidence called the * Ragman Roll, and the King acquited them of all * claime and pretence of right to the Superiority of Scotland, rendering backe fundrie Jewels taken by the English from the Scots, among the which was one speciall, called the Blacke Crosse of Scotland. There was it also granted, that * all Englishmen should leese their lands in Scotland, vntil they would inhabit vpon them, and become Liege-men to the King thereof, besides many other things to the high discontentation (as was the humor of those times) of the English Subjects. Moreover, vnder the specious colour of restitution of damages, King Robert was to pay to King Edward thirty thousand Marks sterling, with which (as the meed of treason) the Lord Mortimer was afterward publicly charged, and for the same, and other his crimes was executed as a Traitor. Finally, vpon the tenth of Iuly, David Bruce Prince of Scotland, a child of seuen or eight yeeres old, and sonne and heire to King Robert, married Joan, siltter to K. Edward at Berwick: by which peace the English were made obnoxious to some reproaches, the Scottish Nation in scorne, calling the said Lady, Jane Make-Peace.

(14) And therefore saith one of this part of King Edwards raigne: that drawne aside with euill aduise, by reason of his age, hee committed many foule errors in State, at the beginning of his Gouvernement: which is also the generall opinion of all our Writers, whereunto this verbis by * some applied;

Vapores terra, sapiens sunt ibi guerra,

Where Children Rulers are,
There oft is woe and war.

(15) There died likewise about this time Charles the Faire, King of France, (to whom King Edward had not long before done homage for his Dutchie of Gasconie) the third and last sonne of Philip the Faire, King of France, by whose decess the Crown of that noble Kingdom, deuolued to this our Edward King of England in right of his mother Queene Isabel: And because vpon this * Title King Edward did afterward claime the said Crowne, wee will here once for all instruct you in the iustice thereof.

(16) Three fonnethere were of King Philip the Faire, (to wit, Lewis Hutin, Philip le long, and Charles the Faire) who all successiuey raigned in France one after the other, and none of them leauing any Issue, at such time as King Edward made his claime, the whole right seemed to be in Isabel the onely Child of the said Philip which had any issue, for an other sister which shee had died an Infant.

(17) The case thus seeming plaine, was not for such accepted by the French, who receiued to the Crowne Philip of Valois, whose father Charles of Valois was younger Brother to Philip the Faire, aduancing the Brothers sonne before the daughters son, not following the propinquity or descent of blood, but the meliority of sexe, vpon which ground the young had also freshly put by Joan daughter of Lewis Hutin, preferring Philip le long her vnle. The French in barre to her interest, pretended a fundamentall law or entaile, by which * no woman was inheritable to the Crown of France, and in defence of that opinion withstood King Edward afterward with so much losse and calamity, though that very law made Edwards title the stronger (* as himselfe truly pleaded) hee being the Male, albeit his right defended by the Female.

(18) This Title to so glorious a Monarchy though it accrewed to the English, by this match with Queene Isabel, yet doth Walshingham * freely pronounce, that neither that affinity, nor any other contract with the French, was euer available or brought any benefite to England: which opinion as it may seeme strange, so will it answere a wise Readers paine in the fruit, to obserue through the course of our stories, whether the said graue Writer had iust occasion so to speake or no. Another conceit there was of this Edwards marriage with Philippa the Earle of Hennaults daughter, which about this time was consummated, though Philip de Valois (king of France by intrusion as our Annals repute him) was her vnle, her mother being his owne sister.

(19) There stood now at home against the stream of the Queene, and her Lord Mortimer absolute sway, some great personages, who did not wholly allow their doings, among which was the Kings vnle, Edmund Earle of Kent, whose death they shortly procured. Meane while the more to despise and dare their ouerlookers, Roger Mortimer was created Earle of the Marches of Wales, at a Parliament holden at Salisbury: at which time also John of Eltham the Kings Brother was made Earle of Cornwall, and the Lord Butler of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From whence the Lord Henry Earle of Lancaster, and sundry other of the Peeres, seeing the King * troden (as it seemed to them) vnder foot, did absent themselves, meditating ciuill armes for redresse, who notwithstanding (by the labour of Simon de Mepeham Archbishop of Canterbury) was reconciled: This Archbishoppe very worthily also excommunicated all such as had any hand in the sacrilegious parricide of that * noble and loiall Prelate Walter Bishoppe of Excester, or any waies violated him, their aiders, complices or abettors whoeuer. But after the Coronation of Philip the young Queene, in another Parliament at Winchester, the said Earle Edmund was condemned for conspiring to deliuer his brother, late King of England, whom (likely inough by Mortimers practise) hee was drawne into an absurd beliefe to be still aliue. Thus, for deuiuing to set a dead man at liberty, this noble Earle Edmund the kings half vnle had his head stricken off, though from * Noone till siue at night, hee stood at the place of death without the Caltigates, none being found to behead him, till a base wretch of the Marhal-sea was sent, and did it: so little conscience did the malice and ambition of his potent aduersaries make of shedding the Roiall blood, which by Gods iust iudgement was not long vnreueged.

pace did now approach and summon Mortimer to a bloudie account; for the yong King addicting himselfe to serious thoughts, and putting on the Man before his yeeres required, easily saw his owne perill in the others potencie. The Queene his mother (to the common dishonour and griefe of the Kingdome) being generally bruted to be with child by Mortimer, hee vpon ripe aduise sodainely and aduenturously furprised the proud man at Parliament holden in Nottingham, with whom were taken the L. Geoffrey Mortimer his sonne, and Sir Simon de Bedford, who all three were fent prisoners to the Tower of London, vnder a strong guard. Which done, the king by common content of the Parliament tooke into his hands his mothers excessive Dower, & put her to a narrow penion of * one thousand pounds by yeer, circumscribing her within as narrow * limits for her abode, but doing her yeerely the honour and comfort of once or twice visiting her, though otherwise scarce thinking her worthy of life, in regard of her priuacie with Mortimer, and his many heinous practices.

(22) Oh, what enchantments are Honour and Power to the minds of men! how sodainely, and how strangely doe they blow vp the fame with the contempt of others, and forgetfulness of themselves? Certainly the fraile estate of mans constitution is clearelye scene in this high Lord, who drunken with felicitie, and fearing neither God nor man, fell into vtter confusion when least hee feared. The probable manner whereof is worthy the relating. There was in the Castle of Nottingham (and at this day is) a certaine secret way or Mine cut through a rocke, vpon which the said Castle is built, one issue whereof openeth toward the riuer of Trent, which runnes vnder it, and the other venteth it selfe farre within vpon the surface, and is (at this present) called Mortimers hole; through this, the yong King well armed, and stronglie seconded, was conducted with drawne swordes, by some his trustie and iworne seruants, (among which was that braue Montacute, whom his vertues vnder this King raised to the Earldome of Salisbury, &c.) vp to the Queenes Chamber, whose dore (so fearelesly is blinded affection) was vnshut, and with her was Mortimer (the kings Master as the rumor spread him) readie to go to bed, whom with the slaughter of a Knight, and one or two that resisted) they laid hold vpon. This was not reputed a slender enterprife, in regard that in Mortimers retinue were not fewer (they say) then one hundredth and fourescore Knights, besides Esquiers and Gentlemen.

But the most barbarous murder of the kings father, and speciallie the dishonourable peace and contract with the then professed enemies of England, were principallie insisted vpon as hainous treason. He was after sentence ignominiously drawne to Tyburne, the common place of execution, then called the Elms, and there vpon the common Gallows was as ignominiously executed, hanging (by the kings commandement) two daies and two nights, a publike & glad some spectacle. There died with him Sir Simon de Bedford Knight, & John Dowerel Esquier, as well for expiation of the late King Edwards death, as in complement, as it were of so great a mans fall, whose liues doe feldome, or neuer perish single.

(24) Now came Scotland turne about to suffer a gainie most grieuous losses and afflictions, an ordinarie effect of Childrens government, whether Children in age, or in discretion: for the Lord Edward Balliol hearing of King Roberts death, and the tender age of King David as son and heire of that Balliol, to whom king Edward the first had adjudged the Scots crown, with such voluntaries as hee could raise (though his Father the Lord John had * released his claime to king Robert, and though King Edward in fauour of his sister Ioan Queen of Scotland, would not openly at first support him) embark himselfe in Yorkshire, and inuaded that Realme, where, vpon his landing, he flew Alexander Setoun at Kingorn, and about nine hundred others, putting the rest to flight. Not long after (that no mischief might come alone) neere to the water of Erne, at a place called Dupline, where the Earles of Mar and March, with two puissant armies of Scots, for the defence of their yong King David lay encamped, the said Lord Edward (whose small numbers, not exceeding three thousand English, the Earles as securely and as fatally contemned, as the English vnder Edward the second had contemned the Bruce and his Scots) obtained of them a wonderfull victorie. Boetius (who neuer, or rarely, leaues any ouerthrow purely to the manhood of the English) will needs haue this discomfiture effected by a Camifado, the Balliol and his English with others passing the water of Erne by a Foord in the night, when the enemy little suspected it.

(25) The slaughter euen by his report was miserable: for there were slaine (saith he) the Earles of Marre and Carricke, and three thousand of the Noble, beside Commons. Our * Writers agree that this Foord was passed in the night, but that the fight endured from Sunne-rising till three of the Clocke afternoon, and that, besides the Earles of Marre, and Carricke, three other Earles, Meneth, Athol, and Murray, twelue Barons, eight hundred knights and men of Armes, beside about thirteene thousand other, lost there their liues. Of the English there were onelie slaine thirty and three * Esquiers: so that not without cause this victory was attributed rather to power diuine then humane.

(27) King Edward considering those foiles which his father had endured, and the oportunitie of the time, neither holding himselfe lyable in honour to that contract made on his behalfe by the predominant way of his mother and her Paramour Mortimer, as wherein hee tooke both himselfe, and the rights of his Crowne to haue bene wronged in his minority, which in point of gouernment hee was more bound to respect then his Sisters estate, and for that hee was informed that the Towne and Castle of Berwick belonged to the Crowne of his Realme; hee raised his power, and hauing with him Edward the new-crowned of Scotland, hee laid siege to that Towne and Castel in May. But before hee did this, there is who writes, that he summoned his bro-brother in law King David to doe homage and fealty vnto him, which when David would not yeeld to doe, nor confesse hee ought, no more then his father King Robert, hee made that a ground for the iudice of his warre, as reputing the Acts and releases at Northampton void.

(28) To the rescue of Berwicke, Archibald Douglas Earle of Angus, Gouernour of Scotland for King David, came with a puissant Army, and gaue King Edward battell at Halidon-hill, where with a lamentable slaughter of his people he was vanquished and slaine. This battell deuoured in a manner all the remainders of the Scottish Nobles which preferred it selfe at Dupline by retreat, or by absence from that field. There * perished besides Archibald, the Earles of Ros, Sutherland, and Carricke, three sonnes of the Lord Walter Stewart (whose issue afterward reigned in Scotland, when warre and death had made way to that line, by extirpation of the Male-Competitors in the races of Bruce and Balliol) and at least foureteene thousand others, with the losse (say some) of one Knight, and ten other Englishmen. Our * Writers affirm that the Scots were at this battell, threecore thousand strong, and that there * were slaine eight Earles, 1500. horsemen, and of the common Souldiers five and thirty thousand; which is not improbable, for so much as Heffor confesseth they were stopped in their flight, and put to the sword vpon all sides without mercy.

(29) Hereupon Berwicke was rendred, which the King of England detained as a supposed parcel of his Patrimony, and dismissed the Balliol to the gouernment of the Scottish Kingdome, with sundrie Lords and others of the English. And now the bloudie battles and cruell scores seemed euen betweene the two puissant (though then vnkind) neighbour-Nations, and Edward throughly redeemed the dishonour sustained at Banocksburn by his late father, deliuering his younger yeeres from that contempt, in which his enemies might otherwise haue holden him, as they had done at the entrance of his reign, playing vpon the English with Truffles and Rounds; of which this one is euerie where noted;

Long beards heartlesse, painted hoods witleffe, Gay coates gracelesse, make England thriflesse.

(30) As for the subornation of poisoning Earle Thomas Randal, and the hanging of Sir Alexander Setons two sonnes, contrarie to faith and law of Arms, at Berwicke with the like fauours which * one would fauour leaue vpon this victorious Prince, wee haue found no colour of warrant but his owne liberty of auouching, which therefore our freedome of nor believing him shall as easily take away and cancell. Neither would wee so farre haue touched this inraring string of discord betweene these two Nations, but that each out of their owne harms of old, may haue the more true sense of their felicity, by their new harmonical concordance.

(31) After that the * Nobles of Scotland had vnanimously confirmed Balliol in the kingdome thereof, and sworne vnto him faith and allegiance at Perth, hee repaired to the King of England at Newcastle upon Tyne, where hee * submitted to Edward King of England, as his Father had done to Edward the first, and with the like successe; for by occasion of such his submission, our Writers say, the Scots (as before they had done) fell off againe, which auersion, or defection was augmented vpon * priuate quarrels, and titles of inheritance to lands of great value, betwene powerful Competitors, and by other particular reuenges, to which a people so continually exercised in fight and battels were not slowlie prone.

pile of London) Edward king of England hauing with him the Balliol, and a sufficient Army, preuailed so much, that there was no appearance of rebellion; whereupon hee tooke backe with him the Lord Edward Balliol late crowned king of Scotland (of whose steadfastnes hee was (saith Heffor) alwaies ialous, & returned, leauing * David Comin Earle of Athol, gouernour for the parts beyond the Scottish sea, with sufficient force and authority (as was iudged) to take in such strengthes as yet stood out, but needed not his royal power or preface for their expugnation.

(33) The King of England hoping now that all was well there, had newes brought vnto him not long after, at the Parliament at London, that the Scots were out in Armes againe; whereupon hee obtaines aid of money from his Subiects for reprefing their attempts, promising to goe against them in person. * The Lord Robert Stewart, sonne of the Lady Mariorie Bruce, daughter of King Robert (vpon whose line the remainder of the Crown of Scotland had bene eisted) was the man that first lifted vp the head of his Country in this dangerous, sad, and desolate condition (though put into action vpon a priuate iniurie done vnto him by the Earle of Athol) to whom diuers did adhere, though the quarrel seemed properly to be the said L. Roberts, for that if the Bruces were cut off, his hopes perished in them. The Earle of Murray and hee were then chosen gouernours for King Davids party, but by reason of the diligence and power of David Earle of Athol, they were not able as yet to conuene, or effect any thing against the English: neuertheless it was not long before they slew the said Earle David. At this Parliament the King of England purposed to * goe vpon his owne charge into the Holy-Land, and to send the Archbishoppe of Canterbury to deale with Philip de Valois King of France, for appointing a certaine time, wherein they two with their vnitied forces, might take their voyage thither, from which the desire of obtaining the Crowne of France, vpon the fore-mentioned title, did quickly diuert him.

(34) Mean-while, in accomplishment of the Parliaments expectation, King Edward after * Michaelmas marched againe into Scotland with an Armie, and sent his Nauie to the Forth: The Sea-Force whereof, spoyled the Coasts on both sides of the Forth, or Scottish Sea, and putting on land in Saint Colms, they spoyled the Abbey; which Sacrilege, * Heffor notes was severely punished, the whole Fleece being battered with tempest, and some of the ships perishing. At another time also the like sacrilege being perpetrated there, (hee saith) that the shippe wherein the vnlawfull prize was, sunke sodainely to the Seaground without any tempest. The King himselfe comming to * Perth, to order the Scottish affaires, whiles hee abode there, the Earle of Murray one of the Gouernours was taken Prisoner, who was after * deliuered vpon Exchange for the Earle of Namur, (who the Scots by like Art had taken) or as Heffor will haue it, for the Earle of Salisbury.

(35) By the mediation of the French, the Scots had a short truce granted them. But about the end of May, the King sent his cosen the Lord Henry, sonne to Henry Earle of Lancaster, with a great Army to the aid and seruice of the Lord Edward Balliol King of Scotland, which wasted all the Countries about Perth; where, while they lay, the King with a very small Company came sodainely vnto them, and from thence pierced farther oneway then euer his Grandfather Edward had done, suffering fire & death (the common furies of warre) to worke vpon all that might suffer destruction to establish a Conquest. Hee marcht vp as farre as * Elgin and Buquhan, and in his returne to Marre, * burnt the Towne of Aberdeen, in reuenge for * Sir Thomas Rosslyn, a Knight, whom the Towne-men thereof had slaine. The Lord Robert Stewart had great landes in those parts, for Murray and Buquhan were his, which also might might the rather move this severe proceeding: which done, King Edward having repaired sundry Castles there, and leaving Scotland to the new King thereof with forces competent, came back into England. (36) Who to enlarge the magnificence of his roial estate and amplitude, as meditating farre greater matters then those vnprofitable warres (the bodys and treasure which were employed and spent therein, being able to compasse farre more noble achievements) * created Prince Edward his eldest son Earle of Chester, and Duke of Cornwall, and at the same solemnity six other Earles, & twenty knights, one of which Knights was Thomas de la Moore, whose name hath bene often cited as an Author.

(37) There was in speciall credit with King Edward, one Sir Robert de Artoys, who being banished by the French King out of those parts, and made (by King Edward) Earle of Richmond, laboured earnestly (vpon hatred to the French King for his private discontentments) to draw him to claime the Crown of France as his most lawfull right, and as that which would indeed enrich his people with spoiles, and treble his owne greatness by the Conquest: The motion though by reason of the highnesse and difficultie of the enterprize, it did not at first preuaile; yet at last by the euill fate of France wrought out to it selfe a wonderfull allowance. Many consultations passing of the matter, it could not be so concluded, but that the smoke thereof discovered the breeding fire. This in the present was very happy for the state of Scotland, which (saith Hector) was in appearance so enfeebled, that if the King of England had continued his warres, it should haue come without any hope of reliefe to utter ruine. It was also a cause, why the French (who hitherto had supported the Scots, but not as if so neerely concerned themselves) put in the more fully and roundly, seeking by all means to weaken and annoy the English, as well in Scotland, as in Gascogne, and where else fouler.

(38) That wee may with the lesse confusion, and fewer interruptions, deliuer our selues of the French warre which now approached, wee will here in one view tender vnto you the Scottish affaires, from this time for seuen or eight yeeres, till about the siege of Calis by King Edward, who was scarce alighted in England from the former expedition, but the Bruce party (vnder their chiefe leader Andrew Murray) issued from the Loughes, Mountaines, and other their places of retreat and fastnesse, to readuance their cause. King Edward once or twice sent Armies, vnder valiant Generals to support the Baliols possession against their violence, whose successe was variable till the death of Murray. After whom the L. Stewart tooke charge for the Bruce side, and (vpon the aduantage of King Edwards slacknesse, to finish his Scottish affaires, the matter of France so far preponderating it) endeauoured to prepare a quiet entrance for King David. The aide of the Lord William Douglas to that purpose was very auailable, howbeit not alwayes fortunate, being ouerthrowne in a set battell by Sir Thomas Berkeley at Blackbourne, having there with him King Edwards power. To the vp-throt, and as it were deciding stroke of these late miseries, there arrived great store of munition out of France, at such time as the Lord Robert Stewart having lien ten weeks at the siege of Perth, was almost ready to haue abandoned the same in despair. Perth being rendered, the Baliol (whose the quarrell was) betooke himself into England, hauing small strength of his owne in the hearts and affections of the Scots, who reuolted dayly from him. Vpon sure intelligence of all these matters, King David, his Queene, and many honourable French, and Scots, return, and till the quarrell of Philip de Valois put him into vnfortunate Armes against the English, the afflicted Realme of Scotland enioyed a kind of rest and quiet.

(39) It was not now the iustice of his Title to the Crowne of France, which onely made King Edward vnseath his conquering sword against the French; for Philip de Valois king of France iniuriously withheld sundry Townes and places in Gascogne. To remedy which violent wrongs the king of England had addrest * Ambassadors, though without any good successe.

(40) But, that the world might take true notice of his iust proceedings, the main causes for iustificatio of his design vpon France (whereby the common cause against the Turke was neglected) himselfe in a copious Epistle, directed to the Colledge of Cardinals, doth publicly declare to be these;

1 His Title to the Crowne of France, which Philip de Valois vniuilly detained, for that himselfe, of any * Male liuing, was the next in blood to the late King Charles his uncle.

2 That his Agents and Ambassadors desiring to put the cause to ciuill triall, were not onely not admitted to bee heard, but were driven away with feare of their liues.

3 That the Court of the Twelve Peeres, in giuing the Crowne from him, (who was then vnder age,) did therein leaue the office of Iudges, and were no better then robbers. And therefore their processe made to his prejudice during his minority, was by all lawes void and frustrate.

4 That Philip de Valois invaded the Dutchie of Aquitaine, which belonged to the Crowne of England, and added such places and lands as hee had so wrongfully gotten, to those which hee had as wrongfully withheld, detaining all alike.

5 That hee had aided and assisted the Scots in their risings against him, when as by reason of neare kindred he should rather haue holpen him; and finally declared by his doings, that his honour, power and life it selfe, were hated of him.

(41) King Edward neuertheless (knowing that words were little worth in such a case) to strengthen his quarrell with friends, by the aduise of his counsell, and of his Father in law, the Lord William Earle of Hennault, sought to confederate and vnite vnto him the High and Low Dutch, Princes and people, which lay most commodiously for his vses. But the better to hold them together, hee was aduised to seeke the amity of the Emperour Lewis of Bauare, with whom hee made (as by the cuent was manifested) but an * vnprofitable confederation, though for the present it seemed to serue his vses with the countenance: more to his aduantage were the singular endeuours of some other his priuate instruments, as chiefly of James de Arteuille, a wealthy Burger of Gant, one of a rare dexterity of witte, and so popularly acceptable among the Flemings, that he seemed to sway Flanders more by far then the Earle thereof, whom they had expelled. By the speciall diligence of this Jaques van Arteuille, and of one * Siger de Courtray a Nobleman of Flanders, there was prepared among the Artizans of those parts (whose chiefe enrichments depended vpon the handling of English wool, as Cloth-workers, Weauers, and the like) a mighty party for the English against the French. This amity with England (as most profitable for the common benefite, and weale of his Country) the said James most constantly supported to the death.

(42) Meane while King Edward (the life of this high affaire) proceeded in all things with ripe deliberation and iudgement. Therefore to let the Flemings know the want of his friendship, hee had for some yeeres before inhibited the transportation of his Wools; which, and for that the English were in

in a manner become all one with them, by king Edwards marriage with the Lady Philipp, not a little advanced the practice of James on his behalfe; which was sped at last, by occasion of * an overthrow giuen to the French Flemings, who vnder the conduct of Guy the Bastard of Flanders, brother to the Earle (both of them being wholly French) were placed in the Ile of Calis to empeach the arrival of the English, who tooke the said Guy, and slew the most part of his people. This victory was achieved in the quarrell of the king of England by the Earle of Derbie, the Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Reynald Cobham, the Lord Walter de Manny (an Hennowald) and other of the English Captaines: Of the fame and lucky fortune whereof the said D^r Arteuill, and other of the kings friends, made so wise and seasonable vse, by letting them see the English were able to protect them, that the Flemings (without any great stay) became his firme confederates, in preference of the Earle of Gelder at Gant, notwithstanding that at the same time the great K. of France, and their own naturall Lord, the Earle, laboured all they could to the contrary.

(43) But as king Edward was (in the mean space) wholly intent, vpon furnishing himselfe with all convenient things fite for his warre, (hauing Captaines and Souldiers, such as his owne noble heart could wish,) so when hee found that the industrious Dutch by their manuell labours, grew to so great strength and opulencie, that their friendship bred riuallitie in puissant Monarches, hee, like a father, regarding the publike weale of his Country, ordained that all Clothworkers, who would repaire hither out of foraine parts, and exercise their trades, should haue free access and sundry priuiledges. By which inuitation as very many were drawne, so was it the principall cause of aduancing that honest, best and most beneficiall Trade in the Kingdome, to the great enrichment, strength, and honor thereof. The English Nation was very desirous to set forward this warre, and therefore contributed plentifully, and the King made bold with Lombards, and the moueable goods of such Priories in England, as were Cels to Monasteries in France, thereby to make his coffers fuller.

(44) The warre which all this while seemed but to be talked of, did now beginne to blaze (and indeed a blazing starre of 30. dayes continuance, was supposed by some to foreshew it) whose first torch was lighted by the * French at Southampton, which they almost wholly consumed to ashes, but they with losse of their Captaine, (a younger sonne to the Sicilian King) and about three hundred others, * were driven away the next morrow. The French had sundry shippes of warre or Gallies, which vnder colour of passing to the Holy-Land, the king of France had (with purpose to assaile our Coasts) assembled, as the * King of England charged him: which losse, yet was not long vnrequited, either Nation grieuing over with mutual mischiefs.

(45) To appease and extinguish this deadly quarrell, there came from Pope Benedict the 12. two Cardinals hither, but one of them in a speech to the Clergie, seeming to fauour the French faction; John Archbishoppe of Canterbury immediately stood vp, and protested, that the Cardinals Arguments were vaine and frivolous: whereupon they soone after departed, and it was euerie where published through England, that the King had right to the Crown of France, which also hee meant by honourable force to prosecute. Notwithstanding, King Edward for auoiding Christi-an blood-shed, gaue instructions to the Cardinals, that vpon certaine equal conditions, hee was willing to make an euerslasting peace with the French, & would haue bene verie glad (the hazards of warre considered) to haue taken any honest or proportionable offers; one impediment whereof was this, that the French would include the Scots within the Treatie, whom King Edward would not admit ther-unto, as purposing (when hee had singled them from supplies) to make a full and absolute annexation of their obediences to the English Scepter: so the labour and hopes of the Cardinals proued vaine.

(46) Philip de Valois in possession King of France, had sundry great and high motives to embolden his standing-off. First, the regard of honour, and profit, and the abundant meanes which hee had, hauing the whole puissance of France (the fairest kingdome vnder heauen) at his commandement. Then a confidence which hee reasonably conceiued (so to diuert, or distract the English forces, by the assured aide of the Scots, as that it should finally ruine the whole enterprize, if not also the principall Actor Edward himselfe. Again, considering the vaines of the enterprize, hee iudged King Edwards wealth not to bee proportionable, but did well hope, that a short dalliance would consume his treasures. Moreover, hee iudged perhaps, that the very thought it selfe of conquering France, was no better in Edward then a young mans dream, considering the Realm of England was farre inferior in bignesse, and multitudes of Subiects, and that there was a Sea betwene, the crossing whereof must double the charge. Lastly, for the friends which King Edward had procured in Dutchland with wonderful largesse, hee knew, would not be held together but with infinite cost and expence, and that by some good meanes or other, hee should make them in whole, or in part vnprofitable.

(47) For iustification of his cause hee had no slender colours, or reasons. As the before alleged law or custome of France, which they call the Salique, by the which the French exclude * Gyneocracie, or Womens Government in chiefe. Then an Act of the whole French State, by which his right was acknowledged and established. Thirdly, King Edwards birth place, by which hee seemed to them a stranger, and for that cause was farre the lesse capable, or rather was directly incapable of popular goodwill among the French. Lastly, for that King Edward in the * beginning of his raigne (though when hee was as yet vnder age,) did in his owne person, both doe his homage to this very Philip de Valois, as to the king of France, for his Dutchie of Aquitaine, and also by his Letters-Patents vnder seale did testifie as much. This homage, (the more to bee remembered because * some attribute much of K. Edwards discontentment to the hauty manner of Philip in taking the same) was performed at Amiens in Picardie. It troubled King Edward greatly, to see himselfe making submission to the vsurper of that Soueraignitie, which hee thought belonged to himselfe; but to let the French see what kind of Prince hee was, hee came in so royall maner appointed, as if hee meant to haue stricken them with feare or admiration; Earles, Barons, and 1000. horse hee had in his retinue. At the day, his robe was of crimson veluet, powdered with golden Leopards, his crowne on his head, a sword by his side, and golden spurres on his heeles. To receiue this Duke for the Dutchie of Guyen and Earledome of Ponthieu, Philip de Valois late crowned with golden veluet, semed with golden fillies, with all the other Ensignes of royall maiestie, but the homage was done only by word (if * one say true) and not in that full manner which Serres mentioneth. Probable it is, that the haughty carriage of Philip did greatly incense the Spirit of King Edward, being one of the most gallant in the world.

(48) There is among VVriters much time, and labour spent in description of King Edwards iourney, stay and contracts of amity made in Dutchland, but in regard that no greater matter was effected thereby, then the purchase of an opinion of magnificence & noblenesse among the Queenes Country-men and Dutch-landers, few lines shall serue to comprehend the narration. The King (hauing first in * Parliament provided for the gouernance of his Kingdome) with the Queen (then great with Child) the

the young Prince Edward, many Earles and great Capitaines, with a gallant Company of men of war, failed to Antwerpe, whom Lewis the Emperour met at the City of Colein, where amity was confirmed, and King Edward was constituted his Lieutenant, with full authority to gouerne in his name on this side Colein. By reason of which Vicegerencie King Edward made out his commandements, and did many things to his advantage and profit. Howsoever it neither lasted long (for Lewis within a while dishonourably reuoked it,) and did vndoubtedly scarce quit the cost: for the brauery of that meeting was so exceeding great, as Edward easily won the general opinio of a very noble & puissant king. *Polydor writes, that Edward refused not the office, yet would not exercise the same, because he would not displease Pope Benedict, whose enemy the Bauiarian was.

(49) This Emperour (whom belike the Pope hated, for being as proud as himselfe) tooke it ill, (as report went) that the King of England humbled not himselfe (at their meeting) to the kisse of his foot. But it was answered; that the King of England was a King anointed, and had life and member in his power, and therefore ought not to submit himselfe, so much as an other King that was not anointed. After his returne to Antwerpe with his

The Armes of England for before the hole of France at the first. Sir Robert Cotton hath such a scale of Q. 1. 1. 1.

(51) Polydor * Virgil must haue a warie and fauourable Reader, or hee will bee thought to bee of opinion, that William the Conqueror bare his Leopards quartered, then which nothing is more vntrue, nor more vnlikely. Others againe may suppose, that we haue not here described them according to their right bearing, as certainly according to their present bearing wee haue not; but the truth is, the golden Lillies of France, which now are borne in triangle, were in those dayes borne, and aduanced Semi.

(52) And whereas the Armories of France are placed here in the dexter and more honorable quarter, yet there are probabilities, that it was not so at this their first coniunction. For in the * Seale of Queen Isabel (this King Edwards mother) the Armories of England, as being the Armories of the husbands line (and therefore to haue precedence) were marshalled where now the Flower de Luces shine. But whether to gratifie the French, or because that was the more ancient and greater Monarchie, they were in this Kings reigne disposed as here wee see.

new power, hee seriously prosecuted his affaire of confederation with the Lords and people of Dutchland, among whom (with great loue and fauour) he and his royall family abode about an whole yeere. The principall Nobles which entered into this league against the French were these. The Archbishoppe of Colein Prince Elektor; The Duke of Brabant, The Duke of Gelderland, (who had married the Lady Isabel King Edwards yong sister, and about this season was of an Earle created a Duke; The Marquess of Gulick, &c. And finally, the Hanse townes.

(50) The Flemings, being the most necessary part of this association, in regard of their neerenes to the French, would not engage themselves in an offensive warre against the Crowne of France, vnlesse King Edward would first assume the Title and Armories of that Realme, as the onely lawful King thereof. This Proposition was thoroughly debated, and the law of Armes allowing it, hee with the common assent of the Flemings and others, tooke the Stile, and quartered the Flower de Lize with the Leopards, or Lions of England, as here wee see annexed; albeit wee see his former Seale also adorned with two Lize or Lillies, whether in token of his mothers French descent, or as a covert note of his own right to the French crown it is vncertaine.

acknowledge him their Lord and rightfull Soueraigne. These proclamations or admonishments thus diuulged, he burnt and spoiled the North parts of France vpon as farre as * Turwin, though the time of the yeere were very vnseasonable, and contenting himselfe therewith for a beginning, gaue place to the sharpnesse of Winter, returning to the Queen his wife at Antwerpe where he kept a royall Christmas. In which City this yeere was Lionel (afterward Duke of Clarence) borne.

(54) His affaires growing ripe in those parts, he leaues his Queene and Children in Brabant, as an assured pledge of his returne, and about Candlemas shippes himselfe for England, where in a Parliament at Westminster, he obtained liberall aids for supportation of his intended Conquest. In lieu of which louing assistances, hee granted a generall large pardon both for trespasses, and of all Aides for making his sonne Knight, and for marriage of his daughter during all his times; forgiving also all arrearages of Farmers and Accountants till the tenth year of his Raigne, and all old debts due to any of his Predecessors. Finally, hee confirmed that famous Magna Charta, and of the Forest with some other.

(55) There was no talke now but of conquering France; Mustres taken throughout the Kingdom, Armourers and trades of warre (to be cherished euen in the securest peace) were full of employment, and the desire of battell waxt feruent every where.

1. 1. 1. 1. 1.

Meane while to hold the world in suspence of the success, God distributed the fortune of attempts diuersly. Burdeaux (the capitall City of Aquitaine, and then English) gaue an excellent testimony of her loyalty, nor lesse of martiall witte and valour. For the French Armie coming before her, she to abuse their hope, set open her gates, and displayed vpon her Towers the golden Lillies, as if shee were theirs; but the French which securely entered, found little good hospitality. Sir Olivier de Ingham was Captain and Lord Warden there for King Edward, who with his Garrison-Souldiers, and aide of the inhabitants, slew of them great multitudes, and preferred Burdeaux. But in the opposite parts, William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, after many honourable deedes performed for aduancement of King Edwards affaire, were by the French taken Prisoners, while presuming too much vpon their courages and fortune, they ran too far into their danger, at the Towne of Lile in Flanders.

(56) But King Edward being ready now to repasse the Seas, had certaine intelligence that the French lay in wait about Sluice in Flanders, to intercept him with a mighty Naue of 400. shippes; who therefore prepared accordingly, intending to open his way by force. He set saile from Harwich vpon Saint John Baptists Eue, toward the Coast where his enemies attended, strengthening himselfe with the Northerne Naue of England, which the L. Robert Morley brought vnto him, so as hee had in all about two or three hundred saile. His battels hauing the aduantages of windes and sunne, hee set on the French with incredible furie and force, in the very mouth of the Hauen of Sluice vpon Midsummer day, where beganne a most bloody and terrible fight, the end whereof set the Garland vpon King Edwards head. Himselfe was * wounded in that fight, and lost foure valiant Knights (Monthermer, Latimer, Boteler, Poynings) with sundrie other of his English laine therein. But the slaughter of the French party were lamentable, for thirty thousand are confesse to haue perished, not halfe of their shippes escaped vtaken or vnfuncke. A greater glory then this, the English are scarce found to haue achieved at any battell at sea.

(57) The Crowne of France seemed already to bee placed vpon King Edwards Temple, so much was attributed to this great victory, but such a Conquest was not the worke of one day. Which King Edward well vnderstanding, refreshed his victorior Armie, and augmenting it with his Confederates forces (which repaired to him on all sides) marched forth, hauing one of the most puissant hosts that euer any King of England led, as wherein were neere an hundred thousand Souldiers English, and Dutch. Hee had also in his Company the Dukes of Brabant and Gelder, and many other potent members of the Empire, and (as * some write) the imperiall Eagles displayed in the head of his Armie, as hee that was Vicegerent of the sacred Roman Empire. In this wise hee approached the Northerlie parts of France, where exposing all to spoile & fire, hee late downe with his whole Forces about Turney, meaning to take in the same, atwell to bee a seate of Warre, as place of sure retreat and refuge.

(58) Philip, though iustly grieved with his wofull losse sustained at Sea, yet to encounter, and cruell so great an euill in the first approaches thereof, had provided such an Armie, as befemed the Maiestie and greatnesse of that renowned Kingdom. Writers speake of an hundred thousand fighting men assembled vnder his command, and that besides Princes, Dukes, Earles, and other illustrious Persons, there was the cheualier old King of Bohemia, and * Lewis king of Nauarre. K. Edward hearing the same, drew forth his people into the open field with purpose to giue battell.

(59) It may seeme a thing greatly tending to King Edwards glory, to remember the * offer which hee sent to King Philip before hee laid his siege to Turney. In which, without saluting him by any other title then of Philip of Valois, hee challengeth him, for auoiding the effusion of Christian blood; to fight with him hand to hand in single battell, or (if that misliked) then each to bring an hundred to the field, and trie the euent with so small an hazards or otherwise, within ten dayes to ioyne full battell with all their forces neere to Turney. Whereunto Philip made no direct answer, neither with his honour could, alledging that the letters were not sent to him, the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valois. Neuerthelesse, hee gaue him to vnderstand, that his meaning was to beat him out of France, hauing hope in Christ (from whom hee deriued his power) so to doe.

(60) The honour of the warre in those ages cannot bee enough commended, in which the noble old formes of hostility were put in practise, by defiances, Heraldes, and publike assignations of day and place of fight, and not by skulking surprisles and vnder-hand dealthes, more newly resembling high-way robberies, then lawfull battell.

(62) It is not meet that the name of that person who did performe so blessed an office, should bee concealed. It was a woman of honour (but at that time a professed Nunne in the Abbey of Fontenelle) the Lady Iane of Valois, sister to this Philip, widow of William late Earle of Henault, and mother to King Edwards wife; her charitable endeauours were strongly holpen by * two Cardinals, who solicited peace together with her. Great interest of mediation she had in either respect, here a brother, there a sonne in law, and shee failed not to plic them both. The Truce was concluded; the rather for that King Philip was aduised from all parts, not to set his whole fortunes vpon the Die and chance of a Battell. And Edward (on the other side) meaning nothing lesse, then not to haue prosecuted the war vpon the encouragement of his late Sea-victorie, was so destitute of money through the fault of his Officers in England, as hee was the sooner drawne, if not enforced to embrace so honest a colour of returning from the siege of Turney; which neuerthelesse did but deferre the miseries of France, not determine them; & whereas that glory, which the vpper hand in this iourney would haue brought, could not haue bene pure and meere vnto him, because the Dutch (whose aide hee vied) would haue claimed no small share therein, the English Cheualrie onely had the name and burthen of such great Acts as after followed.

(63) The chiefe Articles of the truce were; That it should endure till Midsummer day then next ensuing, and that the Prisoners should bee set at liberty without any rancome on both sides, vpon condition to render themselves againe, or pay their feuerall rancomes, if peace were not in the meane time concluded. By vertue of this treaty and truce, the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke were deliuered. Here it troubled our * Vfford, that King Edward should bee left so destitute, and neede by the auarice or fraud of his officers at home, as for that respect to giue ouer so faire an opportunity, by which hee might as it were by a continued line, and by insisting and pressing vpon the steppes of his late success.

friend to life, gave life notwithstanding about this time to an institution, which as for the present it served (he having so great use thereof for his French enterprises) as a vehement incentive to martiall valour, and a golden band of unity, so the same continued with likelihood of perpetuity, and multiplication of splendor in these our daies. It was the foundation of the English order, worthily called the most noble order of the Garter. The causes why our Edward erected it, are not evident, though there could none be greater or better, then those before recited; Honor expressed by external and illustrious ensignes, devised by a victorious Author, and appropriated to a fellowship of most exemplar and eminent persons, being in nature like a flame, to kindle in the apt and worthy, all heroicke affections. The vulgar opinion is, that whatsoever the remoter causes were which moved to this foundation, the neerer cause, or the occasion was, a Garter of his owne Queene (or as some say) of the Lady Ioan, Countesse of Salisbury (wonder of that age for shape and beauty) which slipping off in a dance, king Edward stooped and tooke vp. Such of the Nobles as were present, smiling, and playing in sport with that action of the Kings, as amorous, hee seriously said, it should not be long before there should Sovereigne honour be done to that filken tie. Whereupon hee afterward added the French Motte, or Symbolicall word HONI SOIT QUI MALY PENSE, as well in complement of the whole institution, as in retort or checke of his Courtiers sinister supposition. Polydor Virgil troubleth himselfe to make an Apologie for the courtesie of this Originall, if (without iniurie) an office of honorable loue in so renowned a Monarch, may vndergoe the note of courtesie; but the same Polydor among his other defences thereof truly saith;

Nobilitas sub amore iacet.

There want not some who coniecture, that he entailed it the Order of the Garter, for that in a battell wherein he was victorious, hee had giuen the word Garter, for the word or signe. But if credite may be attributed to the originall* Booke of the Institution, the institution is deduced from times more ancient, and that when Richard the first King of England, set forward against the Turks and Sarazens to Cyprus, and Acon, and waxed wearie of longer delay, while the siege of Acon was with wonderfull care protracted, courage at the length (by the comming of S. George among them as it was thought) quickning in him, it came into his mind to tie about the legs of certaine his choice Knights, a Garter or small thong of leather, the only fustie fite for such a purpose, which hee had then at hand, to the intent that they (as it were by ioint consent) being mindfull of future glory, if they were victorious, might bee stirred vp, to demean themselves nobly after the example of the Romans, with whom that varietie of Crownes or Garlands giuen for sundry causes as honourable Ensignes to the Soldier was in vye to the intent, that by such incitements, they might shake off sloath, and the spirite of courage might rise, and breake forth the more frequently.

(80) And into this opinion of stirring vp vertue thereby, the * Author of the Britannia seemeth to passe, where hee saith, that King Edward the third founded this Order, to * adorn Martiall vertue with honors, rewards and splendor.

(81) There was in the Castle of Windsor (the ordained seat of the Order now first to be consummated) before King Edward did accomplish his intention, in honour of God, our Lady, and S. George, a Chappell erected by King Henry the first, and other Progenitors of Edward, with an allowance for eight Canons, to whose Colledge this Prince added a Decane, fiftene Canons more, and twenty and foure poore impotent Knights, with other officers and seruants, as appeareth by his Charter. These were to pray for the good estate of the Sovereigne and Brethren of the most noble Order. The Sovereigne and Knights themselves had their particular lawes and constitutions, which they were by solemn oath bound to observe, of which one * was, That they should defend and assist one the other: which afterward made Alphonse Duke of Calabria receive the habite of that Order with so exceeding reuerence at Naples, as erroneously thinking himselfe secured thereby from the French, who claimed that Kingdome. But that custome of mutuall assistance (saith * Polydor) was then worne out of vse, and discontinued every where; for those Italian Potentates who (within the memory of Polydor) being driven forth of their Country, and imploring aid of those orders, whereof themselves were companions, found no supporture, either from the French or Burgundians, who had formerly elected them. Besides laws and Officers, King Edward also deuised particular Ceremonies & distinctiue habites and ensignements, whereof the principall was the azure Garter, wherein the French Motte of the Order was wrought in letters of gold, and the Garter it selfe fastned a little vnder the left knee with a buckle of gold, in * token of Concord. There are speciall Manuscript Bookes of the Constitutions, and other things peculiar to this Order, to which (this place being not aptly capable of their recapitulation) wee must referre the curious. Saint George the * esteemed patterne of Christian fortitude, is intitled to the Patronage of this Order, & the beauteous Chappell in Windsor Castle (where his * day is yearly celebrated) consecrated by King Edward to his memory. The fortune of this institution hath bene such, that the most mighty Princes of the Christian world haue thought themselves most highly honoured, in being chosen thereunto, so that there haue bene about two and twenty forraine Emperors and Kings (besides many others of most noble quality) since the first institution thereof, elected and admitted Companions of the Garter. The Kings of England are in their seuerall times Sovereignes of the Order, and the whole number of Knights is circumscribed in twenty and six, whereof the Sovereigne is one. The names of the first twenty and six (who are also styled Founders of the Order) you shall finde intabed in our Mappe of Barkshire.

(82) Our Edward * having thus honoured S. George memory, assigned to his Image mounted in Armour vpon Horsebacke a silver Shield with a crosse Gules (* the deare remembrance of his dying Lord) and * appointed his Souldiers to wear white coats or lackets, with a red Crosse before and behind ouer their Armor, that it was not onely a comely, but a stately sight to behold the English battels, like the rising Sunne to glitter farre off in that pure hew; when the Souldiers of other Nations in their baser weedes could not bee discerned. The glory therefore of this Order seemed such to one, no * vnlearned Poet, that in an Apostrophe to Windsor, speaking of the Garter, hee breakes forth into these scarce Hyperbolicall verses.

- Cappadocis quoniam sis clara Georgi Militia, &c.

*Far spreads thy fame, wherewith S. Georges knights Hath made thee glorious; where rich-rabed Peeres, Whose many legs the golden garter dights, Combine that light which through all landes appeares.
Thine now Burgundians, borne their Fleece of Gold;
The French, thy Escalopt Collar fit with grace; Their Crosted weedes, Rhodes, Elba, Alcala, hold As worthless: all made with thy George, are base.*

(83) Let vs not dwell too long in the lesser things: It was the moneth of Iulie, and King Edward was now vpon the Sea with about a thousand

* Saile. No man is said to know whether he bent his course, so well he could trust himselfe, and so wisely free his Councils from the possibility of discouerie. He went not to warre by rote, but by book; widome was Herbenger and marshall of his valour; who shall say he knew not how to conquer? It was not long but he came to anchor in the Hauens of Holy Saint Vast, in Constantine, a great cape of land or penile in Normandy. His land forces did muster twenty and five hundred horse, and thirty thousand foote, most of which were Archers. The lights, and glories of his Armie, were the Prince of Wales (then about sixteen years old, who was then by his father knighted) many braue Earles, Lords, Knights, and expert Cheifs, the English going cheerefullie, as hauing gotten such a King as answered their warlike dispositions. The Earle of Huntington had charge of his Navy; himselfe takes seuerer reuenge for the blood of his friends vpon the Norman Townes and people, protecing he sacrificed them * to Cliffon, Baro, Perce, and the rest. Their heads were set vpon the chiefe Gate of Caentine, for which cause hee slew all that could be found therein, and turning the whole town into Cinders gaue it to their funeral. He tooke the populous and rich City of Caen, & with his dreadfull host burning and spoiling round about, marched vp almost as farre as the very walles of Paris, brauing King Philip to neere.

(74) Who had not slept all this while, but was * purued of one of the fullest armies which euer were scene in France. King Edward people rich with spoile seemed not vnwilling to return. They were now in the enemies Country between the two good riuers of Seine and Some, for they had passed the Seine at Poisse, whose Bridge (as all other betweene Rouen and Paris) had bene broken downe by the French, and now (notwithstanding any opposition) in a short space repaired. It was thought fit to seeke passage out of these straights, which could not be by Bridges, for they were broken by the French. This search for passage, was by the enemy interpreted a kind of flight, and Edward could not but be willing to nourish their temerity, to draw them on securely to destruction by such a seeming feare.

(85) The riuers of Some, betweene Albeville and the Sea, at a low water hath a passable and grauellie foord, knowne by the name of Blanch Tague; this was discovered to him by one Gobina prisoner. But the French King (best acquainted in his owne Countrey) to empeach this passage, had before sent thither a Norman Baron of speciall note, one Gadmar du Foy, and a 1000. thousand horse with at least 6000. foot; but Edward, (whom as obstacles made impetuous, so nothing could dismay,) enters himselfe into the foord, * crying, He that loues me let him follow me, as one that resolved either to passe, or die. Who can tell the efficacy of such a Generals spirit, but they, who haue had the happinesse to follow vnder the conduct? The passage wan, and Du Foy defeated in a manner, before he was almost fought with, (the incomparable courage of his enemies appalling him,) he brought to King Philip fewer by a paire of thousands, then he carried forth; besides terrour, and an euill signe of that which followed. The English, who knew not what it meant to run away, but were before resolved to liue & die with such a Sovereigne, had reason now much more to resolve the same.

(86) King Edward was neere to Cresie in the County Ponthieu, lying betweene the riuers of Some and Anthy (which vnquestionably belonged vnto him in right of his mother,) there most vigilantly provided he for his defence. King Philip, set on fire with this disaster, precipitates to battell for accomplishment of Gods anger against France; being the rather drawne; by the vnruly vanity of his huge multitudes, (for by what other words doe * an hundred or six-score thousand men deserve to be called?) who neuer left ouer-taking one the other, till the view of the English banners and battels put them to stand. We professe that the nature of our vndertakings will not brooke descriptions at large; you shall haue it as we may, that is, as remembering, that innumerable great achievements rest behind, somewhat impatiently attending their relation.

(87) Therefore, the holy name of God first intyocated, King Edward, without shewing the least signe of perturbation, but full of an Heroick asseurednesse, had ordered his people in three battels, with their wings and succours. The Paradise disposed into the forme of an Hearse, where the Archers stood in front, and the men of armes in the bottom, was vnder the yong Lyon of Wales, Prince Edward, and with him many of the prime and fagst Captaines: Beauchamp Earle of warwick, Godfrey of Harcourt, The Lords, Stafford, Laxare, Bourchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, &c. In the second battell were, The Earles of Northampton, and Arundell; the Lords, Rosse, Willoughby, Basset, Saint Albine, Miltoun, &c. The third and last battell was commanded in cheife by King Edward himselfe, with the residue of his Nobles and people. In euery one of these battels, beside the wings, were a iust proportion of men at armes and Archers, but nothing so thinne and few as some of our * writers alledge, who mention not about 9000. all together, who were at least thrice as many in their whole numbers, and not without need.

(88) King Edward closed his battels at their back, (as if he meant to barricado them from flying,) by selling and plashing of Trees, placing his carriages there and other impediments whatsoever, hauing commanded * all men to put from them their horses, which were left among the carriages. Thus all waies of safety by flight being preuented, the necessity did vndoubtedly double their courages. Thus placed to the best advantage, King Edward visiteth the rankes in person, riding vpon a pleasant * Hobby, (hauing onely a white rod in his hand, as if hee would chastise fortune,) betweene the two marshalls of his field; whose very presence, with a few seasonable and vnforced words on behalfe of God and his right, in feed of long Orations, did inspire the faintest hearts among them with fressest vigour and alacritie.

(89) Our writers describe not vnto vs the quality or face of the ground of Cresie where this battel was determined (though verie much doth depend vpon choise of place,) neither the exact figures, or seuerall numbers of euery seuerall battel, their distances, wings or other warlike formes, nor finally what Pallisado, trench, or other deuise was in this or that quarter vsed, to keepe off and breake the furious charge of men of Armes, before they came at the Archers, principall workmen at this bloody iourney. But thus lamely are things commended to Posterity, where the Actors themselves take no care to see the particulars orderly and according to the truth delineated; but either are vnlearned, or giue themselves to the bodily fruition of their passed trauels, rather then to exercise their minds in profiting themselves and others by such relations as are made with life and art. This we find, that the place of the Englishmens battels was the Towne of Cresie, and Forest, and therefore apt with small labour to be made inaccessible, or at leastwise difficult for horse to enter vpon; that also the English battels were marshalled to the most advantage for giuing succour one vnto the other; and that there were * Shields or Pavises to shelter our Archers from the Geno-waies shot.

(90) By this time King Philip (whose countenance is * said to haue changed thereat,) was in sight of the English. Hee had with him the two Kings of Boheme and Moravia, and almost innumerable other great Princes, Dukes, Earles, Barons and Gentlemen of inferior marke bearing Armes; nor those onlie French, but very many of them Almain and Dutch, lest you should suppose, he had drawne away Lords the land old Crowne. The Pope sending a Messenger from Avignon, with an ouerture to intercede for a peace, had answer, that the message must be sent to the King his father, for he could not meddle without commandement from him. Mean while hee disposed of things without impeachment, and returned laden with honor and spoiles to Burdeaux, where the winter being spent, he sets forth to new adventures. Hee had in his Armie about eight thousand braue, expert, and well disciplined Souldiers, and with them aduanceth through Perigord, & Limousin into the bowome of France, vp to the verie gates of Burgess in Berie; the terror of his name flying before to his great aduantage. Thus satisfied for the present, hee wheeles about with purpose to returne by Remorantime in Blasius (which hee tooke) and so through the Country of Turain, Poitou, and Saintain to his chiefe City Burdeaux. But John King of France (hating to goe beyond his father in misfortune) hauing assembled a compleat host, followed, & about the City of Poitiers ouertooke the inuincible Prince.

(115) When the Armies (with the ods of six to one against the Englishs) were embattell'd, two Cardinals sent from Pope Clement, laboured (as they had done before) to take vp the quarrell without stroke, whereunto the Prince was with reason yeelding enough, but King John fatally presuming on his aduantage, propounded such conditions, as if in a manner the Prince of Wales had already beene at his commaund; which with iust indignation were reiect'd. It came hereupon to a most bloody triall, where (if euer) the Prince and Englishs gaue full experiment of their valour; for after long conflict and absolute discomfiture of all the 3. French battels, (the least of which exceeded all the Princes numbers) the King himselfe valiantly fighting, and Philip his *youngest sonne (who with such boldnes and zeale defended his distressed father, as it purchased vnto him the Honourable surname of Hardie) were taken prisoners.

(116) The Englishs whose valiancy was most conspicuous, were the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, Oxford, and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spenser, Audley, Berkley, Basset, &c. of Gascogne, subiects to the Crowne of England, the Capitall de Beuf, the Lord Punier, Chaumont, with others of lower title, but not of vnquall valour. * James Lord Audley wanne immortall renoune at this bloody battell, where hee receiued many wounds, and shared the Princes gift of 500. Markes land in Fee simple, to his foure Elquiers, who had continued with him in all the brunt and fury of danger. It is the misfortune or glory of the French Nobles, that in all great battels the losse falls heauily vpon them. In this most disastrous ouerthrow, there fell *fifty and two Lords, & about seauenteen hundred Knights, Elquiers, and Gentlemen bearing coates of Armes: The chiefe Lords were Peter of Bourbon Duke of Athens high Constable of France, John Clermont Marshall, George of Charney Lord great Chamberlaine, &c. and as many others as made vp the former account. * St. Regnold Camian, who that day bare the Oriflamb, was likewise slaine: of the common Souldiers there died about fixe thousand: Great God of victories, how abundantly diddest thou in these dayes bleesse thine Englishs? The list of Prisoners comprehended these great names, John King of France; Philip his sonne, afterward Duke of Burgoin; The Archbishop of Sens; James of Burbon Earle of Ponthieu; John of Artois Earle of Eus; Charles his brother Earle of Longueuille; Charles Earle of Vendome; The Earles of Tancarville, Salbrunck, Nassau, Dampmartine, La Roch, and many other great Lords, and about *two thousand Knights, Elquiers, and Gentlemen bearing Armories. The Englishs at this journey tooke an *hundredth Enligens.

(117) Now albeit nothing wanted to the title of a perfect victory, yet in two points the incomparable Prince out-went that fame and merite; for hauing vanquished the person of the French Monarch by force of battell, hee much more ouercame his heart with true and princely currellie, deliuering his mind in a stile and kind of eloquence so ponderous, proper, graue, and natural, and with that stately humililty, as onely the best soule with the best breeding could be capable of; and yet *hee spake not more officiously then he performed really. More then all this. The next day causing his Chapleins and the other Priests of the Armie, to celebrate diuine seruice, hee put off from himselfe the whole glory, and gaue it most deuoutly to *God; which being first done, he, in the sight and hearing of the Prisoners, highly commends, and most heartily thanks his Souldiers, with speeches full of sincerity and life, sealing his words to euerie one, as his present meanes would permit, with liberrall deeds & largesse.

(118) Then hauing fed all other things, hee marcheth with ioy and iust triumph to Burdeaux*, the Archiepiscopall See, and chiefe Citie of his dominions in France. How the newes were entertained in all places of the English Empire, is not hard to coniecture, but specially by King Edward, who tooke speedy order by Simon Archbishoppe of Canterburie, that eight dayes together should be *spent in giuing God the thanks and glory. But the Prince hauing sufficiently refreshed, and rested his people, set saile for England with his Prisoners, where hee happily arrived in Flimouth*, and was most ioufully welcome euery where. At his coming to London (where at that time a magnificent Citizen, Henry Picard, hee who afterward at one time so noblely feasted the 4. Kings of England, France, Scotland and Cyprus, was Lord Maior,) which receiued him with exquisite honour; the multitudes of people comming to see the victorious Prince, the French King, and his sonne the Lord Philip, and the rest, were such, that they could hardly get to Westminster, betwene three of the clock in the morning and noon: but who will thinke the humour of the gazing vulgar worth the noting?

(119) Great Edward, sauing that hee forgot not the Maiesty of a Conquerour, and of a King of England, omitted no kind of noble currellie towards the Prisoners: King John and his sonne were lodged vnder a sure guard at the Sauoy, being then a goodly Pallace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster; the rest in other places: David King of Scots was at this time straitly kept at the Castle of Odiham*, but not long after, when hee had endured about eleuen yeeres imprisonment, at the incessant suit of Queen Joan his wife (sister to King Edward), was deliuered: his *ransome was one hundred thousand Markes stricling, and a condition to raise certaine Castles.

(120) About this time Isabel Queene Dowager of England, and mother of King Edward, (hauing first scene her sonne the most respected King of all Christendome,) *deceased, and was interred at London, in the Church of the Friers Minors there. To her birth France was slenderly beholding, as being about this time in most wofull and broken state, through occasion of that title which the English challenged by her, it suffering more by farre vnder their puillance, then *euer it did since the times of the Romans. Charles* the Dolphin, Duke of Normandie, who had escaped from the battell of Poitiers, gouerned during his fathers imprisonment; but by the dangerous praictises of Charles King of Nauarre, and bad disposition of the Parisians, toward the deliuey of their Soueraigne, hee was lamentably encumbered, and beset with mischietes, not being able to worke as yet his fathers liberty. Moreover, the Englishs vnder Sir Robert Knollys, Sir James Pye, and Thomas Foulke, and others, did commit great wailes, and heaped huge wealth by incurrings, ransomes, and other warlike licence, in Britaine, and Norman- dy, vnder the title of seruing the Nauarrais. To bee briefe all France swarmed with dissolute souldiers of sundry Nations, which hauing no Generall, made hauckee at their pleasure. They were called people without an head, and by innumerable insolencies made the wretchednesse of Nauarre apparent. In England also swarmed another sort, no lesse burthenous to the common wealth and Church, which were the four orders of Franciscan Friers, whom the English Clergy* found to be so pernicious to the regiment of the Church, that they selected that renowned Clerk, Richard Fitz-Ralph (who was Chancelour of the Vniuersity of Oxford, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland) to appeare in person before the Pope, and there alleage the *intolerable harmes by them accrewing to the Laiety, the Clergy, and the Vniuersities, together with their disobedience to Gods word, their auarice, and pride. All which that noble Prelate learnedly performed, as appeareth by the handling of his 9. propositions against them, which are extant. In his second proposition, he sheweth, how ordinary a matter it was with them, to allure youth, without consent of their parents, to enter their Orders; which made men withdraw their sonnes from the Vniuersities, least the Fryars should so teale them away; whereby (saith he) it came to passe, that *whereas in his owne time there were thirty thousand Students in Oxford, some after there were left but fixe thousand. But how infinitely these Friarlike swarms encreased in all lands, may appeare by that *strange offer made by the Generall of this one Order, to Pope Pius, who promised to bring him (being then about a Turkish Expedition) thirty thousand cunning warriors, out of the number of Saint Francis Fryars, and yet enough should remaine at home to performe the deuotions. But the Pope had such vfe of those Fryars, that Armachani preuailed nor in the matter, *though hee promised the cause stoutly and manifestly against them, because (as for piety, saith our Authour,) the Clergy stucke not close as they promised, and the Fryars had great store of money to procure fauour in the Court of Rome. But here in the English Court, two Cardinals, (one of them, hee of Pierrefort, who had so diligently travelled for a conclusion at the battell of Poitiers) could not with two yeeres labour, draw any thing to such an head, as the French would, for their Kings deliuerance, performe; which put King Edward into a new resolution against France.

(121) King Edward (houlding himselfe deluded by the French) with a fleet of eleuen hundred Saile paffeth ouer from Sandwich to a new inuasion. Hee arrived at Calais, from whence hee set forward in three great battels, whereof the first, being least, was vnder Henry Duke of Lancaster, the second being greater, vnder the braue Prince of Wales, and the last which was greatest, was led by King Edward himselfe. They marched through Artois* to the Citie of Rheims in Champaign, where the Kings of France vfe to be crowned and anointed. The City of Sens* (an Archbishop See) and Nemens doe yeeld without resistance. The *Duke of Burgundy, for two *hundred thousand florens of gold, obtained that all Burgundy was spared from sackage or spoile. It was told the King, that the Normans had landed at Winchelsea in the time of diuine seruice, and among other their most impious outrages, a like execrable villanie, as that which Gibeonites, (sonnes of Belial) are recorded to haue committed vpon the Leuites* wife, was more wickedly perpetrated by them in the Church it selfe, where the woman, being of singular beautie, was by their insatiable violations murdered; and they got backe to their Ships before the Countrey could rise vpon them to take due vengeance. Hereupon *King Edward presently raised his Standard, and set forth out of Champaign, (where not farre from the City of Rheims hee had *kept his Christmas) toward Paris.

hundred Esquires and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dolphin, Regent of France, was within Paris with a great force, but could not by any meanes bee drawne to hazard battell. There were ample conditions in humble manner tendred to Edward, but he was yet inflexible and deaf against any other, then such as himselfe (like a Conquerour) propounded. Paris (vp to whose *very walls King Edward ranne) not being fessible, hee *retires into Britaine to refresh his Army, but vpon his returne finding it stronger then before, he turns his wrath into the very bowels of France, exercising hostile Actions vp as farre as Chartres*, and Orleans*, and as yet continued inexorable. God was displeased thereat, and to let Edward know so much, he caused the Minister of his wrath, a terrible tempest, to assaile his Host, and *to kill therein many both men and horses. King Edward's said, vpon this occasion, to be so wounded with remorie, that repairing to our Lady-Church of Chartres, hee prostrated himselfe to God, and forrowing for the bloodshed and wailefull burning which hee had made, vowed to giue quiet to the Christian world vpon equal conditions. This, and the Duke of Lancasters perswasions, softened him so, that finally (by mediation of the Popes Legat one Simon de Langres) a peace was concluded at Bretagne necre to Chartres vpon the *eight of May; and in November following King John himselfe was transported to Calets, and there by King Edward (according to the Capitulations of the Treatie) set at liberty, after hee had been a prisoner about foure yeeres.

(123) Articles of this accord, so necessary for the distressed Estate of France were these. 1. That (to the intent these conditions which the French condescended vnto, should be more forceable, and not seeme to be extorted by aduantage, oar, or iniquite of the times) the two Edwards, Eather and Sonne, should for euer release to King John and to his heires, all the right and claime which they had to the Crowne of France, to the Dutchy and Estates of Normandy, Anion, Turain, and Main, as also to the homages of Britain, Armorick, and the Earldome of Flanders. 2. That King John and his sonne, for them and their heires, should by a day certaine restore, and release to King Edward and his heires, &c. the whole Countrey of Aquitain, enlarged with the bordering and spacious Countreys of Saintain, Poitou, Pierrefort, Limousin, Quercie, Angoulesm, Rouergne, &c. with all the Cities, Castles, and appurtenances, to be holden free, without any dependencie but of God. 3. That the *County of Ponthieu (the proper inheritance of Isabel late Queene Dowager of England mother of King Edward) the Townes, Countreys, and Lordships of Calais, Guines, Mountvil, Haim, Wale, Oye, Mereck, S. Valary, &c. and all the Islands which either the English then held, or which lay before any of the Premises, with only certaine limitations concerning priuate mens interest, should remaine in like freedome as the rest of the premises to the Crowne of England. 4. That King John should pay for his ransome (part thereof to be in hand, and part vpon daies) the summe of *thirty hundredth thousand scutes of Gold, euerie two of which should be *fixe shillings and eight pence sterling. And that for assurance there should be assigned certaine number of Ho. stages (by King Edward named) to remaine in England. 5. That the French should not aid, nor assist the Scots against the Englishs, nor the Flemings against the French. 6. That it should be lawfull for either King notwithstanding to aid the Titlers for the Dutchie of Britaine at their pleasures. There were sundry other Articles, as in cases of so transcendent qualitie must needs happen, but, as these were principall, so the most of them might haue beene well left out here, vnlesse they had more exactly beene observed by the French. Yet were they ratified with hands, seales, and Oathes at Calais*, where the two Kings, in stead of kissing the Pax at masse (either hauing for honors sake refused to take it first) *saluted each the other with a most brotherlie embracement and louing kisse.

(124) The Hostages were absolutely of the greatest Princes, and Lords of France. * Lewis Duke of Anjou, and John Duke of Berry, sonnes to King John; Philip Duke of Orleans, the Kings brother, and Philip Duke of Burgoin: besides * nine principall Earles, twelve great Lords, and certaine * Burgesses out of euery good Towne; which were all to remaine in England, and accordingly did remaine; and Ambassadors were sent from both the Kings, to aduertise the * Pope of the whole happy conclusion.

(125) Not long after the Prince of Wales was created Duke of Aquitaine, and for the same did homage and fealty to his Father: so that hee was Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine, and Cornwall, and Earle of Chester and Kent; this last by Joane his wife, daughter and heire of Edmund Earle of Kent. Laden with this new honour, he together with his dearest wife and whole Court failed into Gascoigne, where at Bur-deaux he remained.

(126) Now was this renowned Monarch Edward the Great, King of England, vpon the day of Saint Brice, (the day * on which King Etheldreds commandement all the Danes in England were murdered,) aged fifty yeeres; at which time a Parliament (where * none were permitted to appeare by Proxie) was holden at Westminster vpon prorogation. Therefore to make the memory of his birth-day acceptable by acts of gracious government, as in a yeere of Tubile he granted his generall & speciall pardon to offenders without fine or Fee-paying for the Seale, set Prisoners at liberty, reuoked such as were in banishment. Moreover, vpon the grieuances of his people, petted with the doublings of Lawyers, he commanded, that * Pleas should from thenceforth bee made in English, not in French, a necessary Law, if it had beene as carefully obserued, especially, if withall hee had ordered the same should not be written also in French, that his people might know their owne duties. It is obserued that the Law of Magna Charta (confirmed also in this Parliament) was about a dozen seuerall times confirmed by this King during the yeeres of his reign. That which * another notes by occasion of this Tubile, wee would not omit for the famous custome of our Kings, who vpon Maundy Thursday in imitation of Christ, wash, feede and cloath as many poore, as themselves are yeeres old, is referred to this celebration which King Edward made of his fiftieth yeere, in regard of the number fed, which number hee calls the Tubile of their ages: but as hee imparted Grace to his people, so hee also tooke order to replenish his purse. That seldome or neuer the poore Commons haue any thing which they pay not for.

(127) The estate of our great Edward thus flourishing, hither (vpon sundry occasions) John King of France, Dauid King of Scots, who had lately both of them beene Prisoners in England, and Guy of Lusini-an, King of Cyprus came in person. The French kings affaire was, the more commodiously to transact for the remaine of his ransom, the discharge of his pledges, and other things. * Guy of Lusini-an King of Cyprus (by that right which as you haue heard before, his Ancestor had by donation and inuestiture from Richard the first, King of England) negotiated his own reliefe, vnder the iust Title of the common cause of Christianity, so fearfully by the preuailing Turkes empaired in the Easterne world, and not long after departed hence. John King of France * had promised to Pope Urban (at Aninion) his personall aide in the holy warre, but was preuented by death, which * scitied vpon him herein England at the Sauey. From whence by the pictie of Charles his sonne, then king of France, his body was in most royall manner conuained to Douer, at the King of Englands voluntarie charge, and entombd among his forefathers at S.
Dennis with all funeral maiefty, not farre off from the Soueraigne City Paris, feat of the French Monarches, as the other their place of Sepulture. Likewise Jane Queene of Scots comming into England (with her husband belike) * decaiced here.

(128) That King Edwards fortune was not onely auailable to himselfe, or to his Lieutenants, but also to his friends and fauourites, appeared in the great quarrell about the title of Britaine Arma-ricke, which about this time was determined by the death of the Lord Charles Earle of Bloys, head of the one faction, (but willing to haue ended it by word, not by the sword, if hee could haue preuailed with his wife) who was slaine in an encounter made against the Lord John de Montford, head of the other side, where the * Lord William Latimer, * Sir John Chandos, Sir Hugh Caluerley with other of the English which stucke to Montford, wanne much honor.
This field was fought at Surry not far from Yarm-es in low Britaine. After * which (hauing performed certaine estates to the widow of the L. Charles, a man of singular sanctimony and integrity of life) he did homage to Charles king of France, and was accepted Duke of Britaine, with consent of the King of England, his speciall raiser and protectour.
The * losse was great vpon the enemies side; for there were slaine besides the said Earle of Bloys, (Montfords competitor) the Lord John his brother, and sixe Lords with many other of speciall note, * Wallingham faith about a thousand men of Armes & Esquiers: and there were taken John and Guy the Earles sonnes, and nine other Lords, and of those whose fame for cheualricke counteruailed half the rest: Sir Bertram de Gleghin Marshall of France, vnder the banner of Sir John Chandoy.

(129) In the * mean space, from what part of the World did not the English bring testimonies of their valour: for such as had warred vnder the Cypriot King against the Turkes, and taken a part of Alexandria in Egypt, returned with much riches in cloths of gold, veluets, & precious stone. About these times and long after also, Sir John * Haucot (or Hareskrap) that valiant man of Armes, made his owne name, & his Countreimans the English very honourable by martiall vertue in sundry parts of Italie. And as their valour was one way scene beyond the Alpes, so there fell out occasions not long after, which made it knowne another way beyond the moun-taines Pyrennes.

(130) The family of the Lord Edward, Prince of Wales who liued in Burdeaux, was now with great honour encreased: for his dearely loued wife, who the last yeere bare vnto him Edward his first borne, (which liued but seven yeeres after) bare vnto him a second sonne, for whom Richard King of Navarre, and * James King of Maiorca vnderooke as Godfathers, giuing him to name Richard. The companies of Souldiers, most of whose Chiefes were English by birth or obedience, hauing now no employment, because the warres of Britaine were appealed for the present, ranged desperately ouer France; but it was not long before Sir Bertram de Gleghin (hauing paid his ransom) had meanes to draw the more part of that military Pestilence into another Coast: for, by the assistance of Peter King of Arragon, the banished Earles and the power of Gleguin, with the floting Bands, called the Companions or Adventurers, Peter King of Castile and Leon was driuen out of his kingdome, his bastard brother Henry chosen and crowned King of Spaine at Burgos.

(131) This Peter was * sonne to Alfonso the ele-uenth King of Castile, and had to wife a French Lady called Blanch, daughter to Peter Duke of Bourbon, who was father also of Joane the French Kings wife. His tyrannical cruelties by the Spanish Stories, are reported so foule, and so many, that they * scarce suffer Nero or Caligula to goe before him; though he were otherwise a Prince, who had such parts of mind (faith Rodericus) as doe set forth and adorne the Owner, but cannot make him happy. His naturall blood-thirstiness was encreased, and precipitated, some say, by the magicall practises of Maria de Padilla his concubine, who (calumniously * charging the Queene with that which her selfe acted,) by meanes of a few to enchanted a rich Girdle of King Peters; which Queene Blanch had giuen him, that the next time hee ware it, the flame * appeared to himselfe and the beholders like a snake. This cursed disciple of * Iannez and Iambrez hated the vertuous Queene, for that hee had so preuailed with Don Pedro her husband, that no few was suffered to beare office, or enioy any fauours in Court, neither wanted shee much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine.

But by this practise Maria de Padilla (who * some erroneously say was a Jew) got all the king to her self, and so persecuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before shee died, the Popes intercessi-ons failing to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine who laboured to haue brought her againe into deserued grace, are by him pursued as fautors of her supposed witchcrafts. Other things also whetted him to sauage, and Turkish Butcheries, as thirst of Gold, and somewhat which had by diuclish arts beene fore-told him concerning his end. His brothers, kinsfolke, Nobles, and others, hee causeliesly massacred or forced to secke their safeguard by flight, among which the Lord Henry, his forsaide bastard brother was one. Peter notwithstanding was in the truth and right of blood King of Spaine, but his faide brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to bee taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthy popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King and possession of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, so soon as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childlesse, * married his late Concubine Maria de padilla a woman of a noble house, though not so rarely honest, as to refuse the vnlawfull loue of a King: who hauing issue by her Alfonso a sonne (who dyed young) and three daughters * Constance, Beatrice, and Isabel, made to her and them the best amends he could for what was passed.
It is the fitter this truth should appeare, for that within a few yeeres after John Duke of Lancaster, one of the sonnes of England, married Constance the eldest sister, claiming the Crowne of Castilia in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * some (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through haist or misinformation) haue in many points foulliered, and in particular, vntulue leauing vpon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was honest by lawfull marriage. Diuers notwithstanding of * the Spanish Lords, like good subiects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a most violent Prince) nor could the vlturper Henrie, but by deeply impairing the reuenues of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne anie of them. Peter thus driuen from his kingdome, with his wife, children, and (if * some say true) but one seruant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (* at Bay-on) that is, to honour and humanity it selfe: who seeing a dangerous president against all lawfull Kings, that any one should be so dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; signified the same to his father: who enioines him to aid Don Peter, so that now the Prince, (burning with desire of renowne) (vpon trust of pay for his Armie and of other commodities by King Peter, when hee should be reestablished in his throne) is ready to passe into Spaine.

(133) Hee makes his way through the famous straits of Roncevaux in Navarre by permission of the King thereof, who * yet suffered himselfe (as most men write) to be taken prisoner by the French, and carried into Castile, that he might not in person seeme to crosse the French Kings designs on the behalf of the vlturper Henrie. The Prince of Wales had with him an armie of about thirtie thousand men, and in his company besides most of all the prime Captaines of the English, there were in person two Kings, Peter of Castile, whose the quarrell was, and the King of Maiorca and John Duke of Lancaster who some while after Don Pedro his death writ himselfe King of Castile and Leon. On the other side K.

Henry, for defence of his new Diadem, had assembled a very great number of French (vnder Gleguin their famous Capraine) as of Castilians and other both Christians and Saracens, not fewer then foure score, or an hundred thousand. Vpon the Borders of Castile it came to a battell: where the Prince of Wales obtained a verie great victorie, killing many thousands of his enemies. Henrie himselfe * was wounded in the groine but escaped. There were taken the Earle of Dene, * Bertram de Gleguin himselfe (who shortly after by paying a great ransome had liberty) the Marshall Dandreden and manie others. Neither was it lesse worth to King Peter then a kingdome; for the most noble Edward left him not, till he had set him in Burgu vpon his throne againe.

(134) But his falldown and ingratitude were monstrous: For the Prince notwithstanding his so great goodnes extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdeaux without mony wherewith to pay his armie, which was the cause of exceeding great mischief to himselfe, and to the English dominions beyond the Seas, as if God had bene displeased for succouring such a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his souldiers (who were not able to carry King Peters leasure) coined euery his plate, and when all would not serue, sought to lay vpon his Subiects in Gascoigne and thereabout, a new taxation, which bred a most dangerous reuolt. God notwithstanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his bastard brother Henry returned with new forces, and by the aid of Gleguin and the French, hee both thrust him againe from the Throne, and * murdered him also with his owne hand. The Prince of Wales himselfe was in this iourney so poisoned (as was thought) he neuer after had his health. Duke John his brother is not freed from the suspicion of hauing happened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of anie practise at this time or no, appeares not. Now notwithstanding he is safe as yet within Burdeaux.

(135) Now beganne the peace between England and France to vnsettle and vntwine. For while King Edward reioyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his sonnes and peoples Charles the fifth, king of France, warned by so manifold calamities, as his Dominions had sustained by the English in faire warre, & yet most earnestly coueting to recouer the honour of his Nation, betakes himselfe wholly to other arts and traines; neuer aduenturing his owne person, but executing all his designs by Deputie, wherein the seruice of Bertram de Gleguin Constable of France stood him most in steed: neither neglected he before hand to lay vp colours wherewith to ouer-paint his * collusions and deuises for sauing his honour; in so much that when it came to scanning, the losse was clearely vpon King Edwards side, and the cause of the breach made at leastwise doubtfull. His practises notwithstanding were palpable, and it must bee confessed that our truly noble King (without suspicion of craft) reposing himselfe vpon the rules of * magnanimitie, did not reape the stable effects of so great and important victories, nor of a peace so ceremoniously made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might neuer bee infringed without the manifest breach vpon one side of all bonds both diuine and humane. The Prince of Wales by letters aduised his father not to trust to any faire words, nor ouertures of farther amity made by the French, because he said they entertained practises vn-derhand, in euery place against him. But the Prince was * iudged to speake out of a restless humour de-lighting in warre, and therefore preuailed not. The effects disclosed that his words were true.

(136) For now king Charles surnamed the wise, hauing by quick payments and by one meanes or other gotte hom all the hostages which had bin em-pledged for performance of the Articles of peace before mentioned, sets all his wits on worke to abuse the King of Englands credulitie, till hee had gotten before hand as farre as diffimulation could advance: hee Courts the good old Prince with loving letters and presents, while in the mean time his plots ripen abroad, and the County of Pontieu (the king of Englands vendible inheritance) was first surprised before King Edward heard thereof. And whereas the Prince of Wales had at a Parliament in Gascogne propounded a demand for fowage, or of money to be leuied by the chimney, the Earles of Armignac and Cominges, and other Lords the Princes subiects, bearing no sound affections toward the English Empire (the lesse for that by the pollicy of Glequin, and the Chancellor of France * Dourmauns, all or most of the Countries and Townes (which by vertue of the peace made at Bretigny) were annexed thereunto, were cunningly wrought to return to their old Lords) repaire to the French Court at Paris, there to pursue an appeale for redresse of this oppression against the Prince (who was not so happy as to follow the counsell of Sir Robert Knols and other wisest Captaines who dissuaded this impolitic), pretending that hee was to answer before King Charles as before his superiour Lord, of whom (they said) he held by homage and fealtie. This practise of the disloyall Lords (for what could they bee else? seeing King Edward and his heires were absolutely freed (by vertue of the said Treatie) from all manner of seruice for any of their Dominions in France) King Charles did openly at last entertaine, and (vpon hope to recover by surpris, and plot, what the English had won by dint of sword and perfect manhood) proceeded to summon the Prince of Wales to Paris, there to answer such accusations as his subiects made against him.

"We had suffered the French hostages to visit their friends at home vpon the French Kings word, that they should come backe by a day, contrary to which word, they, nor any of them, either were or are returned. That not so much as the Law of Nations was kept with vs, which ties Princes to demand restitution by their Officers of Armes, or vpon denial to defie them, but where (say we) are the * Heralds which King Charles did send? We say, that without notice hee surpriseth by stealth the Earldome of Ponthieu, King Edward vnquestionable right, and hath disseised vs in Aquitaine, which doth no lesse belong vnto vs then Ponthieu. That * Margaret the Inheritrice of Flanders, which had bene promised to the Lord Edmund, one of our Kings sonnes, was by their iniurious practise wonne away, and bestowed in marriage vpon Philip Duke of Burgundie. Finally, we say, that Leu Duke of Antion, one of the pledges, making an escape by that, contrary to honour, and the league, was by them received, and not returned, which points being all of transcendent qualitie, are (say we) directly contrarie to the Treatie and iworne agreement at Bretigny.

The French hereunto answer, and charge vpon vs, to shew the fault of first breach, not theirs, but ours.

"That we by vertue of the said Treaty were bound immediately to withdraw our Armie out of France, which yet (they said) we did not during all the reign of John their King.

"That the peace was made thereby more noyons, and hurtfull then the warre, and that they were faine to purchase the departure of our Souldiers with a greater charge then would haue maintained a very gallant Armie: That this breach was ours,

"because the Souldiers were ours. That King Edward was bound in an open assembly of the States of both Realmes, to renounce his right in the Crowne of France: when (say they) was this done?

Thus they, and Serres ads that the Estates of those Countries which had bene assigned by the Treatie to the English assured, that it was against the fundamentall laws of France to alien anie part, & that they neither could, nor would cease to be members of that Crowne.

(138) So ye behold that the fortune of the great is neuer to want friends to speake for them, nor occasions to slip out or in, whensoever profit and advantage doe inuite. Memorable (if true) is that part of the Frenchmens defense, in that polite and learned Italian, P. Amylius, where it being objected with what honour and clemencie King John was vsed by vs, they breake out and affirme, that wee (being their Beneficiaries or Free-holders for such Countries as wee held in France) tooke more gold for the only ransom of King John, then they paid to redeeme S. Lewis their king, & his brother, the Peeres, and whole French Army captiuized in the Christi an warres by the barbarous Soldan. But (good Amylius) say that were so, yet cannot you say, that the summe wee tooke was worth the least Countie in France, and when all France was ours, was it not great bountie to take so small a pittance? If you relie that we had many Countries besides, wee reioice and trulie say, that wee quit more then we acquired. But let vs proceed: for now all claims & quarrels were as open, as if no obstacle had euer bene interposed: the ignominie of their late terrible foiles wounded all true French hearts, and they desire (King Edward growne aged) not to seeme by sitting still vpon so many thornes of disgrace, and losse, to haue bene outwarred, though ouer-warred, and though in two or three battels inferior, yet not to haue bene clearly debellated.

(139) What doth our King Edward now? Hee * calls a Parliament, declares the breach, praises aid, obtains it, and claims the crowne of France afresh. John Duke of Lancaster and Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford ascend ouer to Calais with a great force to inuade France. No great matter as then ensued.

* Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke comming ouer in hope to haue worke for his Curtelax, for the French affronted our armie vnder the conduct of Duke Philip le Hardy (though at this time scarce shewing himselfe worthy that surname) but rose vpon the Earles arriuall, and retired, accused the Lords for sloath, and sware he would abroad among them to find fighting, while English bread was yet vndigested in his souldiers stomacks. Somewhat he did, but death by a pestilentiall dart prevented the rest. This Earle had with him a learned man (as Scipio had Polybius) to register the acts which hee saw done: A worthy example ill followed by posterity. The Duke of Lancaster peirced vp with his armie so farre as Roan. The same Polydor wondering why they of Ponthieu hauing for an hundred and twelue yeeres (that is, euer since King Edward the first had it giuen to him with his wife) been ours, should reuolt, only daring the greatnesse of the English, can find no other reason for their doings but this pleasant one, that as dispersed cattell gather to their owne heard, so Frenchmen flocke to the French, and English follow English.

(140) Stirring Princes cannot containe themselves within their owne quietly possessed rights: Otherwise, who sees not how much better it is for the people, that their Princes should manage well that which they haue, rather then graipe at more? For King Edward (notwithstanding his continual manifold victories) comes back to the Subiect (who yet had gained hugely by the warres, and therefore might the better doe it) for supportation: and they yeeld it, but his age was abused, for the money was not expended as the pretences were made. turnes were serued with publicke loanes. Neuertheless, * after Midsummer day, that renowned Captain Sir Robert Knolls, whom martiall vertue had raised from the lowest rancke to the highest reputation (though some also affirme him * borne noble) was sent by King Edward into France with an Armie, where (while obedience lasted to his direction) all things prospered. But by the infatigation of one Sir John Menesterworth the young Lords Grandsonne, and Fitzwalter, and other vaineie scornful to be vnder Knolls, for that they held themselves his betters, and thereupon diuiding themselves after they had done sundry exploits, marching vpon cuen to Paris, were beaten and foild by the French vnder Glequins conduct, but Knolls wintred safe in Britaine. Menesterworth comes into England, and knowing accusers haue the vantage, complains to King Edward of Knolls: but not altogether beleued: he ads treason to vnt ruth, and turning French becomes a wicked enemy to his King and Countrey, * promising the French to procure the Castilian Nauie to inuade England, for which being in the last yeere of King Edward raigne taken, hee by due course was condemned and cut in pieces, dying the death he had deserued. He was laid hould vpon in the City of Pampelune in Nauarre, and from thence conueighed to London, vpon whose bridge his wicked head stood Sentinell.

(141) * Pope Vrbane the fifth, comming from Rome to Aninion with purpose to visite these two mighty Kings, their wills, and mights against the common enemy of Christendome, put off mortality at Marills, and so that holy intention ceased for the present: but the same being * continued by his next successor Gregory 11. yet tooke no effect, no more then that which the Emperour to like cause would haue vndergone: which the French impute to King Edward, who confident by reason of his former achievements, would trie it out by the sword. Wherein he seemed to forget the mutable condition of warre, the farnesse of his bodie, and the greenesse of his Grand-Child young Richard, who was to succeed, if the Prince of Wales died, as shortly after he did. Neither did God seeme to approue his opinion herein, for that crosses came fast vpon him, both at home and abroad. There is no greater wisdom nor happinesse then to know when we are well, and then to preferre without hazard or empairment, that honour wealth or quiet which we already haue.

(142) Among the States and Townes (assigned to the English by vertue of the treatie at Bretigny) which had reuolted to the French, was the Citie of Limoges in Limosin, whither the Prince marcheth, & sits down with his armie before it. Thither * came vnto him out of England his brethren the D. of Lancaster & the Earle of Cambridge, with a fresh supplie of valiant Chiefs and Souldiers. The City stood it out to the vttermost, and was forcibly entred, where mercy had nothing to saue nor spare, the sword and fire fortteror to other killing and defacing in a manner all. Hee * who writes that the Prince flew vp neere to Paris, and fearfully, by reason of Glequins valour, got backe to Burdeaux, seems to haue mistaken therein, as in many other things concerning vs of great importance. After this seruice, the Prince, (health failing him more & more) leaues his Brethren in Aquitaine, and sailes into England.

(143) The French in the meane time wonne towns and places in Aquitaine, gathering new hopes after so long and perpetual infelicities. The losse of that expert Captain Sir John Chandoy (vnfortunatly slaine) was a great aduantage to their desires, whose whole care for warre rested vpon Glequin (not long before aduanced for his military vertue from low estate to so great eminencie, as to bee Constable of France, the chiefe officer for warre which that Kingdome hath) and he a man of much proofe, in good and euill fortune, To tempered his courage with discretion, that he onely first bad his Country rise againe, and endeauro in despite of euill fortune to re flourish.

(144) The Prince of Wales (wanting health) vpon comming to his fathers light, rendered vp the Dutchie of Aquitaine, to bee disposed of as to his roial pleasure seemed good. While King Edward was at Clarendon, there repaired to him the factious king of Nauarre, whose errand was to make an ouerture of association against the French, but as his offers were acceptable, so his cautions not seeming sufficient, hee returned (after great entertainment) without concluding.

(145) John Duke of Lancaster, and his brother the Earle of Cambridge, doe now returne out of Aquitaine, with the Ladies Constance and Isabel daughters of Don Pedro late King of Spaine, whom they married: The Duke thereupon inflitting himselfe King, and his wife Queene of Castile and Leon. Nor was the English name once encreased in titularie honours: for about this time, the Flemings (who had prouoked vs) were vanquished by the * Earle of Hereford at sea in a sharpe fight, about twentie and five of their shippes being taken, and all the men slain. The sweete of this victory was lowred not long after with a grievous losse: for the French haue besieged the strong Citie of Rochel in Saintain, with the aide by sea of Henry King of Castile, to relieue the English, John Earle of Pembroke was sent with about forty shippes, men, victuals, munition, and money, to the value of twenty thousand marks, for the vses of the warre; but being suddenly assailed with the Spanish Armado, which consisted of many great shippes, vnder the command of Ambrose Buceaniga and others, the English after a long and cruell conflict were vtterly distressed, the Earle taken prisoner, and almost all the rest either taken, or put to the sword. * Rochel held out notwithstanding, to whose reliefe while King Edward himselfe in person, with an extraordinary force saille, the wind (always till that time fauourable to his voyages for France) came Easterly, and draue him backe into England with great griefe, and the waste (they write) of * nine hundred thousand pounds sterling. Neither did hee so giue ouer the care of that strong Pecee, which the English most manfully made good against the enemy.

(146) * Rochel thus persisting in loyall resolution, John Duke of Britaine (who had married the Lady Marie daughter of King Edward) a Gentleman of much gratitude toward the English, the authors of his fortunes, resolves to aduenture his state in their quarrell: ships away for England: hath aide ministred vnto him: hee returns, and warres with various euent. But John Duke of Lancaster with a very great Armie comes to Calais, and from thence marcheth ouer the whole face of France, and (though with losse of many thousand * horse in the desert countries of Auergne through famine) came safe, but with an almost-hunger-starued Army to Burdeaux. Not long after hee drew into the field, and a day was appointed betweene him and the Duke of Aniou the French Kings brother, to haue tried the quarrell of their Nations by set battell, before the City of Tholoz in Languedoc, but by an vntimely & pernicious short truce (to which K. Edward yeilded because his son the Prince lay dangerously sick) the hoped victory nor onlie slept out of the English mens hands, but almost all aduantage also of doing any thing else seasonably. The French boasted * themselves as of a Conquest, who notwithstanding did helpe out their valiancy with policie. Glequin makes his vie of all occasions, and workes much harme to the English party in Guien and Britaine. But in Britaine * Sir Robert Knolls doe so nobly acquit himselfe on the behalfe of his Soueraignes ionne in law the Duke, that he onely seemed a fit parallel to Glequin, like as hee stood the current of his fortune.

Neuertheleffe the doings of Glequin are so extolled by the French, that Tillius enters them into his Chronology with these words, Victoria, &c. the victories, fortunes and triumphes of Bertrand Glequin in Aquitaine and Britaine, though their owne selves make no mention of any defeat of the English, which afforded them matter for the shadow of such gloriations.

(148) Among the parties which were preiudiced by this hurtfull truce, the Duke of Britaine was chiefe. He had obtained great assistance from King Edward, and was now with the Earles of Cambridge, March, Warwicke, and Stafford, with many other noble gentlemen and souldiers returned into Britaine, making to themselves a faire way for their maine enterprise, which was to settle the Duke, and by the commodity of his Dutchie situation to annoy the common enemy, and the better to recouer the English dominions in Aquitaine: But this treatie did that which Glequin, their indeed braue General, had not as yet in any fort effected; for the Duke of Britaine had driuen the French Kings army out of his territories. But who wonders at this truce? The Prince of Wales was likely to die; plots one foot at home; the Duke of Lancaster had an eye to the Succession; things grew troubled: the Kings age was abused by dame Alice Peirs (a most busie Court-sle) who (after Queene Philips death) kept the old man warme, and the French law all these matters and slept not.

(149) King Edward calling a Parliament, vnfolding his estate, and wants, with demand of supplies, the bodie of the assembly in stead of contributions exhibits complaints, directly chargeth the Kings Officers with fraud, and humbly praiereth, that John Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Lattimer, then Lord Chamberlaine, Dame Alice Peirs (whose) behaviours they painted forth as most intolerable, for that shee, respectlesse of her Sexes frailty, would in person, said they, come into all Courts of Iustice, and sometime sitting by the Judges or Doctors, would also after a most insolent manner perliwade or dissuade for her most advantage) and with these one Sir Richard Sturmy might be removed from the person of the King. Neuertheleffe the Parliament made offer, that if the King were indeed out of money, they would liberally aduance toward his vses. The Prince of Wales fauoured their free dealing, and all the said persons were removed, others more acceptable (such as the Prince and Peeres thought fitter) being furrogated in their places.

(150) While this Parliament (called the Good) lasted at Westminster, the noble soule of Edward Prince of Wales vpon Trinity Sunday (which euery yeere he vsed to celebrate with the greatest honour that might be in due veneration of so diuine a mystery) was presented to the holy and blessed Trinity, after he had liued therein about 46. yeeres. In stead of Epitaph or mention of obsequies, the words of Walsingham shall serue vs for the present, of whose death he writes thus. *Quo obiente, &c. With whom dying, died all the hope of Englishmen; during whose life, the English feared no invasion of the enemy, nor any encounter in Battell: For he assailed no Nation which he overcame not, he besieged no City which he took not. liament was extinguished. His mortal parts were interred at Canterbury, where his monument standeth, but the renowne of his inimitable vertues haue as large an extent, and space to moue in, as the wide world. The King of France most recently celebrated his Exequies within the Chappell of his Palace at Paris. But in England there was a generall sorrow, as for one whose worth had begotten a iust hope that hee would out-goe* his Ancestors in glorie. Death preventing that experiment of him, he is notwithstanding in full possession of loue and praise among all men for that which was passed. The cause of this domestick mourning encreased with the effects of his losse, which forthwith disclosed themselves. The King recalls such persons as at the petition of the Lords and Commons had bene removed, and Peter de la Mare speaker of the last Parliament, who had eloquently exprest the minde of the house in the foresaid reformation, was, at the suite of the said bolde Dame Alice Peirs, condemned by the King to perpetuall imprisonment at Nottingham, though within two yeeres after by the importune suite of friends hee regained libertie. Meane while *John Duke of Lancaster gets the gouernance of the kingdom to be intrusted to him by his father.

(151) Richard the eldest sonne of the late most noble Prince of Wales, for prevention of all debates about the right of succession to the Crowne of England, was by his Grand-father first made Earle of Chester, and not long after Prince of Wales: but for more assurance (least the sonnes deceale before the fathers should preiudice the Grand-Child) King *Edward caused all the nobles of the Realme to take an Oath to accept and defend Prince Richard, as lawfull heire and King of England, after himselfe was dead: Neither did his vncles though famous Captaines, repugne. Finally, the good old King, to comfort himselfe in honouring the liuing image of his noblest Child, the late Prince Edward, and to giue the minde of his Grand-Child a feeling of future maiestic, that by the fodeine insolvency of the splendor, it might not afterward too much abuse his tender iudgement, and to make his vncles acquainted with respect of his person, he caused him to sit openly at his Table about all his owne Children in Christmas.

(152) About this time the famous Doctor Iohn Wilef a man of sharpe wit, profound learning, and great iudgement, did in the Vniuersitie of Oxford publicly maintaine sundry propositions and dogmatical points against the Church of Rome, of which the Pope (foreseeing the hazard hanging ouer his triple Crowne) condemned * three and twenty as hereticall; whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London hauing attached the body of the said Wilef, did in the presence of the Duke of Lancaster and the Lord Henry Peirce (*his great fauourers,) declare the iudgement of the Pope concerning Wilefs doctrine, which had then taken deepe roote both in the vniuersity, Court, and Countrey. So for a while all was quiet. But (vpon some feerer encouragements) he held no peace long. His followers were, in the phrase of those darke daies, called * Lollards, whereas, in truth, they endeauoured to extirpate all pernicious weeds, which through time, sloth, and fraude, had crept into the field of Gods Church. The Duke of Lancaster (the rather, some thinke, vpon priuate emulations against Courteney Bishop of London) was engaged so farre in his protection, that he and the Lord Percy hardly escaped the fury of the Londoners, who would without question haue hewed them in pieces in reuenge of some disgracefull speech vttered by him against their Bishop. He notwithstanding dissuaded all violence, and kept them from firing his palace of the Sauoy, but they neuertheleffe did in most despitfull manner reuerse his Armories in the open Market: A dishonour not to be borne, as that in which the digni-nity of his royall blood was empaired. By this outrage the people (a most dangerous and heady water when once it is out) made known, what he, and the Lord Percy were to haue hoped, if they could haue fingered them; before they had gotten to Kingston to Prince Richard, who there remained with his mother. The Duke for this bare the Londoners much euill will; neither rested till for a commencement of reuenge hee had procured the Maior and Aldermen to be thrust from their places, and substituted others in their stead.

(153) France in the meane time erected with new hopes, breathes nothing but warre. Prouisions in that respect were not neglected here. One of the last publike acts of the old kings life, was the triumphall celebration of Saint Georges feast at Wind-sor, where himselfe had founded the order of the Garter; and who had solemnly bestowed vpon his dearest Grandchild Prince Richard the dignity of Knighthood, which only thing in all the patrimony of honour could not descend vnto him.

(154) Not long after ensued the sentence of diuorce which God pronounced betwixt the soule and body of this mighty and martial king, who left the world in the month of Iune at his Manour of Shene in Surrey: his Acts may giue you a perfect Character of his mind: few Princes that had so great and heroicke vertues, had fewer vices: therefore it was a fault of those times, which abounding in learned men, (and amongst them Geffrey Chaucer Prince of Poets) afforded no better an Epitaph then that which we are faine with pity to read vpon his Monument at Westminster: the stiffe neuertheleffe is worthy, though the forme bee rude.

No man of his time could by better experience teach, what a vaine thing worldly glory (to the height whereof hee had aspired) ought to seeme. His mind (by sundry great checkes of Gods prouidence) recalled to consider of the foure last things, Death, Iudgement, Heauen and Hell, made him betake himselfe to Acts of benignity and deuotion. The Chappell at the end of the Abbey Church at Westminster (since most magnificently enlarged by King Henry the seuenth) was of his building. The holy quiet of studies, and aduancement of good Arts, hee so prosperously fauoured, that besides other great priuileges granted to the Vniuersity of Oxford, (*where himselfe had in his youth bene trained vpon the learned *Walter Burley) he conferred the chiefe rule of that whole City vpon the Chancellor of the Vniuersity, subordinating the Maior and Citizens to his gouernment, in regard of their iniuries offered to the Students. This most mighty Monarch that euer ware the Crowne of England, in many other felicities excelled his Ancestors, as in the victorious valour of his Children, their obedience to him, and loue among themselves. A Lady to his wife (their mother) of such excellent vertue and gouernment, as that the K. Edwards fortunes seemed to fall into Eclipse when hee was hidden in her Sepulchre. Such and greater was this Edward, whose name among the suruiuing spendors of his actions, is iustly transmitted with honour to all posterity. Hee reigned almost one and fifty yeeres, and* liued about threescore and five.

His Wife.

(155) Philip, wife of King Edward, was daughter of William Earle of Hennault and Holland, sister of Earle William the last of that house, and of Margaret the Emperesse that succeeded him; her mother was * Isabel, sister of Philip of Flanders king of France, daughter of Charles Earle of Flanders, who was sonne to King Philip the Hardy. Shee was married vnto him at Turke, January 24. crowned at Westminster the first Sunday of Lent following, 1327. Shee was a Lady of great vertue, and a constant true hearted louer of our Nation, was his wife two and forty yeeres, died August 15. Anno 1369 of her husbands raigne, 43. and was buried at Westminster, where shee hath a faire Tombe, at the foote of her husband, of blacke Touchstone with the garnishing about it, and the portraiture ouer top of Alabaster: but hee built to her selfe a Monument of more glory and durability, by founding, and richly endowing the Colledge, called of her the Queenes in Oxford, which, if it had bene finished according to the proiect, had been a foundation of mutuallous state and magnificence.

His Issue.

(156) Edward, their eldest sonne and first child, borne at Woodstocke, July 15. in the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, Anno 1329, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, and Earle of Chester; hee was also Earle of Kent in right of his wife Isabel (the most admired Ladie of that age) daughter of Edmond Earle of Kent, brother, by the fathers side, to King Edward the second. Shee had bene twice married, before, first to the valiant Earle of Salisbury, from whom shee was diuorced, next to the Lord Thomas Holland, after whose deceale, this Prince passionately louing her, did marrie her: by her hee had Issue two sonnes, Edward the eldest, borne at Anglewme, who died at seven yeeres of age, and Richard borne at Burdeaux, who, after his fathers was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather King of England. This Prince had also naturall Issue, Sir John Soudrey, and Sir Roger Clarendon Knights; the latter being attainted in the raigne of Henry 4. is thought to haue been ancestor to the house of Smythes in Essex. Hee died at Canterbury on Trinity Sunday, Iune 8. 1376. of his fathers raigne 49. and was buried at Christ-church there, 1376.

(158) Lionel, their third sonne and fifth child, was borne at the City of Antwerp, 29. Nouemb. 12. of his fathers raigne, Anno 1338. hee married first Elizabeth, the daughter & heire of William Burgh Earle of Ulster in Ireland, in whose right hee was first created Earle of Ulster, and because hee had with her the honour of Clare in the Counties of Townsend, as parcell of the inheritance of her Grand-mother Elizabeth, (the sister and coheire of the last Earle Gilbert Clare, hee was in a Parliament, Anno 1362. created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Countrey about the Towne Castle and honour of Clare: from which Dutchie the name of Clarentines (being the Title of the King of Armes for the South parts of England) is deriued. This Duke had Issue by her one onely daughter named Philip, afterward wife of Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, mother of Earle Roger, Father of Anne Countesse of Cambridge, and shee was the mother of Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the 4. the second marriage of this Duke was in Lumbardie at Millayne, with the Lady * Yolanta daughter of Galeacio the second Duke thereof, but through intemperance, he liued not long after.

Lords.(159) Iohn, their fourth sonne and sixth Child was borne at Gains the chiefe Towne of Flaunders, Anno 1340. and 14. of his fathers raigne. In his Childhood he was created Earle of Richmond, which title was afterward recalled in, and bestowed upon John Duke of Britanny, who married his sister, to whose Dutchy it had formerly belonged. Hee had three wiues; the first, Blanch, daughter and Coheire, and in the end the sole heire, of Henry Duke of Lancaster (sonne of Edmund surnamed Crouch-back) in whose right he was at the first Earle, and after Duke of the same, and with that Dutchy also Earle of Leicester, Derby, and Lincolne, and high Steward of England. He had issue by her, Henry of Bullingbrooke Earle of Derby, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crowne in the house of Lancaster; Philip, wife of John the first, King of Portugall; and Elizabeth, married first to John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, (brother of Thomas Duke of Surrey) and after him, to Sir John Cornwall Baron of Fanhope. His second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time he entituled himself King of both these realmes; by her he had issue one onely daughter, named Katherine, married to Henry the third, sonne of King John, in possession before, and in her right, after, King of both the said realmes. His third wife was Katherine the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolne, eldest daughter and Coheire of Payn Roet a Gascogne called Guien King of Armes, for that Countrey, * his younger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her hee had issue (borne before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament holden in the twentieth yeere of King Richard the second), John Earle of Somerset, Thomas Duke of Excester, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinals and Isane, who was first married to Robert Ferrers (Baron of Wemme and Ouseley, in the Counties of Salop and VVarrwicke) and secondly to Raph Neuil the first, Earle of Westmerland. Shee and all her brethren were surnamed Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France * where they were all borne, in regard thereof bearing the Portcullis of a Castle for the cognizance of their family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeere of his Nephew King Richard, at a parliament holden at London, was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the sixt yeere after, hee was called home, and this Title recalled in, and in the third yeere after, the sixtieth of his age, Anno 1399. he dyed at Ely house in Holborne, and lyeth honourably entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul.

Edmond, their sonne, surnamed Langley, was created Earle of Cambridge Anno 1362. in the same Parliament, wherein Lionel was created Duke of Clarence. Hee was afterward made Duke of York, Anno 1386. and married Isabel daughter and Coheire to Peter, King of Castile and Leon. His sonne Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, took to wife Anne Mortimer heire of the foresaid Lionel elder brother to Edmond Langley.

William another of their sonnes, surnamed Wyndesore, where he was borne dyed young, and is buried at Westminster.

Thomas the youngest sonne of King Edward and Queene Philip surnamed of Woodstocke (where hee was borne) was first Earle of Buckingham, created by his Nephew King Richard the second on his Coronation day, Anno 1377. by whom, after also he was made Duke of Glocester, 1385. The Earledomes also of Essex and Norhampton and the Constablie of England, fell to him by right of his wife Eleanor, the only daughter and heire of Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex. Hee was a man of valour, wildome, and vigilancy for the behoofe of the King his Nephew and the State, but those noble vertues (dis tempered with too much wilfulness & stroward obstinacy) bred him, first Enuy, and after ruine. For the King furnishing him to bee a too seuerer observer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke how to make him away; whom Mowbray vnawares surprizing, conuained secretly to Calis where he was strangled 1397. 20. of his Nephewes raigne. Himselfe in his life had prouided a goodlie tombe at Playste in Essex (his owne Towne, and * the vsuall seat of the great Constables of England) * where hee founded a Colledge; whither his body was brought, and laid with all funerall pompe, but afterward it was translated to Westminster, where also lyeth Eleanor his wife, who dyed 1399. Their issue was Humphrey Earle of Buckingham, * who dyed at Chester of the pestilence Anno 1400. Anne (married first to Edmund Earle of Stafford, by whom shee had Humphrey Duke of Buckingham, secondly to William Bourchier Earle of Eure, by whom shee had Henry Earle of Essex) Philippa, Isane, Isabel, who died all issuelesse.

Isabel, the eldest daughter and second child of K. Edward and Queene Philip was married at Windsore with great pompe to Ingelram of Guines, Lord of Coucy, Earle of Soysons and after Arch-Duke of Austria, whom K. Edward (his father in law) created also Earle of Bedford 1365. by whom shee was mother of * two daughters, Mary, (married to Henry of Barre, to whom shee bare Robert de Barre, and Isane, the wife of Lewis of Luxemburg, Earle of S. Paul) and Philip, the wife of Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford, Duke of Ireland and Marquess of Dublyn; this Robert in the height of his fortunes forsooke his noble Ladie, and married one * Lanceron a loyners daughter (by report) which came with King Richard the seconds wife out of Beleme; and being, for his pride and abusing the Kings ear to the hurt of the State, driven out of the land by the nobles, hee dyed at Louain, in great vexation of mind, and extreme penury, Anno 1392. Isabel his wiues mother was buried in the Church of Fryars Minorites neer Algate in London.

Isane their second daughter and third child was borne 9. of her fathers raigne Anno 1335. RICHARD

RICHARD THE SECOND. KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND. THE FIFTIETH MONARCH, OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND TROVBLES.

CHAPTER XIII.

Richard of Burdeaux, sonne to that Great Star of Engliss Cheualric, Edward, by-named the Blacke Prince, and grand-child to the most renowned Edward the third (both of them lately deceased) was crowned in the eleventh yeere of his age, and vpon the sixteenth day of Iuly. Seldome hath been seen so magnificent a Coronation, as that of this young King, but the thing which gaue a better lustre of hope at his beginning; then the shine and maiesty of that publike Act, was the wise course which in this his childhood was taken; to wit, the reconciliation of the Lord John Duke of Lancaster, and the Citizens of London, with the restitution of Sir Peter de la Mare Knight, Speaker in the late Parliament, (whom King Edward had committed to prison, at the instigation of Dame Alice Peeres now banisht, and confiscated) not onely to former liberty, but likewise to fauour and honor extraordinary.

(2) At this Coronation, (which, as matters not vnworthie to bee kept alieue, wee following the immethodical order of the Record, haue here for perpetuall memory thought good to abridge out of authentike Monuments) John the Kings eldest vn-cle, vnder the stile of John King of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, by humble petition to the King, claimed to bee now Steward of England, in right of his Earledome of Leicester; and as he was Duke of Lancaster, to beare the Kings chiefe sword called Curtana; and as Earle of Lincolne, to cutte and carue at the royall Table before the King. His petitions being found iust, were confirmed to him, and to his Assignes, the two Earles of Derby and Stafford, the first to beare the Sword, while the Duke should be busied about other offices as Steward, and the other to cut and carue. The Duke then in great estate, held this the Kings high Court of Stewardship in the White-hall of the Kings Pallace at Westminster, XXXX 2 neere to the Chappell of the said Palace, vpon the Thursday, before the Coronation, which was also vpon a Thursday. There Thomas of Woodstocke the Kings vnclie, was admitted to exercise the office of Constable of England, in right of his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Humphrey de Bohun, late Earle of Hereford, and Constable of England. Henrie de Perce (Lord Perce) was by the Kings consent and writ authorised to exercise the place of Marshall of England for that time, fauing to curie one their right, for that by reason of the times shortness, the claime, which Margaret daughter & heire to Thomas of Brotherton, late Earle of Norfolk, and Marshall of England, laid thereunto, could not bee discussed. Robert de Perce Earle of Oxford, though then in minority, being notwithstanding found to haue right in Fee, was by the Kings speciall consent allowed to haue, and vnto the office of Chamberlaine. Hee was also admitted to his right of pouring out water for the King to wash with, when hee went to meate, at the Coronation. Iohn Wiltshire Citizen of London, by reason of certain reuerences (heretofore the possession of Iohn Picot) being a Moitie of the Mannour of Heydon, and holden in Sericantie, had his right, to hold a Towell for the King to wipe with, when hee went to meate, found and allowed, and Edmund Earle of Kent appointed to serue as his Deputie. Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke was found to haue right, and admitted thereupon to beare the third sword of estate before the King at the Coronation, as also to exercise the office of Panler, and to enioy all such fees as to the same appertained. Sir Iohn de Argenhem knight, by reason of the tenure of his Mannour of Wimondley in the County of Hertford, was admitted to serue the King at his Cuppe, vpon the day of the Coronation, and for his Fee to haue that * Cuppe of silver wherewith hee then serued the King in his royaltie. William Lord Furniall for his Mannour of Farnham and Hamlet of Cere, was proued to haue right to support the Kings right arme, when it held the Scepter royall therein at the day of Coronation; which seruice beeing first * honourably knighted by the King at Kenington, hee was admitted accordingly to performe. Annelate wife of Iohn de Hastings Earle of Pembroke for her Mannour of Aspleie in Norfolk, was admitted by her Deputie Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, to vnto the office of Naperer, and to enioy the fees thereof. Edmund, Earle of March, was assigned to carry the Kings great gilt Spurs, fauing to curie one their right; for Iohn, the sonne of Iohn de Hastings late Earle of Pembroke, claimed that office to bee his, as William le Marshall his Ancestor held the same at the Coronation of King Edward the second; but by reason hee was vnder age, and in Wardshippe, the King for that time disposed it to the Earle of March. Who also, with the said Spurres was assigned to beare the second sword before the King; for which, the said young Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Arundel (in the right of his Ancestor the Earle of Surrey) contending, it was adiudged to Pembroke, for his Castles and Townes of Pembroke and Tenby, &c. but the execution of that honourable place was assigned by the King as before. Richard Earle of Arundel, for the Mannour of B. in Kent, was admitted to bee chief Butler at the Coronation, for that (after the sale thereof) the Earles Ancestors had exercised that office at Coronations, and the claime of Edmund Staplegate, who then had that manour as sonne and heire of Edmund Staplegate (ward to Jeffrey Chaucer, who had freed him for one hundredth and foure pounds) for that time put off his right to him in the meane time faued notwithstanding. The Lord Maior and Citizens of London (such as were chosen for that high dayes seruice among themselves) were found by good Record to haue their feuerall rights. The Maior to attend in his owne person as chief Cuppe-waiter, (charged with the Cupbord-royally aswell in the hall at dinner, to serue the king in a cuppe of gold with spices, and for his Fees to haue the said Cuppe, and a Water-spout-potte of gold thereunto belonging, when he tooke his leaue at night. The Citizens, to helpe their Lord Maior in his office of chief Pincern or Cup-waiter, and to minister or serue the Lords aswell at Dinner in the Hall, as in the Chamber after dinner. Whereupon the King (faith the Record) perpendens gratitudinem magnam & subsidium que Progenitores sui, &c. weighing with himselfe the great gratitude and aide, which his Progenitors had heretofore abundantly found in the Citizens aforesaid, and hoping himselfe to finde in them the like gratitude and aide hereafter, and to the intent that they might with the more ioyfull hearts performe loyall obedience to the King, and more earnestly helpe him in his occasions, he being heartily desirous to content them, did will and ordaine that the selected Citizens should exercise their said attendance. Sir John Dymmocke Knight, in the right of Margaret his wife, for the Mannour of Seruelly, and Sir Baldwyne de Erville Knight, as cofen and next heire to Philip Marmion, by Lionnesse daughter of the said Philip, for the Castle of Tamworth in the Countie of Warwicke, contended each of them to haue the office, & fees belonging to the Kings Champion vpon that roiall day; but because the said Iohn shewed better Records then Baldwin, and for that King Edward and the late Prince of Wales, were often heard to say that Iohn ought to doe that seruice for the said manour of Seruelly, hee was admitted for that time, and day was giuen to Baldwyne to shew farther cause of his claime within three weekes after the feast of S. Hilarie next, or else for euer to bee vnterlie excluded.

This Champion is to haue for accomplishment of that seruice (and the same also for his fees) one of the best hories of warre and caparions, which the king hath, one saddle plated with Iron, and one complete armour with the whole furniture, in such sort as the King himselfe vltim, when hee is to goe into a mortall battell (saith the Record, en une bataille mortelle) in which fort being mounted, he is to ride before the King in procession to his Coronation, and to crie thrice to the people before all the world. That there is no man of high or low estate, who will say, that our liege Lord Richard, Cousen and heire of Edward, late King of England, ought not to bee crowned King of England, against whome hee the Champion is not ready with his body to maintaine, and will maintaine that hee doth fully lie as a Traitor. William de Latimer, and Iohn the sonne and heire of Iohn Mowbray of Axholm, the Kings Ward, iointlie petitioned at the same Court, to bee admitted in the right of William Beauchampe of Bedford (whose lands the king held in right of the said Wardshippe, and William de Latimer in his owne right,) to haue the office of Almoner at the Coronation, and to enioy the Fees thereof. And because in the redde Booke of the Exchequer it appeared, that the said William Beauchampe (late deceased) vied the said office, William de Latimer was there admitted, aswell for himselfe, as for the said heire to exercise the same, and for his Fee to haue the silver platter of Almes which stood before the King as hee sat at the Table vpon that day and if afterward it should reasonably appeare, that they likewise ought to haue an * Hoghead of wine, they should haue it.

William Bardolf shewed by petition (as all the rest did) to the right noble, and right redoubted Lord, the King of Castile and Leon, Duke of Lancaster, and Steward of England, that certaine of the said William his Fee-simple lands in his towne of A. were holden of the King in chief by Sericantie. The words of the petition, shewing the seruice, which we (feare to erre) leaue for other to interpret, are these. De trouver le iour due Coronement nostre tresredoubte Seigneur le Roy, vng homme de faire une mesme que appelle Diligrunt, & si apponatur sanguineum adomques il est appelle appelle Maalhygerynen la Cuisin de Roy. And accordingly the said William was admitted to that seruice by his Deputie. Richard Lyons, as Tenant of the Mannour of L. which Iohn de Lyffon and his ancestors held by the seruice of making wafers for the King at the day of Coronation, was accordingly thereunto admitted. The Barons of the Cinque Ports, vpon their petition and claime, the matter being euident, were admitted to beare (and to haue for their Fees) the Kings Canapie of cloth of Gold (or of what other stuffe else it pleased the King) vpon foure staves of silver over the kings head vpon the day of Coronation, and also to sit at meat in the hall at the highest Table on the kings right hand. Iohn Fitz-Iohn, in right of his wife, shewed, that the Mannour of S. in Norfolk was holden of the King by the seruice of Chief Larderer at his Coronation, and that Gregory Burdeles did exercise the same at the Coronation of King Edward the third; whereupon Iohn Fitz-Iohn was admitted to exercise that office by himselfe and his Deputies. Richard Hering for the Mannour of C. in the County of Surrey, in the right of Ayres his wife, claimed to be vther of the Kings Chamber; but because that claime did no way concerne the Coronation of the King, hee was left otherwise to pursue his interest if he so thought good. These are the seruices which were then claimed before the D. of Lancaster, Steward of England, which he with his * owne hands deliuered into the Kings Chancery there to bee enrolled. At the same Coronation also Thomas of Woodstocke youngest sonne of the late king was created Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, Guy-chard d'Angoulem Earle of Huntington, and Henry Perce Earle of Northumberland. Thus the bounty of the young Monarch imparted large rayes of his imperiall Splendor to these eminent persons of his Kingdome. Howseuer, these and the like honours haue not in our Common-wealth either alwayes bene fortunate to the Recievers, or without repentance to the Donors.

(3) But the general State of the kingdome being implicated, before the late king Edwards decease, by reason of that opportunity and aduantage to their designs, which the neighbour enemies of the Crowne of England found in the old age of that victorious Monarch, was now no lesse entangled through the contempt of King Richards youth. For before his Coronation, the French with fifty ships (as Walsingham calls them) thrust into the Haven of Rie, the towne whereof they rifled, and consumed with fire. The Crowne of England was scarce fetled on his head, when the Scots at the other end of England fire vpon the Town of Rockesburgh; but the French (encouraged by their late exploit at Rie) arriued in their Gallies, and rooke the whole Ile of Wight, the Castle (which Sir Hugh Tyrell manfully defended,) only excepted, leuying vpon the inhabitants one thousand Marks in lieu of sparing their houses from the rage of warre, and flame. Neither was it long before they landed at Wincheley, though being from thence repulled, they burnt the Town of Hastings at that present.

(4) These petty braues thus giuen to the king, were farther fortunated with a little victory. For they, emboldened with such successes (dishonourable and dangerous to King Richard, who seemed to haue lost the souerainity of the English Ocean, where Pirates durst so recull, and also to haue had as little counfell, courage or forces left about him vpon the land) come on Shore at Rottingdene in Suffex. The Prior of Lewis with some slight tumultuarie Forces, rashly adventures himselfe against them, where he with two knights, & some few others were taken prisoners, and about 100. English slaine, but of the French many more, who returned with their Pri-foners to their Nauie.

(5) The chief charge of affaires lay vpon the Duke of Lancaster, the Kings vnclie, or vpon some such as he did put about him, through whose want of care, things declining to a shameful change, and the glorious achievements of the two late Edwards falling vnder Eclipse, there was onlie found one private Citizen of London, that (without regard to the enuie of the slothfull Lords, or his owne hazards, or of any thing else, so much as the good of his neglected Country) put his whole strengths to support the same. This was the worthy Iohn Philpot, who at his owne charges mans out a Fleet to the Sea, raigues by them therein, and guardes both water and land from their intollerable violences. Nor did his so great pietie faile of happy euent, for God (who fauours all vertuous actions) had put into his hands within a short space 15. Spanish Ships fraught with rich merchandize, which the right of warre made his, whereby his great charges were abundantly repayed. Let vs see his Statue erected now at last, with the Statues of Walworth, and other honourable Citizens in London.

(6) What therefore the loue of their Prince and Country could not stirre vp in the Lords, that very shame and indignation doe. There is consultation had, and the King of Nauarre (an vnquiet subiect of the Crowne of France) morgageth the Haven Towne of Cheirbourg in Normandy to King Richard. The occasion was the rather not omitted, for that, by thrusting into it a good Garrison (which was forthwith done, and first Sir Robert Ross, then Sir Iohn de Harleston, both worthy Knights, made Captaines there) the same would at all times serue to giue quiet entrance to an inuasion of France which now was meditated.

(7) How loosely, the meane while, the affaires of the State and Iustice were managed, by reason of the vnripe yeeres of the King, may appeare by a bloody outrage then perpetrated and vnreueged. The occasion this. In the warres of spaine, (which Edward the late Prince of Wales made for restoring Peter to the Crowne,) the Earle of Dean was taken and adiudged Prisoner (from all others clayming that honour) to two valiant Equires Robert Haule and Iohn Shakell, who both of them belonged to that martiall Knight Sir Iohn Chandos. They free the Earle, taking his sonne and heire for assurance of performances. This young Gentleman (vnterly neglected hitherto by his dishonourable Father,) was now demanded of them in the Kings name, by the Duke of Lancaster, with a purpose (as was thought) the rather either to aduance thereby his (the said Dukes) title to the Crowne of spaine, or to make a peace there, with the better conditions. The Equires refuse, and thift their Hostage out of the way; are thrust therefore into the Tower of London; but escaping from thence, take Sanctuary in Westminster. Thither with fifty armed men doth Sir Alan de Bruchull secretlie repaire, drawes Shakell by a wile out of the priuiledge of the Church, and expostulates the matter with Haule in the Kings name, vpon whom (protesting against the abuse offered to that Maiestie in his tender yeeres, and freely taxing his Counsellours with iniustice, auarice, and euill aduice,) while they fought to lay hands, he with his short sword valiantly made them all flie off, but in the end they most wickedly murdered him in the Chancell, commending himselfe, in his last words, to God revengeur of such iniuries, and to the liberty of our holy mother the Church. With him was murdered a seruant of his thrust in with a Iauelin at the backe. This is that Haule whose body lies buried vnder a brasie-plated stone in the Abbey Church at Westminster, whose blood (by the violence of the said Duke) found not that fulnesse of legall vengeance, which so hainous an homicide required.

(8) The North parts of England were about this time greuously visited with the stroke of pestilence, and their lamentable affliction encreased by the inroads and outrages of the Scots; who had now surprized Berwicke killing Sir Robert Boynton Knight

Knight the Constable thereof, which yet the Earle of Northumberland vpon the ninth day after recovered by force, putting those, who had surprised it, to the sword.

(9) Neither was the spirit of the English (after it began to requicken) idle elsewhere; for as Sir Robert Ross had diuers wayes vexed the French, and taken Oliver (the brother of that renowned Bertrand de Glequin) prisoner, so Sir John de Harleston, Capitaine of Cherbrough after him, flew and took diuers French in a skirmish. These few foregoing drops of greater approaching showers. For Sir Hugh Calverlee and Sir Thomas Percy, made admirals of the narrow Seas, tooke many rich prizes, and exploited sundry other things very praiseworthy, bringing home the acceptable newes of the dislike which the Britons had conceived against the French Kings Government; for he commanded them to render vp to him all their strengths, Castles, and walled Townes, and many of them, who refused to obey, hee put to death.

(10) These employments, and fresh designs for other like, found need of pecuniary supplies; whereupon, in a Parliament holden at London, it was agreed, that for supply of the Kings wants, the Commons should be spared, and the burthen be wholely vndergone by the able. The rates then of that tax were these, Dukes, Archbishops, Earles and Bishops at ten marks each, mitred Abbots as much, besides forty pence for every Monke vnder their subjection. Briefly (saith Thomas Walsingham) there was no religious person, man or woman, Iusticiar, Sheriffe, Knight, Esquire, Parson, Vicar, or Chauntry Priest free from this tax rated according to the value of their yearly receipts.

(11) We formerlie mentioned, how John Shakell (the other companion of Robert Hauleto) executed murdered in Gods-house) was taken. He now vpon condition that the King (besides 500. marks in money) should giue him lands to the yearly value of one hundredth markes, and should also found and sufficiently endow, at the Kings costs, a Chantrie with five Priests for their souls, whom the kings Officers had wickedly murdered, he rendered vp his Hostage, the eldest (but naturall) sonne of the said Earle of Deuon. At the discovery and bringing forth of whom, all men were stricken with wonderfull loue and admiration: for the young Gentleman (having giuen his faith not to disclose himselfe, appeared in the shape of a baselgroom, in which (vnnowne to all the world but his Master) hee had of his owne accord lurked. An example of such a point of perfect honesty as cannot be forgotten without iniurie.

(12) The same yeere, the Lord John Mountford, whom the French had driuen out, being invited home by his Barons, returned into his Duchy of Britaine, accompanied with the valiant Knights Calverlee and Percy aforesaid, where he, his friends, and followers were received with singular honor. Soone after Sir John of Arundell, brother to the Earle of Arundell, being sent into Britaine to aid the Duke, was with many other valiant Knights and Esquires drowned. It is imputed by our Author to a iust effect of Gods anger against the said Sir John, and his household, for their manifold vices and outrages, practised by him and them, before they set out from England, for which they had the bitter curses of the people; and the Angell of destruction to execute those imprecations vpon the delinquents.

(13) But the action of aiding did more deeply import, then that it should be abandoned for the losse of that vnfortunate fellowship, and the exceeding riches which were with them: therefore the Lord Thomas of Woodstock Earle of Buckingham, with Calverlee, Percy, Knols, Winderlores (or Windsor) verie valiant knights, & other competent forces, was sent to assist the Duke of Britaine. But because the French Gallies howered vpon the narrow Seas, they landed at Calles, and from thence march through France, spoiling Countries, burning townes, the French not daring to empeach them, and killing people, till they and their whole equipage came safe into Britaine.

(14) There were about these times ciuill diuisions in France, for the Duke of Burgundie, younger brother of King Charles (lately dead) being made Guardian of the person and dominions of his Nephew Charles then in minority, had the Duke of Aniou (being an elder brother to the Duke of Burgundie) a mortal enemy. Their bloody quarrels fell out luckily for the English aides in the Duchie of Britaine, out of which as Duke John had beene driuen for adhering to his father in law the late king Edward, so the English did their best to uphold him in it, as there was cause.

(15) The French in these extremes are releued by their ancient diuision: for the Scots entering about that time with fire and sword into Cumberland and Westmerland, and the forest of Inglenow, draue away much Cattle, slew the Inhabitants, rifled the booths and houses of Perith in the Faire time, killing and taking many, and driving away the rest. The Earle of Northumberland preparing a bloody reuenge, was (not without wonder) prohibited so to doe by letters from the King, that is, from such as were about the King.

(16) But how coldly fouer the publike affaires were followed, the want of money for supplies was still pretended. And therefore in a Parliament holden at Northampton, was granted to the King a general supply of money; the pretended occasion of monstrous mischief which followed, by reason of a clause in that grant of Subsidie, that every one of each sexe, being about a certain age, should pay by the head, or per Pollas they call it, twelue pence.

(17) The English Cheualry began now againe to display it selfe farre off, to gratifie the private ends of John Duke of Lancaster, who claimed the Crown of Castile and Leon, in right of Constance his wife: For John King of Portugal had a defendiue warre against John then King of Castile, who challenged the Crowne of Portugal in right of Beatrix his wife, (by whom hee had no issue) the onely daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugal, which this other John (a bastard sonne of Ferdinands) had by faction vrpured. There were sent to his aide the Lord Edmund de Langley Earle of Cambridge the Kings vnkle, and sundry Knights and others of good experience with an Armie. These arriving in Portugal valiantly defended the same for about two yeeres, and were the chiefe cause of giuing the Spaniards an ouerthrow in battell, where they lost 10. thousand men. At last the two Kings agreeing together bare the charges of conueighing home the English in common, that their Countries might be freed from them, being both alike ialous of their puissance. In this time Edward sonne to the Earle of Cambridge vnkle to Richard King of England, married the daughter of the king of Portugal, but afterward neither would the Earle leave his sonne behind, as suspecting the Portugals faith, nor the other entrust his daughter to the Earle, so as they remained disioined in body, howsoever visited by Ceremonie.

ged multitudes vpon slight and small beginnings to runne together in so fearefull a Torrent, that it seemed the King and kingdom were suddenly false vnder their most wicked fury. There were in this most rebellious insurrection, the Commons and Bondmen (who aspiring by force to a free manumission) principally those of Kent and Essex, whose example was followed in the Neighbour Shires of Surrey, Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge, and other places by incredible heards and droues of like qualified people: who (specially in Norfolke) forced sundry principall Gentlemen to attend them in their madding.

(19) They of Kent embattelled themselves vnder two Banners of Saint George, and about threescore and tenne Penons vpon Blacke-heath by Greenwich, and from thence came to London, where, the generality of people inclining to them, they are masters. The Priory of S. Johns without Smithfield they kept burning for about seven dayes, and the goodlie Palace of the Sauey, belonging to the Duke, with all the riches therein, they consumed by fire, in a kind of holy outrage, for they threw one of their fellows into the flame, who had thrust a peece of stolne plate into his bosome. The Rebels of Essex came to Lambeth, burnt all the Archbishops goods, and defaced all the Writings, Records, and Monuments of the Chancery, as hauing a speciall hatred to the Lawyers, little to their disgrace, for that they shared herein with good men also, whom they hated. But their desperate wickednesse extended it selfe beyond the spoile of houses and substance, laying bloody hands vpon the most eminent and worthy men in the kingdom, for that they had disuaded the King to put himselfe into their hands at Greenwich, where hee talked with them out of his Barge, and thereby had their maine designe disappointed. Simon Tibald Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and Chancellour of England, a right worthy Prelate, and Sir Robert Hales a Knight of high courage, Lord Prior of Saint Johns, and Treasurer of England, with others, they without respect to the Maiestie of the King, or priuiledge of their most honourable dignities, most barbarously murdered by beheading them vpon Tower-Hill, among infernall howtes & diuelish yeis. For the Tower it selfe (from whence they had haled them, the young King being there in person) was open to their execrable infolencies. Neither doth the authority of * Polyd. Vergil, affirming that they were not haled forth, but onely stayed by the Rebels, to whom (hee saith) they were lent, induce vs rather to credit him, then Authors liuing about those very times. There was no little store of other innocent blood shed by them in these tumules. Nor was the Kings own person without manifest perill, against whose life they had damnablely conspired. It were long to reckon vpon the kinds of such villanies as they wrought, but endlesse to recount the particulars. The common * Annals set forth this whole Tragical businesse very diligently.

(20) They had many Captaines of mischief, but two principall, Wat Tyler of Maidstone in Kent, (whom Walsingham pretily calls the Idoll of Clownes) and Jacke Straw, who together had followers to the number (as they were estimated) of about one hundred thousand, and at one Sermon made to them by John Ball, Walsingham saith, there were about twice as many. Their Petitions were full of pride and malice, but easily granted by the King, the necessity of the times extorting them. They had a Chaplain as gracelesse as themselves, one John Ball an excommunicated Priest, who with his wicked doctrine nourished in them their seditious furies to his own iust destruction in the end: but when a great multitude accepting the Kings mercy were gone, Wat Tyler and his Campe departed not, but vpon pretence of disliking the Articles of peace, fought to winne time till he might put into full execution his incredible Treasons, which (as Jacke Straw at the time of his execution confessed) were vpon that very night of the day, wherein Wat Tyler was slain, to murder the King, and chiefe men, and to erect petty Tyrannies to themselves in euery shire: and already one John Littlestar a Dyer in Norwich, had taken vpon him at Northwalsingham in Norfolke, the name of the King of the Commons, and Robert Westbroke in Suffolke, to whom John Wraw another lewd Priest had assigned it.

(21) Neuer was the kingly race and commonweale so neere to an vtter extirpation, as at this present, which was (wee may truly say) miraculously prevented. The young king in these feares and dangers repairing to Westminster, most devoutly commended his Crowne, Life, and whole estate to God, nor that in vaine. For Wat Tyler with his Campe of Rascals seemed to bee ten or twenty thousand (according to the Kings Proclamation, attending in Smithfield, but cauiling of purpose vpon the conditions of peace, as hee that meant a farther mischief, though they of Essex were returned) was entreated to ride to the king, who also fate on horsebacke before Saint Bartholomews, in whose company was that renowned Lord Maior of London, William Walworth, with many other men of birth and place.

(22) Wat Tyler scarce at the last coming behaued himselfe so insolentlie, offering to murder one of the Kings knights, Sir John Newton, for omission of some punts of respect, which he arrogated to himselfe in more then a kingly manner, was (vpon leaue giuen him by the king) boldly arrested with a drawn weapon by the Lord Maior, a man (say Writers) of incomparable courage, which blow was seconded by the said Lord, and others so speedily, that there this prodigie of a Traitor was felde and slaine. A death too worthy, for that he died by the swords of honourable persons, for whom the axe of an Hangman had beene far too good.

(23) The Commons perceiving the fall of their Capitaine, prepared to vse extreme reuenge, when the most hopefull young king with a present witte and courage (it being for his life and kingdom) spurred forth his horse, and bad them follow him, without being grieved for the losse of a ribauld and traitour, for now hee himselfe would be their Capitaine. Hereupon they thronged after him into the field, there to haue whatsoever they desired. But the most worthy of all Londoners, Walworth, speeds with one man onely into the City, raiseth a thousand Citizens in armour, brings them (being led in good array by Sir Robert Knolles and others) with Wat Tylers head (which the Lord Maior had commanded to bee chopt off from his dead carcase) borne before him vpon a Spere to the king. That verie head, the cursed tongue whereof had dared to say, That all the Lawes of England should come out of his mouth.

(24) This act restored the Crown (as it were) and Realme to King Richard, for the Rebels seeing themselves gitt-in with armed men, partly fed, partly fel vpon their knees, and (throwing away all hope in weapon) they answerably to their basenesse, begged their liues, who but euen now reputed themselves masters of the field, and of the king. And albeir there was a general desire in the hearts of loyall men to expiate so many villanies with the blood of the Actors, yet things abroad in the Realme being as yet vnscited, they had a general Charter of pardon sealed, and were so sent home into their Countries.

(25) Certainly although the Citie of London (the most noble and able part of the English Empire) hath otherwise deferred of the Kings of this land very well, yet the honour of this seruice worthily stands highest in the many great praises thereof. Which the King did thankfully and publicly reitifie by knighting Walworth, and by bestowing vpon him (when hee modestly excused his vnworthines and inability) one hundred pounds land by the yeere in fee simple. Hee also at the same time bestowed the same honour vpon that right worthy Citizen and Patriot, Sir John Philpot, and two other Aldermen, Sir Nicholas Brember, & Sir Robert Laund, to each of which hee gaue a like estate of 40. pounds. There be who write that hee then also knighted Nicholas Twisford, and Robert Gayton Citizens. The memories of these and other such, deserve and ought to be honoured with statues, advanced in the most conspicuous place of that great City, least otherwise these be holden ingratefull to them, from whom shee derives so honourable splendor. That the beauteous Armories of London were at this time augmented with that weapon which wee see in the dexter Canton thereof, in remembrance of this service done by Walworth is affirmed by some, but with what warrant let themselves see.

* Holingshead in Richard 1.

* Survey of London.

(26) The young King, after this fortunate conclusion given to so hellish uproars about his principall City, repaired in good array to Tower Roiall or the Queens ward-robe, a palace then in the bosome of London. There the Queene mother had remained in very great feare and griefe for the space of three daies, and two nights; but the sight of her sonne, and relation of his good speed, blotted out of her memory the sorrows formerly sustained.

(27) It was not long, but that the King (surprised before with that popular inundation) had sure notice that the diuident rebels were in all other places dispersed, but neither till themselves had done much mischief, and suffered iust punishment. Memorable was the service of Henry le Spencer the stout Bishop of Norwich against the Bondmen and Peasants of Norfolk, whom hee draue out of their Trenches, slew diuers, and caused their mustrom King John Littlestar to be hanged, drawne and headed. But that which vniuersally most of all preuailed by the reduction of these audacious wretches to due obedience, was the death of Wat Tyler, and the certaine newes of their dispersion, who were assembled about London, where for a few daies they had most barbarously tyrannized. In Hertfordshire at Saint Albans, Barnet, &c. in Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Ile of Elye the popular outrages were now in a manner appeased. Yet wonderfull is it, that all these execrable furies, being in so many several places, with so great forces in each, (for at Bury, where John Westbroome kinged it, they are reported to haue bene about fifty thousand, making it their favage sport, to cause the heads of great persons, which they had cut off and fixed on Poles to kisse and whisper as it were one in the others eare) lasted not in the high speed and full rage thereof the space of eight daies, (being not long before Midsummer, as if it had been a fyderall infection or generall Lunacy) and the whole time thereof from the beginning to the end, is accounted, by Act of Parliament, but from the first of May till Midsummer the Feast of Saint John Baptiste.

Statut. An. 6. Ric. 1. c. 13. The royall power like the Sunne after a long darkness pur forth it selfe againe.

Forty thousand English horsemen in field together.

(28) The royall power which had thus bene foilde, and trodden vnderfoote, could nor longer brooke so intollerable debasement, but to repaire and establish it selfe, there was proclamation made, that all men who had horse and armour, and loued the King, should forthwith come to London in their best manner. There were neuer seene together so great a multitude of horsemen in England. The musters were taken vpon Black-heath, where the king himselfe, being mounted on a goodly courser among the armed men, and hauing his Standard royall aduanced before him, daily rode forth to view his people, reioicing to see seene among them, and acknowledged their Lord. It is said, that within three daies space there appeared vpon that heath for the Kings service, not fewer then forty thousand horsemen most brauely appointed.

the guilty, who againe beganne to stirre, but that the King was periwaded by the Nobility and Gentlemen of that Countie, to proceed by ordinarie iustice; which was done. The Kings peace was also proclaimed in euerie place according to his letters dated at London 17. Iune, in the fourth yeere of his reigne, to the great encouragement of good subjects, and confusion of the wicked. There were executed about one thousand and five hundred in all places, besides five of a new forlorne Companie, which hauing desperatly dared to gather head againe in Essex about Billerica, had tendered to the King certaine insolent demands, which were iustly reiected, and they slaine. The Lord Thomas of Woodstock Earle of Buckingham the Kings vnkle, with Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Count Northumberland, were sent with force against them. The Rebels being manie in number, were notwithstanding broken at the verie first with a Charge made vpon them by a rank in front of ten men of Armes or Lances. There were taken eight hundred horses belonging to the Rebels. Sir Robert Tresilian was principall Actor in the matters of iustice, which hee rightly and seuerely administered. The King himselfe had so great a force of horsemen with him, that (as Sir Walter at Lee knight said in his speech to Saint Albans-men) there was neither grasse nor blade of Corne old or new left within five miles compasse of the kings person.

All gntes donatid vnto the king.

(30) And least the mischieuous multitude should to the kings dishonour and common hurt of the Church and kingdome, enioy any the least benefit by their late vspeakable villanies; the king, by aduise of his Councill, sent letters reuocatorie into the Shires about, by which he commands, that no man shall enioy anie freedome or profit by vertue of anie extorted grates, during the time of the Insurrections: but yet that his maiesties purpose was by the aduise of his Councill to grant to his subjects (notwithstanding their so heinous treasons) such mercie, as should be pleasing to God, and profitable to him, and to the kingdome. After which sundrie executions were done at Saint Albans, and elsewhere. And this end for the present had these infernall attempts of the baser people, in which we may cleerly behold the hideous face of Anarchie and Plebeian furie.

(31) Which fearefull convulsion in this State, some imputed to Gods wrath on this land for the generall coldnes and neglect of their duties in the chiefe Prelates of the kingdome; others to the great vices, and irreligious tyrannies of the great ones; other to the abounding sinnes of the common people. But our Author iudgeth, that the full heape of those causes of Gods vengeance, was made up by the begging Fryars, who (saith he) to purchase wealth contrary to their owne Oathes, did sooth the great men in their vices, and nursed the vulgar in their errors, feeding on the sinnes of both: calling good euill, and euill good, seducing Princes by flatteries, and the common sort with lies, carrying both headlong with themselves astray. For their outward profession of truth they haue so defiled with their wicked life, as that it is now in euery mans mouth a good Argument, holding in matter and formes: This is a Fryar, Ergo a liar; seen as true as to say: This is white, Ergo it is colourde.

(32) The Duke of Lancaster, at the first breaking forth of these Rebellions, was vpon the borders, about feeling of a truce with the Scots, who therefore did shut vp the matter speedilie before the Scots had anie intelligence, feeling a two yeeres abstinence from Hostilitie. The Scots (though they were forie that by the peace so concluded, they had lost an opportunity of making a dangerous impression vpon the English), vnderstanding the Dukes perill, offered him twentie thousand men to defend his honor, but he loyally refusing that, they gaue him leaue to come and goe at his pleasure with all other rites of sacred Hospitallity.

(33) After Christmas King Richard tooke to wife the Lady Anne, daughter to the Emperor Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus king of Bohemia, and called Emperour, which Lady by the Duke of Tasill, was in the name of her said Father, formerlie promised and assured vnto him, as one whom the King did specially affect, though the daughter of Barnabas Duke of Millaine was also offered with a farre greater summe of gold. Shee was with great pompe and glory at the same time crowned Queene, by the hand of William Courtney (a younger sonne of the Earle of Deuonshire) Bishoppe of London, lately promoted from London to the See of Canterbury. The Nuptials and Coronation of the beauteous Queene being, the Parliament (which by this great Ladies arriual was interrupted & prorogued) began againe. Where many things concerning the excess of apparrell, transportation of Coine, &c. were wholly enacted. Sed quid iuuant Statuta Paris. amentoria, &c. but to what purpose (saith Waltingham) "are Acts of Parliament, when after they are once past, they take no manner of effect? For the king with his priuate Councell, was wont (saith hee) to change, or abolish all things, which by the whole Commons and Nobility of the Kingdome had in former Parliaments bene agreed vpon.

(34) Neuertheless, it was then provided, that such as had done any thing in their owne defence against the Rebels, or to their suppression, without the ordinarie formes of process in law, should sustaine no damage thereby, but for euer bee as cleare as if they therefore had enioyed their particular pardons; and that all releases, forfeitures, and other acts done in the late rebellions, (during the hurting times, for so they were called) by way of constraint of duress, should be vtterly void.

(35) With the good liking of this Parliament, Sir Richard Scrop knight, was made Chancellor of the Realme, and Sir Hugh Segraue Treasurer; but it was not long before the Chancelour denying to passe such large gifts vnder the Great Seale, as the king in his youthful humor had imprudently granted, therewith to gratifie his still craving Courtiers, fell into the kings vnderfered displeasure. For albeit he alledged important causes of such his deniall, (as, that the King was greatly in debt) and therefore such largesses were fitter to bee employed in discharging some of his Creditors, that knowing how the King was intangled with Creditors, such crauers were not truly well affected to him, as regarding their own priuate auarice more then the kings profite, or the publike wants; that those selfe same crauers, had formerly receiued such gifts of his Maiesty, as were (at least) answerable to their desertings; and that himselfe, if he should seale those grants (made in the Kings childhood) was like to haue small thanks of him, when he should come to riper iudgement; yet thereupon he was twice or thrice willed to send the Seale to the King, who comming in person "surrendered the same, with such like words, That "hee would alwayes be loyall and true to his Maiestie, "but neuer beare any office vnder him againe. Not long after which surrender, Robert Braybrooke Bishoppe of London was made Chancellor in his place. This act of the Kings was displeasing to the whole Realme, and one of the first things by which hee fell into dislike, it being among the infelicities of King Richard, that those times were too full of fower and impatient censurs, for a Prince of so calme a temper, and as yet vnseasoned yeeres.

(36) Henric le Spencer the warlike Bishop of Norwich, being drawne on by Pope Vrbane to preach the Crusade, and to be Generall against Clement (whom sundry Cardinals and great Prelates had also elected Pope) hauing a Fifteenth granted to him for that purpose by Parliament, (after strong opposition of almost all the Nobles who resisted this business of the Crosse) went with Forces into Flanders to support the cause of Vrbane against the Antipope, from whence after hee had performed sundry things very happily, taken Craneling, Burrough, Dunkirk by assault, and bene victor in a set battell against thirty thousand abettors of Clements claime, hee was enforced to returne, as destitute of those farther succours which were expected out of England. But the king vpon pretence that hee had not obeyed his royall mandate, by which hee required him, (before hee transported) to returne, for a while seised vpon all his temporalities.

(37) But K. Richard having before giuen the realm discontentment, by removing Scrop from the Chancellorship, encreased the same by some manifest signes of leuitie and prodigality toward Strangers, then which nothing makes a Prince lesse pleasing to the English: for, in the progresse which with his beloued Queene hee made to Bury, Thersford, Norwich, and other places, gifts were taken on all hands by the King, and they againe through the Queene were powred forth to enrich her Bohemians.

(38) John Duke of Lancaster embarkt himselfe for France, where hee concluded a truce to endure betweene the two Nations English and French, from the present Christmas till Midsummer. At his returne, he and his brother Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, went with an Armie into Scotland, to reuenge the breach of truce: but as it seems by some, the Duke had rather an host of men, then an hostile mind; for hee so ordered the matter (as not forgetfull perhaps of curtelies shewed to him in his late dangers, when the Commons were out in Armes,) that the Scots hauing had time enough to withdraw both their goods and persons, and his army suffering farre more losse by penurie and cold, then it could inflict vpon the enemy, returned "fruitlesse and inglorious.

(39) Not long after his returne, hee was encountered with a more capital and dangerous enemy, then those in Armes: for a certaine Carmelite Fryer, by birth an Irishman, deliuered to the King (in the time of Parliament at Salisbury) a writing which contained therein a heinous accusation of the Duke of Lancaster, that he had conspired to murder the King, and to crowne himselfe. The accuser discouered, the day, place, and other circumstances, to induce a beliefe of the pretended intention, and tooke his oath vpon the Sacrament, which that day hee had receiued, that no one word in that scroll was vntrue. The Dukes Apologie and fauour with the King, preuailed about the accusers confidence; whereupon the Fryer is committed, at the Dukes request, to the L. John Holland (the Kings halfe brother by his mother) and a day appointed, wherein the accuser was to shew a cause of his crimination.

(40) But in the night which next forewent the designed day, the said Lord John Holland (if a man may beleuee, that a thing so villanous could be done by men of honour) and one Sir Henry Green knight, are reported to haue trussed vp the Fryer in a cord by the necke, and parts of generation, laying vpon his breast a stone of great weight to breake the chine of his backe; and that they also forche the soles of his feet. By which miserable and quadruple manner of death, without trial or conuiction, (as also without "recantation of any thing which hee had vttered against the Duke) he is said to haue breathed his last. Neither was his death smothered, for the next day they caused his strangled carcase to bee dragged through the City; that it might not bee thought hee had perished vniuilly. But the Lord Thomas of Woodstocke (the same who was afterward Duke of Glocester) went farther, for hee rusteth into the Chamber where the King was, and bound his "words with a terrible oath, That hee would kill a "ny one liuing who durst lay treason to his brothers charge: neither did hee except the king himselfe. In which speeches, as piety and zeale for his brothers honor and safetie were not wanting, so certainly duty to his Prince was exceedingly forgotten.

* Job. 1. 10.

The Duke of Lancaster accused of highest Treason.

* Job. 1. 10.

(41) That which followed, may giue vs iust cause to suspect the truth of that Fryers accusation: for the Lord William la Zouch was also by the Fryer accused, of hauing been the Inuenter, broacher, and prouoker of him, to set downe all that which was comprehended in the accusation; who thereupon sent for to Salisbury (though then very sicke of the gowte) repaired thither in an horse-litter, where hee was compelled to answer to all such points as were objected, like a felon, or a traytour standing bare-headed: but the priuie, or least thought of any such matter as the Fryer affirmed against the Duke, hee confidently forswore, and was thereupon acquitted and dismissed. Howbeit (saith Walsingham) La Zouch was from that time forward a professed enemy, not only of Carmelites, but of all other orders of Fryers whatsoever. But these disgraces came vnfeinably vpon the Duke, whose head was vn-doubtedly full of designs, and of cares, how to achieve to himselfe the crowne of Spain.

(42) There were then sundry incursions made by the English and Scots, each into the others country, the Earle of Northumberland being leader to the English, with little aduantage to either. But to take away the very cause of this continuall bad neighbourhood, or to lessen it by an established peace with France, the Duke of Lancaster layed to Callis, about the beginning of August, there to treat with the Duke of Berrie, on behalfe of the young French King Charles 6. but after he had in that voyage expended (as was said) fifty thousand Marks, he brought into England nothing backe, except one a truce, to continue till the first day of May next. His desire to haue procured a surer peace both with the French and Scots, seemes to haue beene great, that so hee might the more freely pursue the conquest of Spain which he intended.

(43) Whiles hee was absent in this Ambassage, there ensued the arraignment of a great favourite of the Dukes, John Northampton, alias Comberton, whom his aduersaries by-named Cumber-towne. This man is by them reported to haue exceedingly troubled the City of London, during his late Maioraty there, nor lesse afterward; for that being followed with many abettors, hee publickly disturbed Sir Nicholas Bramble his successor, (but a* bloudy minded man by report,) and wrought other miseries, till Sir Robert Knowles caused one of the busiest companions to be drawne out of his house, and (as some say) thortned by the head. This Comberton was by his household Clerke accused, as priuie to some practices, in prejudice as well of the King, as the City, and when sentence was to be pronounced in the Kings presence (being then with great store of his Nobles at Reading,) hee durst (as is said) affirme, That such iudgement ought not to proceede against him in the absence of his Lord the Duke. This againe vnraked the burning coales of enuie, and suspicion against the said Lord Duke, and perhaps malice to the Duke procured this hatred against his fauourite. Whereupon hee was confined to the Castle of Tyntagel in Cornwall, and all his goods seized vpon by the Kings Seruants, whom Walsingham expresth, by calling them after the name of those Poeticall rauens Birds, Harpyes.

(44) That herewith Polydor Vergil (assigning causes to actions, not alwayes such as are, but such as seemed to him most probable, nor seldome confounding and changing persons, times, names, and things) telles vs concerning a combat within lists, betwene Sir John Aunsley Knight, and one Carton hath little ground, (so farre as wee can find) in historie. He saith they were teterima capita, both very wicked men, & that there was a real plot to murder the king. We can neither find the crime nor the me: there had beene a solemne combat long before betwene such a knight and one * Katlington an Esquire, in which the knight was Challenged an victor, but the crime was not treason against the kings person, nor for any thing done in his time, but in his noble Grandfathers. Neither was Anley, teterima capita, but a valiant and loyall man of Armes. The crime which he objected to that Elquire (his kinsman) was, that for money he had traiterously giuen ouer the Castle of Saint Sauoir in the Land of Constanstine in Normandie, when he had store of victuall and munition. The Elquire was vanquished in faire fight and died franck the next day. Polydors error therefore is ioynd with manifest wrong to the knights name, wherein wee ought to bee very circumspect, for that, honour is incalculable and defendeth to posterity. There was indeed, at the time he speaks of, another combat, fought also within lists before the king, (for Duels then were performed, not on priuate choice or quarrell, but on publicke appointment) betwene one John Welsh an Elquire of England, and one * Martileta Gentleman Nauarrois, who in reuenge against Welsh, for hauing at Cheribrough (where the said Elquire was vnder-captain) committed (as Martileta said) adultery with his wife, accused him of high treason against the King and Realme. But Welsh prevailed; and the Nauarrois, at his execution (for hee was drawne and hanged after he had beene foiled in battle,) confessed the cause of his euill will, and the innocence of Welsh in the matter of treason.

(45) The Scots had this while by practice and money gotten the Castle of Berwick, whereof the Custody belonged to the Lord Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland. The Duke of Lancaster was not sad at this, but so pursued the matter, that the Earle (as if by his negligence and priuie the same royall Castle had beene lost) was condemned in Parliament. But the king relieved him with extension of fauour. This was a great cause of confirming the rancour already kindled in the hearts of these two principall Peeres. But the Earle to wipe away all blemishes of disgrace, enclosed the Castle with a siege both of forces and large proffers, so that after some time spent therein, he had it redeliuered vpon payment of two thousand marks.

(46) The Flemings had heretofore in the fifth yeere of this King, sent Ambassadors at the time of Parliament, to submit themselves and their Country to his dominion, renouncing allegiance to their natural Lord the Earle, whom they had by force of Armes expelled, vpon pretence of oppression vsed by him, and for other causes; but because they feared not either persons sufficient, or sufficiently instructed with authority, to transact with the King in a matter of so high nature, they were commanded to returne, and fetch more ample power, and to bring certain men of euery good Towne in Flanders. Now againe, the Citizens of Gant, though they had in battell against the French King, (who was there in person on behalfe of the Earle,) * lost twenty thousand men not long before, desired of K. Richard, that they might haue an English General to command in their warres; to whom was sent a wife and valiant Gentleman, the Lord Edward le Boussier, who demeaned himselfe in that charge with much commendation. And when afterwards he went more abundantly and strongly to haue supported them, they sodeinly turned French, shewing senescire (saith * Walsingham) veniamus, vel domino, fidem diu feruare.

(47) The Duke of Lancaster (whose, or the like greatness may perhaps seeme more, then can stand with the narrow limits of England, which, without danger to the common wealch, can hardly afford such a proportion of estate to any Subject) was about this time informed, that the King had a purpose to arrest his person, and to trie him vpon capital points before Sir Robert Tristram, his Chief Iusticiar, a man ready, (vnder the Kings protection) to deliuer iudgement without respect to Titles. The King was nourished in this deliberation by yong men, who combined against the Dukes life. This being discouered, the Duke (a potent Prince) withdraws vpon his guard to his Castle of Pemfret in the the North; neuertheless the hopes of wicked men, delighting in their Countreys miseries, and ciuill combustions, were made void by the great diligence of the Kings mother, the Princess Joan, who spared not her continuall paines and expences, in trauielling betwene the King and the Duke, (albeit hee was exceeding tender of complexion, and scarce able to beare her owne bodies weight through corpulency) till they were fully reconciled.

(48) It had indeed bene a most wretched time for a ciuill warre, not only because the French Admirall, John de Vienna, had bene sent with forces embarked in fifteen score saile of Ships, to be employed out of Scotland against the English, but for that the French prepared a general inuasion of England, hauing in hope already as it were deuoured it. There reigned at that time in France, Charles the sixth, a yong and foolish Prince, (saith Tillem) who hauing in his treasury, left to him by his prudent father, * eighteene millions of Crownes, (and not only eighteene hundred thousand, * as some, fearing perhaps that the other summe might seeme incredible, haue written, and being moreouer set on fire with an inconsiderate loue of glory, rather then vpon any found aduise (though * some impute the Countess to the said Admirall) would needs vnderake the conquest of our Countrey. These newes stirred all the limbs and humors thereof, though the euent (God not fauouring the enterprize) was but like that of the Mountaine, which after long trauaile brought forth a ridiculous moule, neuertheless it had bene a most desperate season for a ciuill warre to haue broken forth in England.

(49) The preparations of the French doe hold notwithstanding, and the general Rendezous of their huge forces was at Sluse, in the Port whereof, and other places about, there were assigned to assemble for their transportation, * twelue hundred saile of ships. At the same time (as if the two yong kings had bene rivals in shew of men) Richard raised to great an army to ouerrun Scotland, as the like for beauty and number was neuer seene together, consisting wholly of Englishmen. But may wee beleue that England could spare three hundred thousand men, and as many horses for the vie of a warre? Certainly a needlesse multitude, but only to terrifie the French with the fame, for there might haue bene fewer, for any great Act which Richard (full of iea-lousie against his vnkle of Lancaster, wherewith his head and heart were full,) effected. But we may the rather beleue the account, for that Walsingham voucheth * Seruicants at Armes (if hee meane not Heralds by those words) whose office (he saith) it was to number the Host, and they affirmed the same. This is sure, that among other the arguments vsed by the Duke of Bury (one of the French Kings vnckles) to frustrate this enterprize, he alledged, that the King of England had mustred ten thousand horsemen, and one hundred thousand Archers for his defence; whereas the Admirall John de Vienna affirmed, that hauing seene the forces of the English, they were but eight thousand horsemen and three score thousand foot; and he might well say hauing seene: for, though Amplius bring him in speaking to the French King, and vaunting that he had encountered them, yet nothing is truer, then that the English returned out of Scotland without the least offer of battell. The Admirall was willing indeed to haue fought, but when he saw our Armie from the hill-tops, his furie gaue place to reason.

(50) While the Armie was vpon the way toward Scotland, the Kings halfe-brother the Lord John Holland wickedly slew the Lord Stafford, sonne to the Earle of Stafford not farre from Yorke, being vpon his journey to the Queene, whose fauoured Knight he was. For which heinous homicide the King seized vpon his whole estate, denying to his mothers most earnest praers any pardon or grace for his brother. Which was to her so greuous, that within five or sixe daies after shee gaue vp the Ghost at Wallingford. The young Lord tooke Sanctuary at Bewerley, and the King by his iustice herein wanne the hearts of the said Earle of Stafford, the Earle of Warwick, the Lord Basset, and other great men of Staffords kindred and friends; neither did this empeach at all the present voyage.

(51) The Scots and French in Scotland, seeing themselves vnable to withstand such forces, had so retired themselves and all their goods, that when the English should come, they, (as Walsingham pleasantly saith) could see no quick things left but onlie Owles. That which was Greene in the fields, the horses deuoured or trampled down, yet such harme, as the materials of buildings were capable of, was done. Edinburgh also and the * noble Abbey of Mabilroffe were fired. The Duke of Lancaster persuaded the King to march beyond the Frith or Scottish Sea (as his great Ancestors had done) to seeke out his enemies; but he, very suspitious that the Duke gaue him this counsell with a purpose to betray him to destruction by famine, and want, which he was there to looke for, exprest much displeasure and returned. The Dukes wordes notwithstanding and behauiour were tempered, with much duty and modesty; but that would not serue, till the Lords peeced their affections together by intercession in the best manner the time would suffer. But the English host was scarce returned and discharged, when the Scots and French sodeinly powred themselves forth vpon our Countrey, and did whatsoeuer hurt the shortnes of time in their incursion could permit.

(52) To resist and endamage the French, there were appointed Admirals for the narrow Seas, the Master of Saint Johns, and Sir Thomas Percy Knight, (the Earle of Northumblands brother,) who did nothing worthy their fame or place. Only the Townsmen of Portsmouth and Dart, maund forth a few ships at their owne perill and charge, wherewith entering the riuer of Sein (vpon which the renowned Citties Rouen and Paris are situated) suncke some of their enemies ships, tooke others, and among them one of Sir *Oliuer de Clisson*s, the goodliest that France had. The successe answered their hopes, and they were enriched with the spoiles of their aduersaries, whom thus they compelled to beare the charge of their proper mischief.

(53) Meanwhile that the French lay at Sluse, attending the approach of their kings vnckle the Duke of Burie, (who fauoured not this enterprize of inuasion, but sought * as well by delays, as by perfuasion and authority to make it frustrate,) they of Gant had gotten the Towne of Dam by the good liking of the Inhabitants, to whom the French gouernment was odious. For recovery whereof, the French King drew his armie (prepared against England) to the siege of Dam, which (the same being first secretly abandoned, after a months siege and many repulses giuen to the French) was by him recovered. This, and other things, did so protract the great expedition intended, that (after wast of infinite treasure) Charles returned home, without hauing seene England, which was by these means most graciously freed by God, from so dangerous, and greatly-feared an impression. But that the English might the better endure the same, John King of Portugall, hauing lately in a great and bloodie battell (where some of the English deserued well of him,) ouerthrowne the Castilians, and thereby sealed his estate, sent into England sixe Gallies thoroughly well appointed, for Sea-seruice, though (as God would) there was no need of them.

(54) Of those French, which (after the Cloude of warre at Sluse was dispersed into ayre,) passed ouerland into their Countreys, many were taken and slaine by the Gantimiers. Their naue was not lesse vnfürfortunate; for at one * time the English of Callis tooke of them eighteene, and the rage of weather brake brake and sunke diuers, so that this Branado was not only costly to the French, by reason of the charges, but hurtfull in the losse of time, men, shippes, and hoped glorie. Such are the euents of humane enterprises, where God is not pleased to giue successe. The English thus deliuered from feare make a road into France out of Calles, and with a prey of four thousand sheepe and three hundred head of great cattell, besides an hundred good prisoners, returned safe to their Garrison.

The attempt of the Laitie to disposse the Clergie of their temporall estates.

(55) The multitude of memorable things which present themselves to vs in the liues of our English Monarches, is such, that if wee did not vse choise, and in their relation breuitie, wee should not relieue our Readers of that molestiation, with which the yaste volumes of former labours doe oppresse the memorie. The Laitie, at the Parliament now holden at London, had yielded to aide the King with a Fiftenth vpon condition, that the Clergie should succour him with a Tenth and an halfe, against which vniuersit proportion, William de Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury most stilly opposed; alleading that the Church ought to be free, nor in any wise to be taxed by the Laitie, and that himselfe would rather die then endure that the Church of England, (the liberties whereof had by so many free Parliaments in all times, and not only in the reign of this King been confirmed, should be made a bond-maide. This answer so offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, and some Peeres of the land, with extreme fury besought, That Temporalities might be taken away from Ecclesiasticall persons, saying, that it was an Almsdeed and an Act of Charity for to doe, thereby to humble them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition which they had exhibited to the King would take effect. Hereupon they designed among themselves, out of which Abbey, which should receiue such a certain summe, and out of which, another. I my selfe (saith a Monke of Saint Albans) heard one of those Knights confidently sweare, that hee would haue a yeerely pension of a thousand Marks out of the Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the King hauing heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to silence, and the Petition to be razed out, saying, He would maintain the English Church in the quality of the same state or better, in which himselfe had knowne it to be, when he came to the Crowne. The Archbishop hereupon hauing consulted with the Clergie, came to the King, and declared, that hee and the Clergie had with one consent, willingly provided to supplie his Maiesties occasions with a Tenth. This grant the King tooke so contentedly, as he openly affirmed, hee was better pleased with this free contribution of one Tenth for the present, then if hee had gotten foure by compulsion.

The first Mar-quesse made that euer was in England.

(56) Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford (a young Gentleman in speciall grace with the King) was at this Parliament created Marquesse of Dublin in Ireland, which moued great despight against him, those rough times being impatient to beare the vnequall aduancement of fauourites. Neuertheless, though the gentle King was thought herein to please his owne fanthe, rather then to reward merite, yet did hee so sweetly temper it, as there was no iustice, nor reason to enuie to him that so face which hee tooke in his friends encreased honour; for at the same time hee aduanced two of his vnclies, Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham to the title of Duke of Glocester, and Edmund of Langley Earle of Cambridge, he created Duke of Torke, allotting severall proportions of pension to be paid out of his Exchequer. In Vere there was ancient Nobilitie to iustifie his new degree the better; but in making the Lord Chancellor Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, with the yeerellie pension of 1000 Markes, was matter of more enuies; because he was not defended of such honourable Parents: a defect (if it be a defect) which none more willingly vpbraid to men of worth, then who themselves are not alwayes the most worthy. The first raiser of this familie of De la Pole was Edward the third, who made William de la Pole, of a braue Merchant, a Knight Banneret, and gaue him great possessions, in requitall of an extraordinary and voluntary loane of treasure, aduanced by him to supply the King in a time of speciall necessity, when money could stand him in more steed then a thousand men of Armes: no little merite in a subiect, nor a slender reward of a most munificent Prince.

(57) Henry Spenser the marciall Bishop of Norwich found grace with the King at this Parliament, to be restored to his temporalities, at the speciall suite of Thomas Arundell Bishoppe of Ely: whiles the Bishoppe of Ely thus beought his Maiesty of Grace, the laid Michael de la Pole (Lord Chancellor and Earle of Suffolke) stood by, and brake out with much offence into these words. What is that my Lord which you aske of the King? Seemes it to you a small matter for him to part with that Bishops temporalities, when they yield to his Cooffers about one thousand pounds by yeere? Little neede hath the King of such Counsellors, or of such friends, as aduise him to act so greatly to his hinderance. Whereunto the Bishop of Ely not lesse truly, then free lie repleide. What saith your Lordship my Lord Michael? Know that I require not of the king that which is his, but that which hee (drawne thereunto either by you, or by the Counsell of such as you are,) withholdes from other men, vpon none of the iustest titles, and which (as I thinke) will neuer doe him any good: as for you, if the Kings hinderance bee the thing you weigh, why did you so greedily accept of a thousand markes by yeere, at such time as he created you Earle of Suffolke? The Chancellor was hit so home with this round retort, that hee neuer offered any further to crosse the restitution of the Bishops temporalities.

(58) After this the King being with his Queen at their manour of Eltham in Kent, there came thither Leo King of Armenia, a Christian Prince, whom the Tartars had expelled out of his Kingdome. The pretence of his negotiation was to accord the realms of England and France; that the Princes thereof might with ioint forces remoue the common enemy from Christendome. Therein hee could effect nothing, but his journey was not otherwise vnfruitfull to himselfe, for King Richard (a Prince to speake truly, full of honour and bounty) gaue him besides a thousand pounds, in a ship of gold) letters Patents also for a thousand pounds yeerely pension during life.

(59) The time now was come, wherein K. Richard should see himselfe deliuered of all that feare and ialousie, which the greatnesse of his vnclie the Duke of Lancaster stirred in him. His Forces were now ready, and his Nauie encreased with 1600 Gallies, and eighteen shippes sent out of Portugall attended at Bristoll, to transport him toward Spaine, (for Castile is high Spaine) the crowne whereof hee claimed in right of Constance his second wife, daughter of Dom Peter the cruell. Before hee set forth, the newes came that such English as were already in Portugall with their friends had ouerthrowne the Spaniards, French, and Britons, at a battell in Spaine. This was a spur to quicken the Dukes enterprise, which Pope Vrbane the sixth (by granting plenarie remission of finnes to all such as gaue the Duke aid) did specially fauour, as against them who did parake with his enemy the Antipape: * but the frequent grant of such pardon and releasement, was now growne so vile and contemptible amongst the people, that few were found open handed towards this Crucceado. Admiral of this Fleete was Sir Thomas Perce, Sir Iohn Holland (who had married one of the Dukes daughters after ward created Earle of Huntington) was Contable of the host, and Sir Iohn Mereaux (who had to wife one of the Dukes illegitimate children) was one of his Marshals. There were in this noble and excellently well appointed Army, the Lords Talbot, Basset, Willoughby, Fitz-walter, Poinings, Bradston, Fitz-warren, warren, Beaumont, Beauchampe, the Lord Pemiers a Gascogne, &c. with very many worthy knights & valiant Esquiers, and a choise number of men of Arms, Archers and other Souldiers, to the number of twenty thousand. The Duke tooke also with him his wife, the Lady Constance, and two daughters, which hee had by her, as * one relateth.

(60) It was now the moneth of May, when the great Duke of Lancaster coming to take leaue, had of the kings gift a Diadem of gold, and his Dutchesse of the Queene another: he also commanded the English to call, and hold his vnclie for a King, and to doe him anwerable honour. But after all this, hee lay for a wind so long, till his whole provisions were almost spent; at length yet, hee set forward. The first land they touched was neere to Brest in Britaine, where Sir Iohn Reith the Gouverneur against the French, complained of two Forts built about him to impeach his quiet egress; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster caused the to be assaulted; so both of them being taken by surrender, were razed to the ground, though some English first lost their liues, among which, was Sir Robert Swinarton, a valiant Knight of Staffordshire, and John de Bolton a courageous Esquier of Torke, whom the foudaine ruine of a Tower (ouerturned by mining) whelmed and slew outright. Sharpened with the successe of this victorie, they commit themselves to God, and the Sea, and prosperously arriue with the whole Fleet in the Port Corone, or the Groyne, * in August.

(61) The French (belike) thought England could not furnish an other Army for France, as the had for Spain: whereupon there was now no false nor vain rumor spread again, that the French would besiege Calis. The King to secure that pretious transmarine part of his Dominions, sent thither store of men and of all provisions. The most eminent person was Henry Lord Perce, sonne to Henry Earle of Northumberland. This was hee whom the Scots by named Hotspur, a young Gentleman, in whom (saith Walsingham) the pattern of all vertue and martiall prowess shined: and indeed his nature did answere his by-name; for hee made such ridings into the quarters about Calis, that they could neuer with a worse neighbour. After which, when the fame went that the French king would not delay, or (as they call it) beleaguer Calis, but rather inuade England, hee returned to be present where the greatest danger was expected. At this time, the English Scaemen of warre, brought two French prizes to Sandwich, in which was taken a part of an huge strong Timber-wall, which the French king, preparing now for Englands inuasion, had caused to be built in length three miles, in height twenty foot, which had at euery twelue paces a Tower (ten foot higher) and each capable of ten men, the whole to be a defence for the French encampments against our shot, and a shelter for theirs, there was also in the same Ships the Engineer and master workman, who was an Englishman, and great quantities of powder, and store of Ordnance, together with the French Kings Master Gunner.

(62) There was in this time a great resemblance between England and France in the chiefe points of State. As England had Richard, so had France her Charles, both young Kings. Charles with an huge armie had prepared to inuade England, but did nothing: Richard with no lesse forces entred Scotland, and did no great thing. Richard had vnclies which bafe great sway in the Realmes so had Charles. Richard had his vnclie Iohn more potent then the rest, Charles had his vnclie Lewis. Iohn vpon his vnclies title claimeth the kingdomes of Castile and Leon, Lewis by the gift of Iohn the Queene, claimes the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicill. Lewis went with an Army of thirty thousand horse into Italie to achieve his claime; with what force Iohn set forth you haue heard. But Lewis died without obta-ning, Iohn preuailed so farre as to settle his child by marriage. The King and great Lords of France were glad (with any charge) to enioy the absence of Lewis, and Richard and his fauourites were not sad, that the Realme was for the present rid of Iohn.

(63) The forces of the French provided for this inuasion of England, were reported in open Parliament (which the King held about Michaelmas in London) to consist of 15 Dukes, 26 Earles, two hundred Lords, & an hundred thousand souldiers, and a thousand Ships, assembled about sluise, with full purpose to take reuenge of all the euils which the English nation had formerly wrought in France, and to destroy the English kingdome. But though these reports were not fained, (for the French attended nothing in a manner but a faire gale of winde to bring them,) yet could not the King, without Capitulations made by the Duke of Gloster, obtaine any aides of money; so that, whereas it seemed to the King, that by the Duke of Lancaster departure, hee was become more free, yet had he left behind spirits much more stiffe and intractable. O deare Countrey, hadst thou not then bene apparant in Gods protection, (for the French hauing stayd for a wind till Hallowtide, and then hauing it half-way, were beaten backe, and the voyage made vtterly voyd) certainly thy ruine had then bene certaine. What shall we thinke or say of those popular Lords, by this gentle King armed (to his owne bane) with power and greatnes, who under the specious pretext of reforming abuses, did satisfie their enuie and inbred inselency?

(64) The King telsthem, that England is, as they saw, in manifest danger, and prays their succour in money: what is the answer? That the Duke of Ireland (for now the Marquesse of Dublin was made a Duke,) and Michael de la Pole (so they scornfully called the Earle of Suffolke) and other must be removed. Things are badly carried at home, say they; (and they perhaps said truly;) but where was now the care of our Countrey? God indeed turned from vs the mercilesse point of the French sword; but here began the seeds of innumerable worse miseries, neuer to be remembered without sighes and teares.

(65) The seedes (we say) of those fearefull calamities were then first here sowne, whose sum a flourishing * Writer in our age (willing needrely to haue imitated Lucan, as hee is indeed called our * Lucan) doth not unfortunately expresse, though hee might rather haue said he wept them, then sung them; but so to sing them, is to weepe them.

I sing the ciuill warres, tumultuous broiles, And bloody factions of a mighty land; whose people haue, proud with forraine spoiles, Vpon themselves turne backe their conquering hands; while kinne their kinne, brother the brother soiles, Like Ensignes, all against like Ensignes bands, Bowes against Bowes, a Crowne against a Crowne, While all pretending right, all right throwne downe.

But Robert de Vere, saith Thomas Duke of Glocester and his party, was vnworthily created Duke of Ireland, and De la Pole the Lord Chancellor seemed to be the only great Lords (for so they would seeme) to be in the Kings debt. Strange colours for Subjects to capitulate with their Kings vpon giuing their ioynt aides against the common enemy, now ready with one destruction to ouerwhelme them all. The time they tooke to worke this pretended amendment in state, was not well fitted. It fauoured of somewhat else besides the loue of common-weale. Private ambitions and passions could not bee wanting in such oppositions. This is some mens iudgement, let the sequels shew how iust.

tie miles round, and had no pay but lived vpon spoile. These at last were licensed to depart to be ready at warning. There was also the Lord Chancellor accused, of (we wot not what) petty crimes (for the abuses of following ages haue made them seeme so,) as for paying to the Kings Coiffers but *twentie markes yeerely, for a fee-farme, whereof himselfe receiued threecore and ten, and some such other. To pacifie these great Lords, the Lord Chancellor is disgraced, and the seale taken from him, against the Kings will, and giuen to Thomas Arundell Bishop of Elye, and then the houses of Parliament yeelded to giue halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth, but vpon condition that it should be disposed of, as the Lords thought fit, for defence of the Realme. The money was thereupon deliuered to the Earle of Arundell to furnish himselfe for that purpose to the Sea. But to rid the Duke of Ireland out of the realme, the Lords were willing he should haue those thirtie thousand markes, for which the heires of Charles of Blois, (who heretofore challenged Britaine) were transfacted to the French, vpon condition that the sayd Duke should passe into Ireland before the next Easter.

(67) The Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but the King recalls the Earle of Suffolk to the Court, keeps both him, the Duke of Ireland and Alexander Nevile Archbishop of York about his person, in greater fauour then before. Infomuch that at Christmas he made De-la-Pole to sit at his owne Table not in the usual garment of a Peere, but princely robed. Surely therein not well, for some of those great Lords, (though not by so sweet meanes as were fit) did desire to waken him out of Courtly drowsinesse, and (as men that knew not what peace meant) to put him into actions worthy of his name and greatness. These other persons were not so friended, or qualified, that they could support a King against an vniuersal mislike. But the King vpon a stomacke doth it; so that (saith Walsingham) here first grew the Kings hatred against the Peeres, that from thence forth he neuer, as it is said, regarded them but fauoured. So much more dangerous sometime is the remedy then a very greuous maladie.

(68) King Richard (whose age and place stood in need of wiser instructions), not thus contented to haue whetted the displeasures of the greater Peeres, as if he had said to himselfe, Rumpatur quisque rumpitur inuidia is further drawne, as was said, to plot the death of his vnckle, Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloster, and other enemies of De-la-pole; who together being invited to a feast (by the bloody deuile of Sir Nicholas Brame late Lord Maior of London, should together haue perished. But the present Lord Maior Nicholas Exton (whom the conspirators would haue had their Partaker, if it may be beleued) honestly refused to assent. The Lords hereupon hauing admonition, refrained to come.

any matter which befelmed so potent a Prince, wee say not (quoth our Author) as concerning the use of Armes, but not even concerning those very recreations, which most of all become great spirits, as hunting, hawking, and the like. But the Earles did more then meddle with Merchants (who yet were able to make dangerous resistances) for they landed at Brest in Britaine, and with great difficulty deliuered it againe from so bad neighbours as the two wooden Forts neerely built, where the other had stood, one of which they fired, and the other they maned with the English Garrison of Brest. Then stuffing it with all sorts of provisions for a yeere, and furnishing the wants of the Souldiers with all necessaries, they returned, hauing worthily wonne the loue and praises of the people. Which, as they were also due to them from the king, yet comming to his presence, they (by these mens euill offices) had so cold entertainment, as they effoones withdrew themselves from Court to liue quietly vpon their owne at home. After them the braue young Henry Hotspur, Lord Percy was sent (all prouided) to the Sea; neuertheless he ventred, and returned (when his commission was expired) with honour.

(70) One thing done by the Duke of Ireland was furle full of wickednesse and indignitie. For he hauing to wife, a young, faire, and noble Ladie, and the Kings neere kinswoman, (for shee was Grandchild to king Edward by his daughter Isabel), did put her away, and took one of Queene Annes women, a Bohemian * of base birth, called in her mother tongue Lancercrone. This intollerable villanie offered to the blood royall, King Richard did not encounter; neither had the power, some say, who deemed that by witchcrafts and forceries (practised vpon him by one of the Dukes followers) his iudgement was so seduced and captiuated, that he could not see what was honest or fit to doe. But where Princes are wilfull or slouthfull, and their fauorites flatterers or time-seruers, there needs no other enchantments to infatuate, yea and ruinate the greatest Monarch.

(71) The Duke of Glocester tooke the matter more to heart, resolving to be reuenged for the infamy and confusion, which was brought thereby vpon his noble kinswoman. Meane while the king, as if he meant to conduct his deare friend, the Duke toward Ireland, went with him into Wales. There the King deuiceth with him, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Tresilian and others; (who were equally afraid of the Lords) how to destroy the Duke of Glocester, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Derby, Nottingham, and such others, as from whom they thought fitte to bee cleare. Much time being trifled thus away in Wales, they come together (as if the Dukes appointed voyage, or rather banishment into Ireland, were quite forgotten) to the Castle of Nottingham, there more freely to deliberate. A fearefull estate of a Monarchie. Hee among a few, generally ill beloued, and ill aduised, and ill provided; for their whole strength was the king, and these emulations made that force feeble both to him and them: the Lords, potent, martiall, rich, and popular; hee Nottingham, they not neere him: but abroad farre-off, the Duke of Lancaster with the flower of the English forces, and mighty neighbours watching for the ruine of all. The course agreed vpon by the King and that ill-chosen Senate, was first to haue the opinion of all the Chief Lawyers concerning certaine Articles of Treason, within whose nets and sprindges they presumed the reforming Lords were; and if the Lawyers (who seldom doe faile Princes in such turnes, did conclude, that those Articles contained treasonable matter, then vnder a shew of iustice they should be proceeded against accordingly. These Lawyers (who were the very men, which in the last seditious Parliament, gaue aduise to the Lords to doe as they did) now meeting, were demanded, whether by the law of the land, the King might not disanull the Decrees of the last Parliament: they jointly answered: he might, because hee was above the lawes: confessing that themselves had in that Parliament decreed many things, and giuen their iudgement, that all was according to law, which now they acknowledged to be altogether unlawfull. The King thus enforced, appointed a great Councell to be holden at Nottingham, and sent for certaine Londoners, some of them such as were beholding to the King for mercie in cases of attaindour, to be there empannelled for Queets of Inquire. The Sherifes of Shires (being questioned) denied, that they could raise any competent forces against the Lords, their whole Counties were so addicted in their fauour: & being further willed to suffer no Knights to be chosen for the Shires, but such as the King & his Councell should name, they answered, that the election belonged to the Commons who fauoured the Lords in all.

(72) Vpon the 25. of August there met before the King at Nottingham these Lawyers, Robert Tresilian his chiefe Iustitiar, Robert Belknap chiefe Iustitiar of the common Pleas, John Holt, Roger Stilethorpe, & William Burgh Iustitiars in the same Court, and John Lokton the Kings Sericant at Law: all which being vpon their allegiance charged to deliuer their opinions, whether such * Articles as were there in the Kings behalf propounded (which Articles comprehended all the points of aduantage taken against the proceedings of the last Parliament, and the displacing of the Lord Chancellor, Michael de Pole) contained matter of offence, they all of them answered affirmatiuely and subscribed; which afterward cost them deare. Iudge Belknap foresaw the danger, and therefore was very vnwilling to put his seale to the answers; saying: there wanted but a hurde, a horse, and a halter, to carrie him where hee might suffer the death hee deserved, for if I had not done this (quoth he) I should haue died for it, and because I haue done it, I deserve death for betraying the Lordes. The King in the meane space puruaies himselfe of people to fight, if need required.

(73) The Duke of Glocester (added with these newes, sent the Bishoppe of London to bring his purgation vpon oath to the King, who inclining to credit the same, was in an euill howe diuerted by De la Pole. The Duke makes his and their common danger known to the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, & Derby, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lancaster. They feuerally gather forces, that vniued they might present their grieues to the King, who to keep them from ioyning, sends the Earle of Northumberland to arrest the Earle of Arundell at Reigate in Surrey, where hee abode. But by reason of Arundells power, it was too dangerous a worke. Northumberland returnes, and Arundell (admonished by the Duke of Glocester of his farther perill) escapeth in post to Haringey, where the Duke and Earle of Warwicke had store of people.

(74) As yet no bloud was drawne. Peaceable men procured that the Lords should repaire safe to Westminster, and there be heard. Thither approaching they are aduertised by the Bishop of Elye and others (who had sworn on the kings behalf for good dealing to be vied during the Interim) that at the Mewes by Charing Crosse, a thousand armed men (which without the Kings priuety Sir Thomas Triuet and Sir Nicholas Brembre Knights were reported to haue laid for their destruction) attended in ambush. The King sweares his innocency, but the Lords come strong and trust no longer. The King royally adorned keeps state in Westminster Hall with manie his Prelates and Peeres about him; the Lords present themselves vpon their knees, and being required by the Bishop of Elye the Lord Chancellor (for the Lord De la Pole neuer had that place againe) why they were in warlike manner assembled at Haringey Parke, contrary to the lawes, their ioint answer was, That they were assembled for the good of the King and kingdome, and to weed from about him such Traitors as hee continually held with him. The traitors they named to bee, Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevile Archbishop of York, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Tresilian that false Iustitiar (quoth they) and Sir Nicholas Brame that false Knight of London. To proue them such, they threw downe their gloues, as gages of challenge for a triall to bee had by the sword. The King hercunto replied, as knowing that they were all hidden out of the way: This shall not bee done so, but at the next Parliament (which shall be the morrow after Candlemas) all parties shall receive according as they deserve. And now (saith hee) to see my Lords; how or by what authority durst you presume to leuie force against mee in this land? did you thinke to haue terrified mee by such your presumption? haue not I men of Armes, who if it pleased me could enuiron and kill you like Cattle? Certainly in this respect I esteeme of you all none other then as of the basest scullions in my Kitchens. Hauing vied these, and many the like high words, hee tooke vp his vnckle the Duke from the ground, where all this while hee kneeled, and bad all the other rise. The rest of the conference was calme, and the whole deferred till the next Parliament, then shortly to be holden at Westminster. In the meane time (that the world might see how little able the King was to equall his words with deedes) a Proclamation is set forth, in which the King cleareth the Lords (before any trial) of treason objected, and names those persons for vniuelt accusers, whom the Lords had before named.

(75) The factious Lords neuertheless thought not good to seuer themselves, but to keepe together for feare of the worst, which fell out to their aduantage; for the Duke of Ireland (with the Kings priuety) had gathered a power in Wales and Cheshire, which they intercepting neere to Burford and Babbilake, slew Sir William Molineux leader of the Cheshire men, and some others, and made the Duke to flie in great feare. Among the spoiles of the Dukes carriages there were found (as the Diuell would haue it) certaine letters of the King to the said Duke of Ireland, by which their counsels were plainly discovered. The Lords hereupon march with speede vp to London, hauing an Armie of about forty thousand men. The King thuts himselfe vp in the Tower, but is glad before long to admit them to his presence. There they (vnuerently inough) objected mutability to him and his vnderhand workings; they objected also, that hee had secretly practised to flie with the Duke of Ireland into France, and to deliuer vp to the French Kings possession Calles, & such pieces as the Crowne of England held in those parts: proue which dishonourable act, they (as some write) produced the French packets intercepted. This wrung teares (perhaps of disdain) from the King, and hee yeelded to come to Westminster vpon the next day, there to heare and determine farther. The King in signe of amitie stayed his Cosen the Earle of Derbie (the same who afterward dethroned him) to supper. O where was the courage of a King! The Lords in their owne quarrell could draw vp fortie thousand men; but in the generall danger of the Realme, when the Commons were vp, and the French hung ouer their heads, with no lesse hatred then preparations, no such numbers appeared. Was it for their honour or praise, that their most rightfull King should by their violence be driuen to confute vpon flight out of his proper Kingdome? The Citie of London was also in no little perill at this present by their access, which drawne by iust feare was contented to open the gates and harbour the Lords and their partakers. These Lords, who so often are called here the Lords, are named in our * Statute booke to be but these five; The Duke of Glocester, the Earles of Derbie, Arundell, Warwicke, and Marshall.

repairs to Westminster. This being signified to the Kings Lords (for so they might be called, as being more Matters then the King) they labour not, by humble words, and dutious reasons to persuade the vie or necessity of his presence in that place, but contrarie to their allegiance, and all good order send him word, That if he came not quickly according to appointment, they would choose them another King, who both would and should obey the counsell of the Peeres. They had him indeed amongst them, whom (belike) they even then meant to have furrogated, that is to say, the before said Earle of Derby, heire to the D. of Lancaster. The Lords certainly had so behaved themselves towards the King, that they well saw they must bee masters of his person and power, or themselves in the end perishe.

(77) The King (after a preposterous and inuerterd manner) attending his Subjects pleasures at Westminster, heavily and unwillingly is drawne to disclaime Alexander Nevill Archbishoppe of Yorke, the Bishopps of Dureme and Chichester, the Lords Souch and Beaumont with sundry others. Neither was the Male-lexe only suspected to these curious pruners; the Lady Poinings, and other Ladies were also removed, and put vnder baile to answer such things as should be objected. Sir Simon Burley, Sir William Eliham, Sir John Beauchampe of Holt, Sir John Salisbury, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Bernes, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Brambre knights with certaine Clerks were apprehended, and kept in strait prison, to answer such accusations (what if mere calumnyons?) as in the next Parliament at Westminster should be objected.

(78) The Parliament began at Candlemas, where the King was unwillingly present: The first day of the Session, all the Iudges Fulthrop, Belknap, Care, Hott, Burgh, and Lockton were arrested as they late in Judgement on the Bench, and most of them sent to the Tower. The cause alleged was, that having first overruled them with their counsels and directions, which they assured them to be according to law, they afterward at Nottingham gave contrarie judgement to that which themselves had fore-declared. Troffian the chiefe Iustice prevented them by flight, but being apprehended, and brought to the Parliament in the forenoone, had sentence to be drawne to Tyborne in the afternoone, and there to have his throat cut; which was done accordingly. Sir Nicholas Brambres turne was next. This Brambre (which Walsingham) was said to have imagined to be made Duke of new Troy (the old supposed name of London) by murdering thousands of such Citizens, (whose names hee had billed for that purpose) as were suspected of likelihood to resist him. Then Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Bernes two young Knights, Sir John Beauchamp of Holt, Steward of the Household to the King, and John Blake Esquier, were likewise sacrificed to reuenge. Sir Simon Burley onely had the worshipping to have but his head stricken off. Loe the noble respect which the gentle Lords had to iustice and amendment. This was no age (wee see) for a weake or slothfull Prince to sit in quiet; for now the people, and then the Peeres, foile and trample the regall authority vnder foote: the Duke of Ireland, the Archbishoppe of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke and others, had their estates confiscated to the kings vie by Act of Parliament, as in the booke of Statutes may be seene, together with a great part of the whole proceedings.

(79) These troubles boiling and burning within, in the Bowels of the State, the Scots abroad had opportunity to invade the North of England, vnder the conduct of Sir William Douglas, a noble young knight, a parallel and riuall in the honour of Armes to Henry Hotspur, Lord Percy, whom Hotspur fighting hand to hand slew in battell: but the Earle of Dunbar coming with an excessive number of Scots, tooke Hotspur and his brother prisoners, killing many English, not without such losse to themselves, that they forthwith returned.

(80) But these vnneighbourly hostilities soone after found some successe, there being a meeting at Calis betweene the English and French, about establishing a peace: and albeit, because the French would haue the Scot and Spaniard included therein, the conclusion was deferred, yet shortly after it was resolved vpon for three yeeres, the Scots being comprehended therein.

(81) King Richard (being now of age) declares himselfe free to gouerne of himselfe, without either contremolement, or help of any other, then such as hee selected to that place, and in token that he was at liberty, he takes the Great Seale of England from Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Yorke, (Alexander Nevill being attainted and fled) and departs out of the Councell Chamber. After a while hee returns, and giues it backe to William Wickham (the renowned Bishoppe of Winchester) who was vnwilling to haue accepted the same. Hee also puts out fundrie Officers, substituting such others as best liked him. From the Councell Table hee removed his vnkle Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloucester, the Earle of Warwicke, and others; which (as it might) encouraged the Dukes enemies about the King, to doe euill offices betweene them. Yet the king did not presently credite what was whispered into his eare, concerning a purpose suggested to be in the Duke, to raise forces againe; but acquainting him withall, was satisfied. Neuerthelesse, he would not suffer the Duke to pursue an orderly or any reuenge vpon the Authors, whom indeed it had bene wisdom to haue punished in an exemplary manner.

(82) Michael de la Pole late Earle of Suffolke (whom the popular Lords had made most odious to the English) died at Paris in exile, bequeathing such goods as hee had there to Robert Duke of Ireland, who also breathed out his griefes in banishment, and died at last in Brabant.

(83) The Duke of Lancaster the meane while, returns into Gascogne out of Spain, and not long after into England. The successe of that voyage (being made to claime the Crowne of Castile and Leon) was briefly this. John King of Castile alleged that Constance the Dukes wife, was not right heire, but hee. For, albeit the Lady Constance was eldest daughter and heire to Peter sonne of Alfonse, whose father Fernand the fourth was sonne of Sanchez the fourth, and he sonne of Alfonse the tenth, all Kings of Spain successiuely; yet, that neither Constance, Peter, Alfonse, Ferdinand, nor Sanchez had the right. His reason was; for that Alfonse the tenth, (chosen Emperour of Almaine) had, before hee begat the said Sanchez, an elder sonne called Ferdinand de la Cerda, who married Blanch the daughter of Saint Lewis King of France, from whom descended Alfonse de la Cerda (who entituled himselfe King, but died without issue) and Fernand, who had a daughter married to John, sonne of the Infant of Portugal Emmanuel, mother to the Lady Isabe, wife of King Henry the second, father of John King of Castile defendant.

(84) This Apologie made by the Castilian, would not serue; for kingdomes are not vsed to be pleaded for by Bill and Answer: The English and Portugals ioine their forces. To the Duke (by reason of his wifes presence,) manie did voluntarily submit themselves; all did not, for *Don Aluarez de Perez on the behalfe of his Lord, the King of Spain, offered to stop the Duke in his march to Burgos, and was ouerthrowne. Other adventures that warre afforded, but sicknesse hapning in the English Armie, consumed many of the principall, and amongst them the Lord Fitzwalter, with other Lords, Knights, Esquires, and men of armes, almost three hundred. Moreouer the penurie was such, that fundrie reuolted to the enemy to get reliefe, which being a scene of the King of Portugal, he told the Duke he would set vpon them as Enemies, but hee said no, for that he knew they did it onely for lacke of foode. Thus hauing said, he held downe his head, as hee sat on horsebacke, and wept most bitterly, secretly powring forth his praiers to almighty God, and most humbly beseeching mercy. From which time forward his affaires in Spain succeeded happily.

(85) The warres had bene * sharpe and tedious, but the end acceptable. For Don Juan king of Castile, a Prince of no euill confidence, seeing the right which the Duke of Lancaster vrged, and foreseeing what calamities might happen hereafter, if (as was feared) the French should match with him, fought and obtained a firme peace. The Principall conditions were: That the Lord Henry, his sonne and heire, should marry the Lady Katherine, daughter and heire to the Duke and Constance his wife; That the Lord Henry (during his fathers life) should be called Prince of Asturia, and Katherine his wife Princess: That * for default of issue betweene the young Princely couple, the Crowne should come to the Lord Edward Duke of Yorke, who had married the other daughter of King Peter. That the king of Spain should lade * eight Cars with wedges of gold for the Duke, or (as * some write) pay two hundred thousand nobles, toward the defrayment of the Dukes huge charges; That finally, he should giue sufficient Caution for an Annuite of ten thousand pounds, during the liues of the said Duke and Duchesse, to be duly paid to their vies at the City of * Bayon in Gascogne.

(86) The King, at such time as the Duke of Lancaster returned, was at Reading, whither hee had commanded the Peeres to repaire. To that meeting the Duke makes hast, aswell to present his dutie to his Soueraigne, as to be an authour of loue and peace betweene the king and Lords, against some of whom the King was not thought to be verie fauorably disposed. Which hee graciously effected, as seeming to addit his mind to offices of piety and publike benefit. Certainly the wisdom and moderation of the Duke of Yorke his brother, were such, in all the late, and other tumults, that heis not so much as once named among the factious; which Christian spirit if it had reigned in all the rest, England had neuer bene polluted with such infinite bloodshed of her noblest Children; neither had the goodlie fabrick of state, laden with innumerable trophees, fall vnder that most hideous Chaos, which succeeded ages faw and sighted for.

(87) The King vpon the Duke of Lancaster returne, whether hee felt the keeping of Aquitaine an vnprofitable burthen, or the absence of his vnkle the Duke, a thing worthe to be purchased at anie rate, certaine it is, that in a Parliament held at London, he vested in him that famous Duchy, by deliueering the Cap of State, and Ducal Rod; whither hee shortly went to take possession. His sonne, Henric of Bullingbrooke Earle of Derbie, loath to spend his houres in sloath, but desirous to pursue renowne by martiall Acts in foreine parts, sailed ouer to the warres in Prussia, where in sundry enterprizes against the Lithuanians, hee was great honor, which, by comparison of King Richards Calmes, prepared a way for him in the English affections, to points more eminent.

(88) The Pope now vnderstood, that the English State began againe to be sensible of Romish enroachments; and as in a former Parliament they had enacted against all Collations of Bishopricks and dignities by the Pope, with banishment to all which did accept such Collations, and death to al that brought in any excommunications from the Pope, to hinder the execution of that Act; so in this last Parliament, another euere Act was made, against such as went to the Pope to procure any such prouisions. A Proclamation also was made at London, * that all beneficed men then being in the Court of Rome, should returne by a day prefixed, or loose all their Liuing. The Pope himselfe (saith Walsingham) troubled with * so great a thunder-clap, sent with all speed into England, to perswade the King, that such Statutes as had bene thus made in their preiudice, who followed the Court of Rome, and such other clauses as tended to the dammage of that See, should be made void; whereto the Kings answer was, that the Pope Nuntius must expect till the next Parliament. At which Parliament the King, as also the Duke of Lancaster, seemed to haue some respect to the Pope, (whose messenger was their Present) but the * Knights of the house would not in any wise giue their consents, that such * Rome-gadders should without due punishment pursue their wanted course, longer then till the next Parliament. To furnish the Duke of Lancaster into France, to treat of a peace, and vpon condition that the King should that yere invade Scotland, large contributions were there made, both by Clergy and Laitie. Hereupon the Lord * Henry Percy, Hotspur (who had redeemed himself) was called from his charge at Calis, and made Warden of the Marches against Scotland; Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham succeeding in the Captainship of Caly. The Dukes chargefull employment in France bare no other flower, then a yeeres short truce.

(89) The Kings wants still encreasing with his imployments, the Londoners (carried away with euill counsell) did a thing most vnworthy of their Citie and themselves, and it might to them haue proved as hurtfull, as it was vnworthy, at such time as the King * desired the loane but of one thousand pounds: which was not onely churlishly denied, but a certaine Lambard, honestly offering to lend the same, was badly vied, beaten, and almost slain. Their liberties for that and other disorders are seized, and their proper Magistracy dissolved, (Guardians being giuen them, first Sir Edward Dallingridge, then Sir Baldwin Radington) and their Maior, and some chiefe Citizens layed in prisons farre off from London. The punishment brought the fowlenesse of their errors to their sight; but by the Duke of * Gloucesters intercessions (who did not vnwillingly lay hold vpon such occasions of popularity) the king and Queene are wonne to enter the City, which gaue them triumphall entertainment. The sea is not sodainly calmed after a tempest, neither a Princes anger. By degrees yet, and not without deare repentance, they were at last restored to their former condition in all points.

(90) The king declaring his purpose to crosse into Ireland, had an aide of money conditionally granted: foure yeeres truce by the trauaile of the two Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester being concluded in France. This yeere was farther notable for many great Funerals. Constance Duchesse of Aquitaine and Lancaster, a Lady of great * Innocency and deuotion: the Countesse of Derby her daughter in law, Isabel the Duchesse of Yorke, and a Lady noted for too great a finenesse and delicacy, yet at her death shewing much repentance and sorrow for her loue to those pestilent vanities, left this present life. But all the griefe for their deaths did in no sort equall that of the kings, for the losse of his owne Queene Anne, which about the same time hapned at Sheerne in Surrey, whom hee loued euen to a kind of madness: but Ladies onely died not; for Sir John Hawkwood, whose cheualrie had made him renowned ouer the Christian world, did in this yeere depart an aged man out of this world in Florence, where his ashes remaine honoured at this present with a stately Tombe, and the statue of a Man at Armes, erected by the gratitude of that State and City, which chiefly by his conduct, courage and valour (so this day admired amongst them) was preferred. But

But the Duke of Lancaster having all things ready, sets sail to Burdeaux, there, with the content of the State to take possession of his lately granted Duchie.

(91) The King doth the like for Ireland, where that sort of the Irish which are called the wild, had greatly insulted the English Pale, and other good Subjects there, to the great damage of the Crown of England. In the times of Edward the third, Ireland yielded to the Kings coffers thirty thousand pounds yearly, but now things were so grown out of order, that it cost the King thirty thousand Marks by yeere. To reduce the rebellious, himselfe conducts thither an Armie, attended vpon by the Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of March, Nottingham and Rutland, all the Irish being commanded to auoid out of England. The terror of the preparations, & shining presence of a king (which about al worldly things is pleasant to the Irish) had such effects that sundry great men were compelled to submit themselves. To supply the Kings wants, growne in the Irish expedition, Edmund D. of York, the Kings vnckle, and Custos or Warden of England, called a Parliament at London (whither the Duke of Gloucester repaired to declare the Kings wants) and hath contributions granted. Neuertheless, so strong a party against the Clergy, & Fryars abuses of those times discovered it selfe therein, that the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, and others, prest out Sea to the King at Dublin, beseeching him to returne, the sooner to repress the Lollards (so called they the embracers of Wicliffes doctrine) and their fauourers, who fought not only as they vntruly pretended to wring away all the possessions of the Church, but that which was worse, to abrogate and destroy al Ecclesiasticall constitutions, whereas they aimed onely at the redresse of exorbitancy in the Papal Clergy. The King hereupon returns: by whose arriuall and authority, those consultations of the Laity were laid downe. Sir Richard Storie a seruant of his had been forward against the Prelates: of him therefore hee takes an oath vpon the holy Gospell, that he should not hold such opinions any longer. The Knight takes that oath, and we (saith the King) doe sweare, that if thou dost breake it, thou shalt die a most shameful death. The rest hearing the Lion roare so terribly, drew in their hornes, and would be seen no more.

(92) The King caused the body of the late Duke of Ireland to be brought into England. His exceeding loue to him was such, that he commanded the Cyprus cheit wherein his body lay embalmed, to be opened, that hee might see, view, handle, and openly expresse his affection. The dead remains of that noble young Gentleman, (by his birthright Earle of Oxford, and by race a Vere) were buried at the Priore of Coln in Essex, there being present the King himselfe, the Countesse Dowager of Oxford, the Dukes mother, the Archbishops of Canterbury with many Bishops, Abbots, and religious persons, but few of the Lords, for they had not as yet digested the hate they bare him.

(93) The Duke of Lancaster was this while in Aquitaine, where he had fought to winne the people with incredible largesse, to accept of his Soueraignty, according to the tenor of King Richards grant. Little did he then thinke, that within lesse then fixe score and three yeeres after, an Ambassador of King Henry the 3. should write thus of Burdeaux it selfe, the Capitall City of Gascoigne and Guien: Anglorum nullas ferè vestigia remanent. &c. There are (saith that learned Gentleman) scarce any foot-prints of the Englishmen remaining. In the Churches, and other places newly refreshed and redified, such Armories of the English as stood, were utterly blotted and defaced: yet in the Church of the Fryers Preachers, the Armories of the Duke of Lancaster stand entire in a Glasse-window, and in the oldest wall of the City those also of England, though consumed in a manner with age: The Lawes, Statutes and Ordinations which were made by the English, are notwithstanding obserued at this day. But the Dukes eye could not looke so farre into the times to come. Neuertheless wee that see these things must confesse, that the best kingdomes vnder heauen is not so worth the getting, as that with the willfull contempt of God and conscience any man should seeke to purchase it.

(94) But while the Duke was thus busied in Courting the Gascoignes good will, who had sent into England, to shew causes why they should not returne to the Duke, (and yet were wrought at last to the point of yielding, he receiues a commandement from King Richard to returne, that he might goe with him into France; which he obeyed. The King keeping his at Langley in Hertfordshire, the Duke was there entertained with more honour (as it was thought) then loue. Being licenced to depart for a time, he repaired to Lincolne, where he a widower, married his old loue the Lady Katherine Swinford, now a widow. Men did wonder at it, but hee therein obeyed the remorse of a Christian conscience, without respect to his owne vnequall greatnes; for hauing had sundry Children by her in his former wiues time, he made her and them now the only sufficient amends, which the law of God or man enioineth. And further in a Parliament held the yeere following, the Duke procured an Act to passe, by which, such children as hee formerly had by his new Dutchesse, were legitimated; and surnamed them Boufours, being foure of them John, Thomas, Henry, Iane; the second of which was by the Kings bounty created Earle of Sommerfet.

(95) The King, being specially accompanied with those his vnckles of Lancaster and Gloucester, at a most sumptuous and chargefull enteruiew between him and Charles King of France, in the parts of Calis and Gynes, espoused the Lady Isabell, daughter of the said Charles. At the deliury of her, King Richard, in the presence of all the greatest Princes, Peeres, and Ladies of either nation, gaue the King his father in law great thanks for a gift so noble and acceptable, adding, he tooke her vpon the conditions made betweene the two nations, to the intent that liuing in peace and rest, they might attaine to the establishment of a perpetual amitie, for auoyding the effusion of Christian blood, which would in likelihood haue followed, had not at that time amitie bene contracted betweene them. The young Lady was not aboute seuen or eight yeeres old, but the truce was taken for thirty yeeres. Her person therefore was committed to the Dutchesse of Lancaster and Gloucester, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Calis. From whence, after a short stay, the King, his young Queene (with whom he had great riches) and all the glorious companie came ouer into England. Their persons arriued safe, but the Kings gorgeous Pauilions, and a great part of his stuffe was cast away by tempest in the transportation. This iourney (besides his losses at Sea) cost the King about forty thousand marks.

(96) The outward felicity of England seemed at this time verie great, and the rather seemed so, because it was likelie to continue. In the Duke of Gloucesters perill that bright prosperity was first overshadowed. He, Vir ferocissimus & praecipitis ingenij (as Polydor censures him), a most ferce man, and of an headlong wit, thinking those times, wherein he had mastered the King, were nothing changed, though the King was about thirty yeeres old, forbore not roughly, nor so much to admonish, as to checke and schoole his Soueraigne. The peace with France displeased him, that therefore he calumniates. The King had restored Breist in Britaine to the Duke, vpon reburment of the money lent; he tels the King that hee should first conquer a Towne, before he parted with any; yet the King answered, that he could not in conscience detain the same, now that the Duke had repaid his loane. There were other things which could not so well be answered. For a vaine rumor * that he should be chosen Emperor, put him belike into such a vaine of spending, as carried a proportion with that maiesty, his coffers in a short time sounding like empty Caske, there was no great monied man in whole debt he was not, nor any in a manner so meane to whom hee was not burthenous.

(97) The King had heretofore complained of this vnckle to the Earle of Saint Paul a Frenchman, (then in England,) whose iudgement was, that such infolency was to be reuenged; but complaining to his other vnckles of Lancaster and York, they wisely aduised the King, not to regard his words but his heart, which he and they knew sincere vnto him. Neuertheless, partly to weaken the intollerable humor of his brother, who like a constant Admirer of his owne waies, thought nothing well done, but what himselfe either did or directed, and partly to auoid the scandall of the Kings bad courtes, they withdraw their preferences from the Court. The King notwithstanding is the same man still, as the Duke of Gloucester thinks; wherefore, he breakes his minde to such as he durst trust. Arundell in Suffex is appointed the Consulation-place, where he the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earles of Arundell, Warwick, Marshall and others, take an Oath of Secrecy, and conclude to raise a power to remoue the Dukes of Lancaster and York, and such other as they thought best from about the King, so to enact a reformation.

(98) They are charged by some to haue plotted the imprisonment of the King and Dukes, and the death of all other Councillours: which, howsoever it was perhaps no part of their intention, might yet haue bene a necesserie consequent. The blustering Duke had breathed out dangerous words, as, * that he would put the King (of whose courage he spake contemptible) into some prison there to spend his daies in ease and peace, as himselfe thought best. His brethren hearing hereof, brotherly admonish him to beware; but, as it seemes, they found him deafe on that side. This though some of the late Authors write, yet there are both * old and * new, who mention no such matter, but the contrary, not obscurely teaching vs, that the Dukes ruine was but an effect of old malignities.

(99) Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham and Marshall, a party in the reported plot, though sonne in law to the Earle of Arundell, recuileth the same to the King. The Duke of Gloucester is hereupon surprized by Mowbray * (lying in wait in the woods where hee was to passe) sent to Calis (where Nottingham was Captaine) and there imprisoned; the Earles of Arundell and Warwick, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheiney, are arrested. Proclamation is then made that they were not committed for anie old matters, but for heinous things newly contriued, as in the next Parliament should be made manifest; though the euent (as * Walsingham truly saith) declared the contrarie. But the Duke of Gloucester, and the two said Earles are ended at Nottingham. The King to maintaine the accusation of treason obiected, had (as some say) suborned Edward Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle Marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, John Holland Earle of Huntingdon; Thomas Beaufort Earle of Somerset, John Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer and Sir William Scrope Lord Chamberlaine.

tours to the King and his Realme and his people, by false imagination and compassing caused a Commission to be made, &c. and that the said Duke of Gloucester, and Earle of Arundell, did send a great man and Peere of the Realme in message to our Lord the King, who of their part said, that if he would not grant and assent to the said Commission, hee should be in great perill of his life: and so, as well the said Commission, as the said Statute touching the said Commission, were made by constraint, &c. Wherefore the Commons pray their Soueraigne Lord the King, that the said Commission &c. be utterly annulled, as a thing done TRAITEROUSLY, &c.

(101) The sanctuary of former lawes, and all particular Charters of pardon being now taken away from the Duke, Earle, and others, they lay open to manifest ruine. The Duke of Lancaster late in judgement as High Steward vpon Richard Earle of Arundell, where, for no other but for the old attempts, (though the other accusations seeme to haue been auerred by the eight appellants) by which, as ye haue heard, so many were displaced and put to death, hee adiudged him to die that foule death of a common Traitor: but the King satisfied himselfe with onely his head, which was at one stroke taken off at Tower-hill. That he was a traitour either in word or deede, he utterly did deny, and died in that deniall. The constancy of this Earles carriage as well at his arraignment, passage, and execution, (as in which he did not discoloure the honour of his blood with anie degenerate word, looke, or action) encreased the enuie of his death vpon the profecutors. The Earle of Warwick confessed with teares, (and as some say, drawne by faire hope of life) that in adhering to the Duke of Gloucester in those ridings and assemblies hee was guilty of treason. The same sentence was therefore pronounced vpon him. The King neuertheless did only banish him into the Ile of Man. But the Duke of Gloucester (whom, as the peoples darling, it seemed not late to bring to a publike trial) was secretly smothered at Calis with pillows and featherbeds.

(102) The great Parliament (for so it seemes to haue bene called, by reason of the extraordinary numbers of Peeres, and their retinues, which came thereunto) was holden by adiournment at Shrewsbury. In it, those iusticiars, who were partly put to death and partly banished, but all attained (at such time as the Duke of Gloucester and the rest were in armes,) doe all of them stand thereby cleared from dishonour, and such Articles as they subscribed, (being together with their answers, set downe in the Act) are publicly ratified, and the offenders against them pronounced Traitors. Amongst these Articles, one, containing these great Lawiers iudgements concerning the orderly proceedings in al Parliaments, is very obseruable: * That after the cause of such assembly is by the Kings commandement there declared, such Articles as by the King are limited for the Lords and Commons to proceed in, are first to be handled; but if any should proceed vpon other Articles, and refuse to proceed vpon those limited by the King, till the King had first answered their proposals, contrary to the Kings command, such doing herein contrary to the rule of the King, are to be punished as Traitors. But the King, to content all parts, and to kindle new lights in the place of such as he had extinguished, hauing first created himselfe * Prince of Chester, made his cosen Henry Earle of Derby, Duke of Hereford; the Earle of Rutland Duke of Aumaril; the Earle of Nottingham Duke of Norfolk; the Earle of Kent Duke of Surrey; the Earle of Huntingdon, Duke of Excester; the Earle of Somerset Marquess Dorset; the Lord Spencer Earle of Gloucester; the Lord Neulle Earle of Westmerland; William Scrope Earle of Wiltshire; Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester. The King also (saith Walsingham) added to his Scutcheon Royall, the armories of Saint Edward King and confessor.

(103) The formost in this goodly ranke, being Henry Duke of Hereford, not long after accused Thomas Duke of Norfolk, of certaine words founding to the kings dishonour, which hee should priuately utter to the said Henry. *Polydor (though very negligently hee makes Mowbray the Accuser, and Hereford Defendant) may yet be heard in reporting the effect of the words, as That King Richard held the Peeres of the land in no account, but as much as lay in him sought to destroy them, by banishing some, and putting others to death. That hee neuer troubled his mind with considering how his Dominions were diminished through his Idleness. Finally, that all things went to wracke, as well in peace as war. But the Duke of Norfolk, (who vnlesse it had bene to seele how the Duke of Herefords heart was affected to the king, had little reason so to complaine) most constantly denying that euer he spake such wordes; it should haue come to a combat within lists; but the king to auoid (as hee pretended) such deadly fedsaws might rise in the families of two such potent Peeres, but (indeed to be rid of an enemy with the losse of a friend) banished Norfolk for euer, and Hereford first for ten yeeres, then for fixe. Walsingham saith that this censure was giuen against Norfolk, vpon that very day in which the yeere before, he (by the kings commandement) had taken order for putting to death the Duke of Gloucester at Calis, whereof the said Duke of Norfolk had the Captainship.

(104) Fearefull were the tragedies which ensued these times; and heare now what is written of some Portents or wonders, presaging the same. The Bay or Laurell trees withered ouer all England, and afterward refluorished, contrary to many mens opinion; and vpon the first of January, neere Bedford towne, the river between the villages of Smelston and Harleswood where it was deepest, did vpon the sodaine stand still, and so diuided it selfe, that the bottome remained drie for about three miles space, which seemed (saith Walsingham) to portend that reuolt from the King, and the diuision which ensued.

(105) Roger Mortimer Earle of March, Lieutenant of Ireland, hauing in the yeere before, while he too much* trusted to his owne Forces, been slaine very many others, by *O-Brin, and the Irish of Leinster, at a place called Kenlis; King Richard determines in person to reuenge the blood of his Noble kinsman, being the man to whom hee meant the Crowne of England, if issue failed to himselfe. Hee remembered not how broken an estate hee had in England, where the peoples hearts were strongly alienated, not onely for the death of the late great Lords, and banishment of the Duke of Hereford, (whose calamitie increased his popularity) or for the like passed exasperations, but for that (to furnish his Irish voyage) he had extorted money on all hands, taking vp carriages, victuals, and other necessaries, without any recompence; whereby the hatred of his gouernment grew vniuersall.

(106) But the euill fortune which hung ouer his head, laid forth an alluring bait to haue his destruction, by occasion of the Duke of Lancasters decease, which hapned about Candlemas, and the absence of his banished sonne and heire Lord Henry. The king (most vniuersally) seizeth vpon the goods of that mighty Prince his vnkle, & as if all things now were lawfull, which but liked him, he determines to banish the new rightfull Duke of Lancaster Henrie, not for a few yeeres, but for euer; for which cause hee reuoked his Letters Patents granted to the said Henry, by which his Attornies were authorised to sue his Liniere (and to compound for the respit of his homage at a reasonable rate; whereby he made it seem plaine to the world, that hee had not banished him to auoid dissensions, but (as many said) to fill vp the breaches which his riote had made in the roiall treasures, with plentifull (though an vnclue) Exchange, as that of his decaied vnckles fortune.

(107) The one stedfast base and buttresse of all lawfull Empire, is Iustice; that supports the kinglike throne. This hee ouerthrew, and how then could himselfe hope to stand long? Hee lands at Waterford in Ireland with a Nauie of two hundred ships, hauing with him the sonne of the late Duke of Gloucester, and of the now Duke of Lancaster, to secure himselfe the rather. *His forces consisted much of Cheshire men. But that king is deceiued, who reposerh his safetie in violence. It was no great matter hee did there, that which fell out to be done elswhere, was great indeed. His warre in Ireland was more dammagefull, then fishing with an hooke of gold, for here the baite and hooke was not onely lost, but the line, rod, and himselfe, were drawne altogether into the depths of irreuerable ruine. Duke Henrie sees the aduantage which King Richard a bence gaue him, and vseth it. In his Companie were Thomas Arundel the banished Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and his Nephew the sonne and heire of the late Earle of Arundel, and notable fifteen Lanciers. His strength was (where the Kings should haue bene) in the peoples hearts. Neuertheless, the Duke did not sodainly take land, but houerred vpon the Seas, shewing himselfe to the Country people in one place now and then in another, pretending nothing but the recovery of his rightful Heritage.

(108) Edmund Duke of Yorke, whom King Richard had left behind him to gouerne England, hearing this, calls vnto him Edmund Stafford Bishoppe of Chichester, Lord Chancellor, the Earle of Wiltshire, Lord Treasurer, and the Knights of the Kings Councell, Bushie, Bagot, Greene, and Russell. Their conclusion was to leuie a force to impeach Duke Henries entrance. The assembly was appointed to bee at S. Albans, which came to worke then nothing, for the protestation that they would not hurt the Duke, whom they knew to bee wronged was generall. This made the Treasurer Sir John Bushie, and Sir Henrie Greene flie to the Castle of Bristol, Sir William Bagot to Chester, from whence he got shipping into Ireland. Meane while Duke Henrie lands at a village heretofore called Raueshure, to whom repaired Henrie Earle of Northumberland, his sonne Henry Lord Percie, lands at Nesill Earle of Westmerland, and many others, who (saith Walsingham) greatly feared King Richards tyrannic. With an Armie of about three score thousand (multitudes offering their seruice) they come to Bristol, besiege the Castell, take it, and in the same the foresaid Treasurer Bushie and Greene, whose heades (at the cries of the Commons) were the next day after their surrender leuered from their bodies.

(109) King Richard was in the City of Dublin, when these most heauie newes arriued. His courage which at no time seemed great, was shortly none at all. Somewhat must be done: hee leaues the sons of Duke Henrie, & of his vnckle of Gloucester (which hee retained as pledges for his owne indemnity) in the Castell of Trim, and returns himselfe into England, intending to encounter the Duke before his force should bee too much established. The great names which accompanied him, were his late noble Creatures, the young Dukes of Aumarie, Excester, and Surrey, the Bishops of London, Lincolne and Carleol, and many others. There had bene some more hope for vpholding his right, if hee had not made the world know, that tenneyers space was not able to burie in him the appetite of reuenge, which made many forget their owne loyalty to him, and the Crowne. Princes see in him the vse of obliuion: but some conscience of euill desertes seeming to haue taken from him all confidence, hee dismisseth his Armie, bidding his Steward Sir Thomas Percy & others to referre themselves for better dayes.

(110) His last refuge is in Parlee. For that cause there repaired to him, at the Castell of Conway in Northwales, (for thither he was now come) the late Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and the Earle of Northumberland at the Kings appointment: The sum of his demands were, that if hee and eight, whom he would name, might haue honourable allowance, with the assurance of a quiet priuate life, he would resigne his Crowne. This Northumberland did swear should be: whereupon he forthwith departs to the Castle of Flint in his company. After a short conference there had with the Duke, they all ride that night to the Castell of Chester, being attended by the Lancastrian Armie. If, to spare his peoples blood, he was contented so tamely to quit his royall right, his fact doth not onely not seeme excusable, but glorious; but men rather thinke that it was sloth, and a vaine trust in dissimulation, which his enemies had long since discovered in him, and for that cause, both held his amendment desperate, and ran themselves into these desperate Treasons.

(111) The King did put himselfe into the Dukes hands vpon the twentieth day of August, being but the forty and seventh from the Dukes first landing. From thence they trauell to London, where the King lodged in the Tower. Meane while writs of Summons are sent out in King Richards name, for a Parliament to bee holden at Westminster, Craftino Michaelis. The tragical forme of Resignation, you haue* had already in Edward the second, of whom this King is a Parallel. There are named to haue been present at this wofull ioyfull Act, Arundel Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Richard Scrope Archbishoppe of Yorke, John Bishoppe of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaster, (who in this serious play must seeme as if hee were but a looker on) the Earles of Northumberland, and Westmerland, the Lords Burnell, Barkeley, Ros, Willoughby, and Abergeuenie, the Abbot of Westminster, &c.

(112) In their presence Richard as yet a King, and in his Tower of London, but not otherwise then as a prisoner, reads the Instrument of his surrender, with a seeming chearefull countenance, as if he were glad the hower was come, in which hee might taste what it was to be a priuate man, and (hauing otherwise first done and said what then he could to put all right out of himselfe) subscribes it with his hand; but prays, that his Cousen the Duke of Lancaster might succede him in the regall gouernement, and in token that it was his desire (for he must seeme to desire what hee could not hinder) hee* plucked off his Signetring, and put it vpon the Dukes finger. Then did he constitute the Archbishoppe of Yorke, and Bishop of Hereford his Procurators, to declare to the whole Body of Parliament what he had done, & how willingly, where euerie one (except the loyal & magnanimous Bishop of Carleol) being particularly asked, did particularly accept of the resignation. Neuertheless, it was not thought inough to haue his Crowne, vnlesse they also published his shame. Thirty* and two Articles are therefore openly (but in his absence) read; of all which, it was said (for then men might say what they listed) that hee had confessed himselfe guilty. In the front was placed his abuse of the publike treasure, and vnworthy waste of the Crown-land, whereby he grew intolerably grievous to the Subiects. The particular causes of the Dukes of Gloucester and Lancaster, the Archbishop of Canterbury and Earle of Arundel filled sundry Articles. They charged him in the rest with dissimulation, falshood, losse of honour abroad in the world, extortions, rapine, deniall of Iustice, rasures, and embazzelling of Records, dishonourable shifts, wicked Axiomes of state, cruelty, couetousnesse, subordination, lasciuiousnesse, treason to the rights of the Crown, perjuries; & briefly with all sorts of vnkingly vices, and with absolute tyranny.

(113) We may be assured, that nothing could then be objected so vntrue or incredible, but would haue gone for current and vndenyable with affections so thoroughly prepared. Hereupon it was* concluded, that in all those thirty and two Articles, hee had broken the Oath of Empire taken at the Coronation,

& all the States of the Kingdom (strange that so many should so concur in dissolayty vnder pretence of equity) being asked what they thought; did hold that those causes seemed notorious, and sufficient to depose King Richard. Commissioners were therefore nominated by consent of the whole house, to pronounce the sentence of Deposition; which were, the Bishop of Asaph, the Abbot of Glastenbury, the Earle of Gloucester, the Lord Barkly, William Thyrning, Chief Iustice of the common Pleas, and some others. The forme of pronuntiation was, IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN. We thou Bishop of Saint Asaph, Iohn Abbat, &c. Commissioners specially chosen by the Lords spirituall and temporall of the Realme of England, and Commons of the said Realme, representing all the States of the said Realme, sitting in place of iudgement, &c.

(114) The definitiue sentence of Deposition giuen thus in open Parliament, there were further named certaine persons, amongst whom* William Thyrning Chief Iustice of the Common Pleas was thoght the fittest man, by whose lawlesse mouth that vniust doome should be deliuered to the King, and who on the behalfe of the Realme, should renounce to the said Richard the fealties and homages heretofore made vnto him, and to make relation of the whole manner and causes of their proceedings. The Regall seate was now reputed void; whereupon Duke Henrie riseth from his place, and stands vpright, that hee might be seene of the people, then* signing himselfe with the signe of the Crosse vpon the forehead and breast, and inuocating the name of Christ, hee challenged the Crown and Realm of England, with all the members and appurtenances. His words are said to be these.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaster, claime the Realme of England, and the Crowne, with all the appurtenances, as comming by the blood royall from King Henry, and by that iustice which God of his grace hath sent to me, by the helpe of my kinsfolke and friends, for recovery of the said Realme, which was in point of perdition, through default of Gouernment and breach of lawes.

(115) Which challenge and claime being thus made, all the States of the Kingdome doe with one consent grant, that the said Lord Duke should reigne ouer them. The Archbishop of Canterbury (brother to the late Earle of Arundel) takes him then by the right hand, and the Archbishop of Yorke (the late Earle of Wiltshires kinsman) being his assisstant, placeth him in the royall throne, with the generall acclamation and applauses of the people. Lastly, in full complement of the present solemnity, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury (that we may see how the Diuinity as well as the Law of those times were degenerated into temporizing Policeie) made a Sermon vpon these words in Samuel, A Man shall raigne ouer the People. By occasion whereof* hee described out of the holy Scriptures, the happinesse of that Kingdome which is gouerned by a man, and the infelicity of those Reaines where a Child (whether in age or discretion) weeldes the Scepter. The euill whereof as they had dangerously felt vnder the late King, so they hoped abundantly to enioy the other in King Henry. To all which the whole Auditorie ioyously answered Amen. Then rose the affable new Monarch, & among a few other words, hee gaue the world to vnderstand, that none should thinke hee would as by way of Conquest, dishonour any man, certaine bad members onely excepted.

(116) From henceforth hee was taken for King, and all Writs issued, and went forth in his name; which disorderly matters being orderly related to the deposed Prince in the Tower, by Thyrning the Chief Iustice, hee onely vsed these wordes; I hat hee looked not after such things, but (quoth he) my hope is, that (after all this) my Cousen will bee my good Lord and friend. The Archbishop (otherwhile inexcusable in those proceedings) yet in his said Sermon seemeth grauely gracely and truly to haue described the cause of this effect: for (quoth hee) the child or insipient (which are with him equiparable) drinke the sweet and delicious words vnadvisedly, and perceiue not intoxication, which they beeing mingled with, till hee be enuironed and wrapped in all danger, as lately the experience thereof hath bene apparant to all our fights and knowledges, and not without the great danger of all this Realme. Being thus brought downe to the show, and little-ness of a priuate man, we leaue him to draw his comfort out of holy meditations, as one whose violent death ensued before long, and turne ouer to his politike and martiall Successor.

(117) Yet in our way, wee may not quite outpasse a cursory consideration of the affaires of the Church vnder this King, which, for auoiding often interruptions of other argument, we haue put off to this last place. For albeit the Kingdome indured great crosses in the affaires of State, yet * some haue thought, that it found as great blessings in matters of religion, which in those daies tooke so deepe root in this our land, by the preaching of John Wicliffe, that the branches thereof did spread themselves euery ouer the Seas: Nor were the common people only allured with his doctrine, (though the * Londoners fauouring of him is thought by Walsingham to haue deterred the Prelates from proceeding against him, and a scholler of his in Leicester-shire, is said to haue drawn by his preaching, * all the Laymen in that Countrey) but (as the same Authour reporteth) sundrie of the Fryars themselves fell to him and embraced his opinions, amongst whom one * being also the Popes Chap-laine, so discovered by preaching the murders, luxuries and treasons of Fryars of his owne Habit, that the common people were astounded with the horror thereof, and cried out to haue them all utterly destroyed; which his accusations he particularly iustified by publike writing, professing he came forth of that Order, as out of the Diuels nest. But that which Walsingham much more * admires, is, that Wicliffes opinions were not onlie enterained in ordinary Cities, but euen in the Vniuersity of Oxford it selfe, where was * the very top of wisdom and learning: and where not only two Chan-cancellors successiuelly, * Doctor Nicholas Hereford, and * Robert Ruge were most earnest maintainers of Wicliffes doctrine, but also, when the pope (to sup-press the same doctrine) sent his * Bull to the Vniuersity threatening the priuation of all their priuileges, the *Pro-ctors and Regents thereof were very doubtfull, whether they should receive the Popes Bull with honour, or rather reiect it with open disgrace. Yea, the whole body of that glorious Vniuersitie (as the Pope there calls it in his Bull) gaue a glorious * Testimony (vnder their publike seale) of Wicliffes religious life, profound learning, orthodox opinions, exquisite writings, all farthest from any stain of heresie.*

(118) And therefore no maruile, if not onely the Duke of Lancaster, with sundry Peeres and great ones, but King Edward 3. himselfe, were (as Capgrave testifieth) a fauourer of him, and * King Richard 3. and the whole Parliament did (according to his instructions) much labour to abrogate the Popes Transcen-dent power, which was a principall cause of the Popes hatred against him. Notwithstanding to dis-countenance the truth which he taught, in defence of Regall Supremacy against Papall usurpation, (as also against the Mass, Transubstantiation, Admiral; against Adoration of the Host, of Saints, Images, and Reliques; against Fryarly Orders, Pilgrimages, Indulgences;) many lewd opinions by misconstruction (as his bookes * yet extant, cuince) are fathered on him, yea some so monstrous and diabolical (as, * that Men ought, yea, * that God himselfe ought, to obay the Diuel) that that any man which heareth them, will presently be-lieue (without further perswasion) that they are but malicious figments. This famous Doctor * dying of a palsey, hath this charitable Enloge or Epitaph be-stowed on him by a * Monke, The Diuels Instrument, Churches Enemy, Peoples Confusion, Heretikes Idole, *Hy-pocrites mirrour, Schismes broncher, hatreds sower, lies forger, Flatteries sincke; who, at his death dispaired like Cain, and stricken by the horrible iudgement of God: *brea-thed forth his wicked soule to the darke mansion * of the blacke diuel: Whereby, Gods best children may learne, not to regard, whiles they liue, the malice of the wicked, nor to respect after their death ought else but their slanderous rancor. And thus we con-clude the raigne, though not the life of King Richard:

His first wife.

(119) The first wife of King Richard the second, was Anne, daughter vnto the Emperour Charles the fourth, and sister to Venceslaus Emperour, and King of Bohemia, who was crowned Queene the 22. of I-anuary 1384. What be-came of this young Ladie, we shall further see in the ensuing storie.

CHAPTER XIIII.

ENRIE of that name the fourth, hauing thus obtained the title of king, in full accomplishment of all rites peculiar to Maie-ty, had the Crowne of England set vpon his head, with all worldly magnifi-cence and honour at *West-*minster, by Thomas *Arun-*del Archbishoppe of Canterbury, vpon the * selfe day twelue moneth, in which hee had formerly bene banished vnder Richard the second. Power and fa-uour can set up and maintaine a King, though they can-not create aright: But such transcendent courtes de-uatiating from all due regulation of iustice, haue been too frequent in this Kingdome. What right had William surnamed the Conquerour? what right, (we speake of a right of Equity,) had his sonnes William the second, and Henry the first, while their elder brother liued? what right had that valiant and princely Stephen? what was the interest of Henry the second, during the life of his mother Matilda? or that of King John, till his Nephew Arthur Duke of Britaine died? yea, or that of Henry the third, till Arthurs sister died in her prison at Bristol? Howbe-it, in this present case, not only Richard the late king, but the house of Mortimer, claiming from the on-ly daughter and heire of Lionel Duke of Clarence (an elder brother of John D. of Lancaster) doubly might haue withstood the legall challenge of this Prince? That obstacle which grew by Richard, was in appa-rance great, but the other was onely dangerous. Richard had no issue but the line of Mortimer (en-grafted by marriage into the house of Yorke) feeling it selfe vnable to preuaile, and during Richards life time, hauing no right, secretly fostered in it selfe those fires, which afterward brake forth, and taking hold of the roofo-tops of both the royall houses, ne-uer left burning, till no one principall timber was vnconsumed in either, all the Male-Issues which could claime by a direct line, vterlic leapt downe thousand friends at Pomfret; they proceed to Wallingford, then to Abingdon, and so to Cirester. The rumors vied by them to encrease their numbers were; that Henry of Lancaster (meaning the King) was fled with his sonnes and friends to the Tower of London, and that King Richard was escaped. Maudenall, one of Richards Chaplains, took upon him the person of his said Lord, the more strongly to seduce the multitude, by so bold and perilous a fiction. Thus seemed they to fit their words and fute their Arts to the place. At Sunning, Richard (they said) was at Pomfret, for there the guile had beene transparent; but at Cirester, Richard was not at Pomfret, but present.

(17) Howbeit the successe was not answerable to the deute; for, besides that King Henry was in the heart of his strengths at London, where sixe thousand men were put into areadines, and would come upon them like a storme, the Townesmen of Cirester assailed the Lords, tooke them, and (because their Town was fired of purpose by some of their followers, the better to recover them while the quenching found the people employment, shaled them forth, and without longer tarrance secured their heads from their bodies: The Earle of Huntington, with a trustie Knight of his, Sir John Shewe, hauing (after the faile at Windfore) in vaine attempted to escape by Sea, was taken by the Commons at Pitvel (perhaps Pittlevell) in Essex, brought first to Chelmsford, and lastlie to Plesbie, the house of the late Duke of Glocester (whose Ghost a tragical Poet would suppose did haunt his persecutors for reuenge, where, partlie also by this Earles infatigation, the said Glocester was first arrested. The Commons (out of whose hearts the image of that Duke was not vanished) at the Countesse of Hereford infatigation who was the Dukes widow, tooke satisfaction vpon the Earle, with the echeate of his head, which there was funded from his shoulders. The Lord Spencer called Earle of Glocester (one of the Conspirators) had like execution done vpon him by the Commons at Bristol. Some other of them were put to death at Oxford, and some at London; where John Mauden (the Counterfeit Richard, who as it seemes was a beautiful and goodlie person) and one William Ferby were drawne, hanged and headed. The Bishop of Carleol neuertheless was by the Kings clemencie preferred aliae after the condemnatory sentence. There were nineteen in all (whereof two had bene Dukes) put to death for this conspiracy, most of which were men of speciall note.

(18) The designes and misfortunes of King Richards friends being made known vnto him, could not but worke strongly in a foule opprest with griefe; but whether to strongly as to make him resolute by voluntary abstinence to starue himselfe (as the fame went) may be doubted, though it be past doubt that King Henry was not forrie hee was dead howsoever. That he was starued seemes verie plaine; though, as it is not certaine, (neither yet vnlikely) that King Henry was priuie to so foule a parricide, so neither is it knowne, but that Richard might as well be starued of purpose, as starue himselfe. Master Stow (a man for honest industry very praiseworthy) saith that King Richard was fiftene daies and nights together kept in hunger, thirst, and cold, till hee died. How true that was in the circumstance, who knows? but in the point of staruing hee is clearely with Walsingham: and a Knight liuing about those times calleth it a death neuer before that time knowne in England. Harding also, liuing vnder King Edward the fourth, agrees of the rumour of staruing. Master Camden saith of Pomfret Castle, that it is a place principall cede of sanguine infamie, but seemes to insinuate, that some other torments were most wickedly practised vpon this King, as made out of the way with hunger, cold, and vntoward of torments. Polydore therefore may in this be beleued, who writes of this poore depoued Monarke, that, (which may well be called vntoward of torments) his diet being serued in, and set before him in the wonted Princely manner, he was not suffered either to taste, or touch thereof. Idle therefore seemes * his dreame, who writes hee was murdered in the Tower, and not more credible * theirs, who tell vs of Sir Peirs of Exton assaule, and the murder basely by him acted vpon this most miserable Princes person: but much more are * they to blame who negligently for credit of the fable quote Walsingham, in whom no syllable of such a thing is found. Onely * Hector Boetius will vs to believe that Richard fled disguised into Scotland, was discovered to King Robert, and honourably entertained, but Richard who would no more of the world, gaue himselfe wholly to contemplation, and both liued, died, and was buried at Strineling. Which fond fable hath neuertheless somewhat in it, for that some personated Richard might so doe is neither impossible, nor improbable, and indeed it was so.

(19) The late King Richard thus cruelly and heinouly murdered (for in regard of pining death the seeming fable of his fight with Sir Peirs of Exton was a sport, it being both noble and full of comfort, for a man of honour and courage to die with weapon in hand) King Henry causeth his dead body to be brought vp to London. O Henry, if thou wert Author, or but priuie, (though for thine owne pretended safetie, and for that errors cause which is lewdly mis-called reason of state) of such a murder; we doe not see, how the shewing of the people his vncovered face in Pauls, did either conceale or extenuate the execrable crime. But to let the world know that there was no hope nor place for a Richard, that course was vied, which may the rather confirme the truth of his enfamishment: for a violent death by braining could not but deforme him too much: and it is most probable that such a death would be fought, as might least appeare. Surely he is not a man, who at the report of so exquisite a barbarisme, as Richards enfamishment, feels not chilling horror and detestation; what if but for a iustly condemned galley-slave so dying? but how for an anointed King, whose Character (like that of holy Orders) is indeleble? The tragical spectacle of his dead body (perhaps because it moued too much both pittie and enuie) was after a while transported without honor to Langley in Hartfordshire, where the last rites were performed by the Bishop of Chester, the Abbots of S. Alban and Waltham, but neither King Henry present, (as at the exequies in London) and the great Lords and such other as were had * not so much as a funerall feast bestowed on them for their labour. But Henry the fifth, in the first * yeere of his raigne with great honour did afterward cause those royall remaines to be interred in the Sepulture of his Ancestors at Westminster. Among the riming Latine verses of his Epitaph, ye may maruell to reade these, considering vpon what points he was tried out of Maiestie and State;

Ecclesiam suauit elatos suppeditauit, Quemuis prostravit, regalia qui violauit.

Fabians English of them.

The Church he sauoured, casting the proud to ground, And all that would his roiall State confound.

The said Author therefore Robert Fabian, obseruing the scope of those lines (to dampe their force) doth vnderwrite and annex this Stanza, with much greater discretion then elegancie:

*But yet alas, though that this meeter or rime, Thus doth embellish this noble Princes fame,
And that some Clerke which sauoured him sometime, List by his cunning thus to enhance his name, Yet by his Story appeareth in him some blame: Wherefore to Princes is surest memory, Their liues to exercise in vertuous constancie.*

More

More tart and seuer is the censure of Gower vpon this Prince, one of whose verses * Stow giues vs thus,

So God doth hate such rulers as here viciously do liue.

That beautiful picture of a King fighting, crowned in a chaire of estate, at the vpper end of the Quier in Saint Peters at Westminster, is said to be of him, which witnesseth how goodly a creature he was in outward lineaments.

(20) King Henry to diuert the humors and eyes of the people from the remembrance of this Tragedie, prepareth now a puillance, therewith to invade Scotland; some subiects whereof, together with their Admirall Sir Robert Logon a Scottish Knight, were taken at Sea by certaine English ships. But K. Henry may seeme to haue done any thing rather, then to haue made a warre; for albeit hee did some hurt by * waiting the Country, yet did not the Scots offer battel, and the rest will we appear in these words of * Boetius. He did small iniuries to the people thereof: for he desired nought but his banner to be erected on their walls. He was ever a pleasant enemy, and did great humanity to the people in all places of Scotland where he was lodged. Finally, hee shewed to the Lords of Scotland, that hee came into their Realme rather by counsell of his Nobles, then for any hatred he bare to Scots. Soone after hee returned into England. Whether the remembrance of the curtesies shewed to his Father Duke John, or the feare of his owne great state so neere to an ouerthrow by the late furious conspiracy, wrought these gentle effects, it was not long before the euent shewed, that his prouidence in not creating new acerbities was therein needfull.

(21) For albeit the face of England seemed smooth, yet God thrust a thorne into King Henries side, when and where hee little expected; for the Welsh, whom former Kings of England had so yoked, and subiected, did contrary to all mens expectation, breake forth into open acts of hostility, vnder the conduct of a Gentleman of that Nation surnamed Glendowr, of the Lordship of Glendowr in Merionethshire, whose owner he was; the wrath and iustice of heauen is alwayes so well furnished with meanes to exercise the mightiest, those chiefly at whose amendment God aims by chastisement. The original of so great an euill was in the seed but little, as * but this: Owen Glendowr, * whom the Welsh call the sonne of Gruffith ap Iechan, descended of a yonger son of Gruffith ap Iechan, Lord of Bromfield, was at first a Student of the common laws, and an Vtter Barister, (but not therefore an apprentice of law, as Doctor Powell mistakes, for an apprentice of the law, is hee that hath beene a double Reader) did afterward serue the late King Richard in place of an Esquier, & was well beloued of him, but in King Henries time (retiring himselfe as it seemes to his Mannour of Glendowr, the L. Gray of Ruthen entred vpon a peece of common, which lay betwene Ruthen and Glendowr, which Owen (despite the Lord Gray while Richard continued King) had formerly holden, though not without contention. Owen (a man of high courage, and impatient of force) armes hereupon, and encounters the Lord Gray in the field, where he scattered the said Lords people, and tooke him prisoner, as hereafter will eue where be touched.

(22) It seemes herein that hee had forgotten the lawes which hee had formerly studied, and wherein hee had beene a licentiate; for shortly after as hee had troden law vnder foot, so did hee also cast off loyalty, burning & destroying the Lord Grays inheritances, and killing sundry his seruants. The King aduertised hereof, passed with an Army into Wales, burnes, kils, and takes such reuenge as that time would permit. Meanewhile, Owen (whom pride & folly arroued to the farther ruine of his Country) with his trustiest friends (which were not few) withdrawes into the inextinguishable fastnesses of Snowdon, where during this tempest, he kept his head safe. Shortly after the King with such riches and spoiles as those Parts had afforded, returns, His next most noted action was peaceable. For one of the house of Falke-lagus, and Emperour of Constantinople, came into England to pray some succour against the Turke, and vpon the day of S. Thomas the Apostle, was met at Blackheath by King Henry, highly feasted, richly presented, and his charges borne till departure. But as Tillem * saith of his successe in France, verbis ob promissu tantum adiutus est, so here his speed was not much better, the point of armed aides, being only therein assited with words and promises.

(23) In a Parliament held the next yeere, * by reason of the numbers of Lolards, (so called) encreasing, the punishment for them enacted, was burning. And in the same yeere also, the Articles of peace being first agreed vpon betwene the two Nations, English and French (notwithstanding that they had denied to match with the young Prince of Wales, * because the former marriage with Richard thrived so badly) the Lady Isabel who had bene crowned Queene of England, as Spouse of the late King, was now sent backe into France after a most princely manner, being not as yet * twelue yeeres old, had * no dowrie allowed her in England, for that the marriage was neuer consummated. Before shee was restored to her friends, the Lord Henry Percy, before the Ambassadors of both the Nations, where they were met betwene Caleis and Boulogne, protested, That the King of England his Master had sent her to be delivered to her Father cleare of all bonds of marriage, or otherwife, and that hee would take it vpon his soule, that shee was found and entire, euen as shee was the same day shee was delivered to King Richard, and if any would saye the contrary hee was ready to proue it against him by combat. But the Earle of Saint Paul saying, hee beleued it to be true, the Lord Percie took her by the hand, and deliuered her vnto the Earle, and then the Commissioners of France deliuered certaine letters of receipt and acquittal. She was afterward married to Charles Duke of Orleans.

(25) This appeares that the splendore of his new regality had drawne vp many thicke and poisonous cloudes of enuie and practise, to darken if it were possible the farther brightnesse thereof. Neither was it long before it grew to some extremity. For Owen Glendowr vpon the causes before said, waisting the Lord Reynald Grays lands, was encountered by him, as presuming that Owen and his friends might easily be overcome, but the contrary hapned, for there in fight hee lost very many of his companie, and was himselfe taken Prisoner. This fortune made the swelling mind of Owen ourflow in vaine hopes, who compelling the said Lord to marry his daughter, yet obtained hee not his liberty the sooner, but died (say * some) in the power of Owen, if perhaps our Author mistake not the Lord Gray for Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, who indeed did marrie so after hee was also ouerthrowne by the said Owen with the slaughter of about a thousand principall persons of Herefordshire, assembled vnder his conduct, to resist the Welsh inuasions, and there also himselfe was by trecherie taken prisoner.

(26) Walsingham doth * write, that about this time sundrie conspiracies were discovered in the yolke (as it were) or embrown; the whole hopes whereof rested vpon calumnies, and forgery, for

Turks neglected

by the first they traduced (in libels) Henries actions, so to make him hateful, and by the second they divulged that Richard was still alive, thereby to raise an head of separation. Henry thus galled in his honour, and endangered in the main, resolved to spare none, upon whom the crime or concealment was found. The first of them that fell vnder his iustice, was a Priest of Ware, with whom was taken a list, or roll of names which hee had gathered, supposing them such as in regard of benefices received, would live and die for King Richard, which vanitie of his created trouble to many, till it appeared that he had therein wronged them, as persons who were vnder ignorant both of the man and matter. Whereupon hee was drawne and hanged. The like fate had Water Baldoche Prior of Lawnd, who confessed that he had concealed others counsels against the King, though himselfe had acted nothing. A Frier Minor also being taken with some other of his Order for like intendments, was asked, what hee would doe if King Richard were alive and present? hee confidently answered, that hee would fight for him till death against any who soeuer, which cost him his life, being drawn and hanged in his Fryars weeds. Neither did this hard fortune fall onely upon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Claringdon Knight, (reputed the base sonne of Edward, late Prince of Wales) together with an Esquier and servant of his, finished the affection which they bare to the deceased Richard by hanging. Not long after eight Franciscan Fryars, or Minorites were taken, conspired, hanged, and headed for the like causes, which made the King an heavy Lord to that whole Order. It is said that somewhat before this knot was discovered the duell appeared in the habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church in Essex, to the incredible astonishment of the parishioners; for, at the same time there was such a Tempest & thunder with great fireballs of lightning, that the vault of the church brake, and halfe the Chancel was carried away.

(27) But how fouler these out-branches were pared away, the rootes of all the practise lay deeper out of sight, for the Percies, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Worcester, and Henric Hotspur Lord Percy, because perhaps they thought they had done wickedly, in helping to set up Henry, beganne to imagine that bloody mischief, which afterward was prosecuted. This malice, the late successe of Owen Glendowr against the Lord Mortimer Earle of March, (taken prisoner, as is said, with no little slaughter of his Herefordshire men) did perhaps nourish; for that hee saw an enemy appeare, who was not unlikely to proue an able member of a greater rebellion. Certainly the King hauing in September led an Armie into Wales to take reuenge vpon his Rebels was in great danger to haue perished with sodaine stormes and raines, the like whereof none of his people had euer felt or scene, so that after he had done some waits vpon the Country hee returned. The common fame went that Owen was a Coniurer, and had raised those hideous tempests by hellish arts; they seemed to excusise, which (whether true or false) did yet impart no little strength to the Welsh faction.

(28) The Kings fortune was happier in the North, where his Lieutenants had two faire victories, the one at Nisbet, and the other at Halidowne-hill, neere to a village called Waller. And although the first was not a small one, yet the other deferred the name of a iust battell and garland. To the Scots, hauing with about ten thousand men (vnder conduct of Archibald Earle of Douglas, whom the Scots nick-named Tyne-man, because he neuer wanne field, though no sort of true manhood was wanting in his person) made great spoiles in England as farre as to Newcastle, and were now vpon returne; Henric Percy Earle of Northumberland, the noble Henry Hotspur Lord Percie his sonne, and George Earle of Dunbar (who fled as you haue heard out of Scotland) with the forces of the Countries there about, not meaning to let them to passe in so slight a sort, opposed themselves. The chiefe feat was wrought by the English Archers, who first with their stiffe, clofe, and cruell stormes of arrowes made their enemies footmen breake, and when the noble Douglas defended to the charge with his choicest bands, himselfe being in a most rich, and excellently tempered armour, and the rest singularly well appointed, the Lord Percie Archers making a retreat, did withall deliuer their deadly arrowes, tam vnde, tam animose, tam grauitate (saith our Monke) so liuely, so courageously, so grievously, that they ranne through the men of Armes, boored the helmets, pierced their very words, beate their lances to the earth, and easily flue those who were more slightly armed through and through. There were taken prisoners the Earle of Douglas himselfe, (who notwithstanding his armour of the best proote, had fene wounds, and lost an eye.) Murdake Stewart Earle of Fife (eldest sonne to Robert Duke of Albanie), George Earle of Angus, the Earles of Murray and Orkney, the Lords Montgomerie, Erskin, and Grane, with about fourscore Knights, besides Esquiers and Gentlemen. There were slaine the Lords Gowdon, and Smytoun (belidens Berius calls them Knights) with fundrie other men of honour and marke, beside store of common soldiers. Theriuer Tweed, to shew it selfe meere English, did likewise fight for them by swallowing about five hundred in his vnknown depths, as they, who fled from the battell, fought to passe. This victory hapned vpon Halidown in harvest. The troubles which afterward hapned, did not onely hinder the Lord Percie from farther prosecution of such a victory, but eclipsed the honour hee had gotten now, and gaue his dayes a bloody & soole Castrophe.

(29) The Lord Edmund Mortimer Earle of March next general heire in blood to the Crowne of England after the death of Richard the second, hauing through feare of Owen (whose prisoner hee was) or hope of recouering his right, or for reuenge (because the King did not ransom him, married Owens daughter, by which hee must necessarily declare him selfe an enemy to King Henric), entertained intelligence with his neere kinsmen the Percies, and sundry other his friends in Cheshire, and elsewhere, to what purpose will shortly appeare. The night in which this Lord Mortimer (though some referre it to Owens birth) was born, all the horses in his fathers stable, are said to haue bin found standing belly-deep in blood. A fearefull prodigie, as euen then it seemed, but verified afterward in the farre more fearefull euents, when (vpon the quarrell of Mortimers title, by which the house of York claimed,) the horses of warre did not onely stand belly-deepe in blood, but also swam therein. The mischief was already begun: for Henry Earle of Northumberland (when now his owne and his houses strengths were mightily encreased by this late victory against the Scots, which he vnder-hand seemed to haue conuerted to his secret priuate ends,) closely animated his brother the Earle of Worcester, and his fiery spirited son, against the King, to both their confusions.

(30) The King tooke to wife the Lady Jane of Nauarre, widow of John de Montfort Duke of Brittaine named the Conquerour (*who died the yeere before) by whom she had issue both sons and daughters, but by the King none. He met, and married her at Winchester, and crowned her Queene at Westminster. The King was not trusted with the custody of any her three sonnes, John, Richard & Arthur, who remained in France.

(31) Euents are the best interpreters of prophesies and prodigies. Strange was that which Walsingham hath written of a tall Spectrum or Apparition in the summer time betwene Bedford and Bickleswade, where sundry monstres of diuers colours, in the shapes of armed men were often scene to issue out of the woods at morning and at noones, which to such as stood farre off seemed to encounter one one the other in most terrible manner, but when they drew neere, nothing was to be found. Of another nature were the fiery attempts of the Percies. The first of them who discovered in armes his mortal hatred, was the noble Hotspur, who (vnder colour of the Scottish warre) made head about Chester and the marches of Wales. To him (by the priuie of Hotspur father,) repaires the naughtie old man the Earle of Worcester, leaving the young Prince of Wales and the Princes household, ouerboth which (for their better Government) the King had placed him. Better was the torch of warre lighted vpon, and began to blaze, for though the chiefe plot-master the Earle of Northumberland was not ioined to them, as hee did intend, yet were their numbers growne mightily, with which they meant to enter the Towne of Shrewsbury, to make thereof a Seat of warre.

(32) Colourable causes of their armes were the ordinarie paintings of the like attempts. Care of common-wealths reformation, and their owne fancies; for hauing first protested their intentions not to be the breach of loyalty, they pretend and by letters sent about, doe signifie. 1. That the publick monie was not employed vpon the pretended defence of the kingdom, but vnduly wasted. 2. That by reason of bad tongues about the King they durst not approach him, to declare their innocency, vnlesse the Prelates and Peeres of the Realme did first intercede for them. 3. That they tooke armes onely to guard their owne heads, and to see the Kingdom better gouerned. These Articles had the place of the Huske, but the kernell of the enterprise had principallie these. 1. To thrust King Henry out of his seat, and consequently to deprive him of life. 2. To advance the title of the Lord Mortimer Earle of March their nextest Alie: for the Earle of Northumberland had married Elizabeth the daughter of the Lord Edmund Mortimer the elder, Earle of March, by Philip daughter to Lionel Duke of Clarence. 3. To take reuenge of King Henry, for seeking to drawe the chiefe benefit to himselfe of the victory at Halidowne hill, whose principall prisoners he required, and for such other priuate grudges. 4. To share the Kingdom betwene Mortimer, Percie and Owen Glendower. Concerning which partition it is in some found written, that Indentures tripartite were sealed, showing that South-England should remaine to Mortimer, North-England to Percie, and Wales beyond Seuern to Glendower. But Archibald Earle of Douglas (who did his Country good seruice by making one in our Combustions,) by common consent was allowed for his share to be free from ranlome, and to haue Berwick.

(33) This (in our English Adages) is called to reckon without our host, or to count our chickens before they are hatched. But though at this time God would haue it so, yet who doth not easily see what a wild horse a kingdom (so gotten) is, and how hard to fet, and not to manage onlie? Yet it seemed, that if Mortimer, hauing to iust a title to the Crowne, had openlie professed the cause of his attempt against King Henry, it might iustlie haue beene exempted from all stain of disability. But this partition is *said to haue beene wisely built vpon a found Welsh prophesie of Merlins: as if King Henry were the Awildwarpe cursed of Gods owne mouth, and Mortimer, Percie and Glendower the Dragon, Lyon, and Wolfe, which should diuide this Realme betwene them. Surely the Welsh hauing any hand in such a partition, it is not likelie they could thinke it had the right seete, if it stood not vpon the supposed Merlins his ridiculous cofenages and riddles. The English (not to be behind in leaings,) doe in the meane time euery where spread that Richard was safe alive and in the Castle of Chester. Who can wonder that this name should be so grating, as if alone it were enough to haue shaken Henry out of his State? when Nero himselfe had so many favorites, that twenty yeeres after his death an obscure fellow faining himselfe Nero, was so backt and countenanced by the Parthians, and others, * that not without much difficulty the Romans could get him into their hands.

(34) On the other side King Henry assailed with so vnexpected ieopardies, defends his cause by letters, and strongly puts the blame vpon the accusers, laying, That hee marvelled exceedingly, seeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his Sonne had the greatest part of the publick monies delivered to them, for defence of the borders against Scotland, why they should make that a quarrell, which was a meere calumnie. And to take away all pretence of feare from the Conspirators, hee sends to the Earles of Northumberland and Worcester, and to the hot Lord Percie, a safe conduct vnder his roiall Seale, by which he secures their access, but vnbridled rashnesse (saith Walsingham) despising the roiall clemencie, did put on the rigour of rebellion. Meane while the King armes with all speed against the enemy, the rather at the counsell of George Earle of Dunbar, who (like a valiant man at Armes, and a wise friend) aduised him so to doe, before their aduersaries numbers were too mightily augmented. The King with his sonne the young Prince of Wales, and a very noble fellowship, was now aduanced within sight of Shrewsbury, as the gallant Percie stood ready to assault the Towne. But so soone as the roiall Standard was discovered, that enterprise was left off, and he drew out his people (being about foureteen thousand choice and hardie bodies of men) to try the fortune of war against a well tride warior.

(35) Peace notwithstanding (by the exceeding tenderness of the King) had ensued, but that the milcheccuous Earle of Worcester, by misreporting and falsifying his Soueraignes words, did precipitate his Nephew into sudden battell. If there were any praise or good example to bee drawne out of so detected bloodshed, as that of ciuill warre, we would willingly describe vnto you the order and actions, but we cannot too soone passe ouer such mournfull obiects, which are rather to be celebrated with teares then triumphes. There is no doubt but Percie, Douglas, and the rest fought terrible. Why should we admire that in them? So doe Lyons, Tygers, & Bears, and yet wee admire them not. Where was dutie, where conscience, where the other respects, of which onely we are called men? Let none of vs honour, or imitate them, in whose eyes the price of English blood is so vile, as that (for priuate families) they can be content to confound all regards, and make sport for common foes, with mutual massacres. Therefore wee will content our selues with the knowledge of Gods part in this daies worke, who gaue the garland to the King, though the first arrowes flew from the Percies Archers.

(36) The Kings courage was not small in the fight as neither was the danger, the young Prince of Wales also (being then first to enter himselfe into the schoole of blood and battell,) gaue no small hopes of that perfection which afterward shone in him, being wounded with an arrow in the face. The Lord Percy and Earle Douglas (then * whom the wide world had not two brauer Champions) in feed of spending themselves vpon the multitude, set the point of their hopes vpon killing the King, as in whose person they were sure ten thousand fell. For this cause they most furiously rushed forward with speares and swords; but the noble Earle of Dunbarre, discouraging their purpose, drew the King from the place which he had chosen to make good, and thereby in likelihood for that present saued his life, for the Standard royall was ouerthrowne, and (among other valiant men) the * Earle of Stafford, Sir Walter Blunt, the Kinges Knight and the Standard-bearer himselfe was slaine, such was the fury of these sodaine thunderbolts. That day the Douglas flew with his owne hands three in the Kings Coat-armour, (perhaps some in Heralds Coats) though * Beetius yet saw a fourth. Sure it is, that manie of the subjects thought the King was slaine, and not a few * ranne out out of the field. Who notwithstanding, like a valiant Prince, did reinforce the fight, performing marvellous in arms with his own hands. The slaughter could not be small on both sides, the Archers shooting so continually, and the men of arms doing their utmost for about the space of three whole hours.

(37) That which gave an end to this wofull worke was the death of Hofpur, who riding in the head of the battell in defiance of danger and death, was (by an unknown hand) suddenly killed, with whose fall (as if his whole army had had but one heart) the courages of all others fell into feete, which now altogether they trusted to. But the King abhorring to make farther execution of the misguided multitude, suffered them to shift for themselves. The Earles of Worcester and Douglas, Sir Richard Vernon, the Baron of Kindallston, and diuers others were taken. Of the Kings side was slain (besides the Earle of Stafford) ten new Knights, whose names (as dying in an honest cause) deserve immortality, and were Sir Hugh Shorly, Sir John Clifton, Sir John Cokain, Sir Nicholas Gausell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Caluery, Sir John Mafie, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Robert Gausell, and Sir Thomas Wendesley, who dyed of his hurts not long after, as most of the other did about the Standard, all which fighting for their spurs, (as being knighted but that morning) bought them with the honourable losse of their whole bodies; there were also slain many Eſquires, & Gentlemen, and about one thousand and five hundred common ſouldiers, besides three thousand forely wounded. On the other part, (omitting that second Mars, the Lord Percy (who drew a ruine after him ſutable to his Spirit and greatneſſe) there fell most of all the Eſquires and Gentlemen of Cheshire, to the number of two hundred, and about five thousand common ſouldiers. This battell was ſtricken neere to Shrewsbury vpon a Saturday, the one and twentieth of Iuly, and the Eue of Saint Marie Magdalen.

(38) The Earle of Worcester (the seducer and destroyer of his noble Nephew Hofpur, and therefore if but for that, very worthy to haue dyed) Sir Richard Vernon Knight, and the Baron of Kinderton had their heads cut off vpon the Monday following. Hofpur's body had beene buried by permission, but vpon other aduise, the King caused it to be drawne out of the graue, beheaded, quartered, and the parts sent into diuers Cities of the Kingdome. The Earle of Northumberland (pretending to come with forces to the Kings aide) was emperched by the Earle of Westmorland, and Robert Waterton who had raised a great host. Northumberland taking neither of them for friend, wheeles about, and returns to his Castle of Warkworth. But what can be ſecure to a ſubiect againſt the victorious armie of a martiall King? The Earle knew as much, manifeſtly feeling the irreconcilable maines of his houſe in the losse of his ſonne and brother, and therefore ſhaped his courſe accordingly. The King therefore being altogether as prudent as fortunate, hauing ſeized the ſtate of things in the Marches about Shrewsbury, ſets forward to the City of York, from thence to take order for ſuch perils, as he ſoreſaw might happen. He ſeized himſelfe the more ſeriuſſie and entrie to this needfull worke; for that his Ambaſſadors had effected an abſtinenſe from ware with France, till the firſt of March, which paſſing ſpace though it might ſeeme little, was not a little welcome to the King, the Realme of England being then ſo full of dangerous perturbations. While hee was at York, he commands the Earle of Northumberland to come thither in perſon, which he accorded did vpon the morrow after the day of Saint Laurence, and that alſo with a ſmall traine in the nature of an humble ſutor. He could not in reaſon hope for the wonted familiar fauour of the King, neither had he yet, for it was accounted matter of grace, that his life was pardoned, though his meanes and liberty was abridged, the King allowing only neceſſary maintenances. The life of Princes is like a perpetuall motion. The Northerne Countreys are now ſorled, but hath the King therefore any the more reſt? Nothing leſſe; for Wales & the troubles thereof call him thither. What ſhould he doe? Money the Cement and ſoldure of all ſuch actions, (for Armies cannot otherwiſe be held together) vtterly failes. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury fees the needs and viſes of his Soueraigne, and like a father ſupplies him with a Tenth, which the Clergy at their Metropolitans motion, conſent to giue: vpon the ſtrength whereof, the King knows how farre hee may proceed againſt the Welſh in his good time.

(39) Toward the reliefe of theſe his neceſſities, the valiant exploits of William de Wilford an Eſquire, who was in the meane time abroad for the King vpon the narrow Seas, brought ſome aſſiſtance, certainly ſore of contentation; for heooke forty lawfull prizes laden with yron, oyle, ſope and Rochell wine, to the number in all of a thouſand tunne vpon the Coaſtes of Britaine, and in his returne ſet forth ſaile on fire, and to make the Britains know that hee was not only a man of his hands at Sea, he comes on ſhore at Penarh, burnes Townes and houſes about ſixe leagues into the Countrey, and afterward did as much for them at the Towne of Saint Mathewes, which he conſumed with flames and waſted the land for three miles about. The French not to ſeeme ſlow to like miſchiefs, land at the Wight, but were compelled with loſſe to betake themſelues againe vnto their Fleet, with farre worſe ſucceſſe than the Britons vnder the conduct of the Lord of Caſtell had not long before, who landing at Plimmouth invaded, tooke and burnt it.

(40) The King hauing humbled the Earle of Northumberland in ſuch ſort as you heard, looks againe vpon him with an eye of compaſion and fauour, not without a ſecret reſpect to his owne ſafety; and he had little appetite to augment enmities, but to allay them rather, whereas by this gracious vſage of that Earle, (for he reſtored him fully to all) he now thinks thoſe North parts ſufficiently ſecured. This reſtitution was made to the Earle in the Parliament holden at London about the midſt of Ianuary, where the King obtained an vnſuall Taxe or Subſidy, of which (that it might not be drawne into example) no record, nor writing was ſuffered to remaine. Some part of the gold which the king thus drew into the Eſchequer, he had occaſion to beſtow at this time. For, there preſented themſelues vnto him, a boiſterous troupe of plaine Welſh-men, who brought to the kings view three Lords, and twenty knights of note; Theſe were priſoners, whom the Countrey people about Dartmouth in Deuonſhire had gotten in plaine fight. The king was therefore giuen to vnderſtand, that the Lord of Caſtel the Briton, who had formerly burnt Plimmouth, thinking to doe the like at Dartmouth, came on ſhore with his forces, where theſe and the like people ſiercely encountered him; at which time their women (like Amazons) by hurling of ſtints and pebles, and by ſuch other artillery, did greatly aduance their huſbands and kinſefolkes victory. The Lord of Caſtel himſelfe and many beſides were ſlaine, theſe other were ſaued as more of them might haue bene, but that the ignorance of language alike confounded the cries of indignation and pity. They therefore in reward of this hazard and ſeruice, doe pray they might reape ſome commodity by their Captiuities. It was but reaſon; wherefore the King, who tooke pleaſure to talke with the luſty Welſh-men, himſelfe cauſeth their purſes to be ſuſt with golden Coyne, reſtoring the priſoners to repay himſelfe with aduantage out of their ranſomes. The like good fortune againſt Owen Glendower and the Welſh would haue gladdened him indeed; but they burne and deſtroy the Marches, they kill and captiuate the people, and partly by force, partly by fraud, get many Cattle, ſome of which they ſale, and ſome ſell others.

others. Neither came theſe euils ſingle, for the Flouings and Britons tooke certaine Merchant ſhips of England, and either ſlew or hung the Sailors.

(41) It is more ſtrange that King Richard was not ſuffered to be dead; after he had ſo long a time been buried. Serlo, who had beene a Gentleman of his Chamber, hauing heard that King Richard (his royall and gracious Maſter) was ſecretly abiding in Scotland, left the fauour of the French Court to ſee him, but it was not worth his ſo much loue and labour; for hee that bare the name, was but an Inpoſtor. Loath yet to let the opinion die, becauſe it might do King Henry harme; Serlo affirms that Richard was aliue. What cunning madneſſe is ſo great which hath not ſome great fool or other to ſupport it? The old Counteſſe of Oxford (mother to the late Duke of Ireland) will needs perſwade her ſelfe and others in Eſſex, that Richard was aliue: certaine it is, that ſhee deſired it might be true. To make others more firmly beleue the ſame, ſhe ſecretly gaue ſiluer and gilt Harts (the badges which King Richard vſed to beſtow vpon his followers) as tokens. Hitherto the deuſe held out, for it had no great danger in it; but Serlo ſeeing the neceſſity of greater friends, which appeared not, grew weary, and knowing that Sir William Clifford knight, Captaine of Berwick had receiued ſundry fauours from King Richard, hopes by him to be ſupplied with money, to beare his charges out of Scotland into France. Clifford farre otherwiſe minded, ſeizeth vpon Serlo, as a fit meane to reconcile himſelf with the King, in whole high diſpleaſure he ſtood, (for that hee had continued his charge in Berwick contrary to expreſſe commandement) and carrieth him to the King, who was then come to the Caſtle of Pimſet, being weakened with theſe rumors, and ſuſpecting that the chiefe neſt of danger lay in the North; whither the Earle of Northumberland brought his grandchildren (as pledges) to aſſure the King of his loyalty: thither alſo Sir William Clifford brings poore Serlo, who both confeſſeth the praſtice, as alſo that hee had a guiltie hand in the murder of the Duke of Gloceſter, which made him farre more odious than the other forgery. The crimes being manifeſt, Serlo is drawn fro Ponteſfract beginning his pain, where he had his doom, & at London knits vp the Tragedie in an halter. The Counteſſe of Oxford (for this falſhood loſt all her goods being moreover committed to cloſe priſon. To make this impoſture the more probable & paſſable, Serlo had cauſed K. Richards ſignet to be counterfeited, wherewith he ſealed ſundry conſolatorie and exhortatory letters to his friends, imited in K. Richards names wherupon many in Eſſex gaue credit to the Counteſſe, & among the reſt ſon Abbots of that Countie. Into this ſmoked al the deuſe euaporate.

(42) And no leſſe ſmoke was both the deuſe & ſucceſſe of certain in the Parliament (held this year at Conuentry), & called the lack learning Parliament, either for the vnlearnedneſſe of the perſons, or for their malice to learned men) where, to ſupply the Kings wants, a bill was exhibited againſt the Temporalities of the Clergie; but by the courage of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (who told them, it was the enriſhing of themſelues, not of the King, which they reſpected in their ſacrilegious petitions) and by the gracious care of the King, (who vowed to leaue the Church in better ſtate then he found it, rather then in worſe,) their motion vaniſhed to nothing, but the infamous memory of the attempters. It is obſerued, that * a Knight the chiefe ſpeaker in this bill againſt the Clergy, had beene himſelfe a Deacon, and ſo himſelfe firſt aduanced by the Clergy. With great reaſon therefore did our forefathers diſtinguiſh the people into the learned and lewd, inſecting truly that ſuch commonlie were lewd, who were not learned, and that lewd and wicked were but two words of one ſignification, as in this Parliament well appeared, whoſe Commons might enter Commons with their cattle for any vertue which they had more then brute Creatures.

(43) Twiſe after this, betwene Christmas and Palmſunday, the King aſſembled the States againe, once at London, and then at Saint Alban, for the cauſe of money, but with much diſtalt, the Peeres of the land riſing from the laſt ſeſſion thereof meaneily contented, as it well appeared not long after, though to the enterpriſers ruine. Thomas Morbray Earle Marſhall, one of the chiefe men which diſliked the carriage of publick matters, drawes Richard the Serape Archbiſhop of York into a conſpiracy, in full hope that Henrie Perſie Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of York, and the common people would aſſiſt their cauſe, which was gloſed with the ſpecious pretence of redreſſing publick abuſes, hapning through the Kings default. The Earle of Westmorland hearing of this attempt, wherein the Earle Marſhall and the Archbiſhop were leaders of the people, gathers a force to encounter them, but perceiuing himſelfe too feeble, he betakes himſelfe to fraud, and by ſtaining to like the quarrell, got them both into his power, and preſented them as an acceptable oblation to the King, who about Whitſontide comes to York, where (albeit the Earle of Westmorland had promiſed them their liues) aſwell the Archbiſhop, as the Earle Marſhall were beheaded. But the next yeere the Pope excommunicated all ſuch as had a hand in putting the Archbiſhop to death. It was ſaid of Tiberius * Cafar in a Satyricall libel, regnabit ſanguine multo.

Ad regnum quiſquis venit ab exilio.
Who, firſt Exile, deſt after crown'd, His raigne with blood will much abound.

(44) This the King verified in his perſon, who committing out of banishment, could not ſupport his Title and eſtate, but by ſhedding much blood of ſubiects. For not contented with thoſe two liues, he purſueth the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf with an inuincible Armie of ſeuene and thirty thouſand men: but they vnable to make head againſt ſo mighty a force, take Berwick for refuge. Thither the King marcheth, at the ſound whereof, they both diſtruſtfull of their ſafety, ſlie into Scotland, where the Lord Fleming entertaines them. Berwick vpon hope of ſuccours out of Scotland (which gladly nourished the Engliſh mileries, and the Engliſh theirs) reſuſed to render, whereupon the King plants a battering piece againſt a Tower in the wall, which as it threw downe the halfe thereof with one ſhot, ſo did it quite ouerthrow all the defendants courages, who preſently yeelded the place vpon hard and deperate terms, for they were partly hanged, and partly emprisoned. After Berwick was thus recovered, the king takes Alnwick, & all other Caſtles belonging to the Earle, and thinking the like happines would ſhine vpon him in Wales, he croſſeth ouer thither, where it fell out far otherwiſe, not by the manhood of the Welſh, but by the ſordaine rage of waters which deſtroyed his carriages and about ſixty wains (as was ſaid) laden with much treaſure: therefore he returns to Worceſter. Owen Glendower the chiefe captaine of the Welſh nation, expecting & fearing a reuenge had before this time confederated himſelfe with the French, who in 140. ſhips arriued at Milford haue to the aid of Owen, hauing well neere firſt loſt all their horſes in the paſſage for want of freſh water. The Lord Berkley and Henrie de Pay (by what meanes appears not) burnt fifteen of that number in the harbour. They made the entrance of their warre by laying ſiege to the Towne of Carmarthen in South-Wales, which the Garrifon being permitted to depart with bagge and baggage, was yeelded.

(45) The King being againe in need of money, after long vnwillingneſſe and delay, the Parliament furniſhed him, rather overcome with wearineſſe in contradiction, then for any great good will. Some of his treaſure was employed, as it ſeemes, vpon ſecret praſtices with the Scots, that the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf might be deliuered into his hands, in exchange for ſome Scots.

whereupon they flew into Wales, and the Scots misting their purpose, fled David Lord Flemming for discovering their intention to his distressed guests, (as by the lawes of honour and hospitality he was obliged) which filled Scotland with civil discords. To avoid the dangers whereof, and to better his education, the King of Scots sent his sonne and heire by sea into France, whom, together with the Bishoppe of Orkney certain Mariners of Cley in Norfolk surprized at sea, and presented to the King, who committed him prisoner to the Tower of London. Meanwhile the French prosecuting their affaires in Wales, sent thither eight and thirty shippes full of souldiers, of which number the English tooke eight (the rest escaping in great feare to Wales,) and not long after of which fifteen shippes laden with waxe and wine. This fortune though good, was nothing in regard of the service which Henry Pay, with certaine shippes of the Cinque Ports, and about fifteen other, employed upon a great Fleet, containing sixscore shippes, whose ladinges were yron, salt, oyle, and Rochel wine. The same times was a felon put to death for hauing in many places of London, dared secretly to set up bills, containing newes that King Richard was alive. The fearefull plague of pestilence flew multitudes of people through the Realm, chiefly in London, where, within a short space it destroyed thirty thousand. That most renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knolls, who had led so many living men to their honourable deaths in battell, was now captived himself by death upon the fifteenth day of August. His fame grew principally by martiall deedes in the great warres of France, vnder Edward the third, but spread and felied it selfe by good workes, among which the goodly stone-bridge at Rochester in Kent was one.

(46) In the meane space, the wars of Wales were managed by Prince Henry, who tooke the Castle of Aberystwith; but Owen Glendowr soone after got it againe by faire fraud, and thrust into it a Garrison of his owne. Thus Owen prospered for a time; but the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf forsaking Wales, and seeking to raise a force in the North, were encountered by the Sherife of Yorkshire, who after a sharpe conflict slew the Earle in the field, and so wounded the Lord Bardolf, that hee died thereof. The Earles head was cut off, which being first ignominiously carryed through London, was fixed upon the Bridge. The King hauing thus vanquished his chiefe enemies, went to Yorke, where inquiries were made for the Earles adherents, of which hee condemned, ransomed, and emprisoned many. The Abbot of Hales, because hee was taken fighting on the Earles behalfe, had sentence to die, which was executed upon him by hanging. In forraigne and transmarine parts, the Kings affaires had mixt success; for Edmund Earle of Kent, at the siege of Brimant in Britaine, was stricken with a quarrell into the head, whereof hee died; but yet after he had first taken the said Castle, and leueld it with the earth.

(47) The peace of Christendome hauing bene long tempestuously troubled by a Schisme, raised by ambition of opposit Popes, whereof the one was chosen at Rome, the other at Auinion, by contrarie factions of the Cardinals; A general Councell was summoned to be held at Pisa in Italie, whither the King of England sent his Ambassadors, and the Clergy elected Robert Alum * Chancellour of Oxford, & Bishoppe of Sarum, to signify, * that unless both the Popes would giue ouer their Papacie, neither of them should thenceforward be acknowledged for Pope. The King in his letter then sent to Pope Gregory, charged him (as Platina likewise doth) with Perjury, and that this Papall emulation had bene the cause of the murder of * more then two hundred and thirty thousand Christians in warres. There assembled a great number of Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander 5. (a man * trained vp at Oxford, where hee tooke degree in Theologie) reiecting the two others, who long and bitterly had contended for the place. The King also calls his Parliament to find out meanes for more money, to the custody and charge whereof hee ordained Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Treasurer, as Thomas Beaufort the Kings halfe brother, Lord Chancellour. In which Parliament was reuised the facilegious Petition of spoiling the Church of England of her goodly patrimony, which the peticie and wisdom of so many former ages had congested. But the King (who was bound by oath and reason to preferre the flourishing estate of the Church) detested their wicked proposition, and for that cause denied all other their requests. The Duke of Burgundies prouisions which he had made to reduce Calys to the French dominions, & stored at Saint Omers, were consumed with casual fire to ashes.

(48) About these times the great and bloody factions betweene the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans brake forth. The cause was for a murderr committed vpon Lewis (brother to the French king, and father of the said Duke of Orleans) as he came late one night from the Queenes lodging, who at that time lay in of a child. The murderers * to preuent pursuit, strewed gathrops behind them. The Duke of Burgundie iustified the fact, for that Lewis had (as hee said) laboured with the Pope to put the King from his seat, vpon pretence that hee was as vnfit to gouerne as euer Childerike was, whom Pope Zacharie pronounced against. This prepared the way for that courge wherewith God meant to chastise the pride and sinnes of France. Each partie sought to fortifie it selfe with friends, aswell at home as abroad. The Duke of Burgundie had the King and the Dolphin on his side; the other had the Kings of Navarre and Aragon, the Dukes of Berrie and Britaine with many of the mightiest Earles and Lords. The Duke of Burgundie, (who together with the King and the face of gouernment, kept in Paris) perceiving his aduersaries strengthes to bee more then his owne, offers to the King of England, a daughter of France in marriage with the Prince, and many great promises, so as hee would ioyne in defence of the King, & send ouer competent forces; whereunto hee is said to haue answered: Our aduise is, that you should not in this case adventure battell with your enemy, who seems to prosecute a iust reuenge for the death of his father; but labour to assuage the displeasure and anger of the exasperated young man, by all the good meanes which are possible. If that cannot bee, then stand vpon your guard, and draw into place of most safety, with such force of men as may best serue for your defence. After all this, if hee will not bee appeased, you may with the better confidence encounter him, and in such case we will not faile (more fully) to assist, according as you request. For the present hee sent ouer the Earls of Arundell and Kyme, and many men of Armes, with plenty of English Bow-men, who came safe to Paris, where they in nothing diminished the ancient glory of their nation, but behaued themselves valiantly.

(49) The Duke of Orleans, and the Peeres of his faction, seeing their successe, consult how to draw the King of England from their enemy, and thereupon send ouer one Falconer and others, with solemne letters of excedence, whom they made their irrenocable Procurators, to entreat, agree, and conclude, (on their behalves) with the most excellent Prince, Henry * by the grace of God King of England, and his most noble sonnes, &c. for the restitution and reall redeliuerie of the Duchie of Aquitaine, with all the rights and appurtenances, which (as it affirmed) are the inheritance of the said most excellent Lord the King of England, by them to be made and done, &c. The Ambassadors hauing shewed forth this Proxie, exhibited the points of their negotiation in these Articles, by which wee may see how farre the desire of reuenge will transport great minds. 1 They offer their bodies to be employed against all men for the seruice of the King

King of England, saving their faith to their owne Sovereigne, as knowing the King of England would not otherwise desire them. 2 Their sonnes, daughters, nephewes, Nieces, and all their Cosens to be in marriage at the King of Englands pleasure. 3 Their Castles, Townes, treasure, and all their goods to be at the seruice of the said King. 4 Their friends, the Gentlemen of France, the Clergy and wealthy Burgers; who are all of their side; as by prooffe (they said) shall well appeare. 5 They finally offer to him the Duchy of Aquitaine entire, and in as full a manner as euer his Predecessors enjoyed the same, without excepting any thing, so as they themselves will hold, and acknowledge to hold their lands in those parts, directly of the said King, and deliuer as much of them as they can into his possession, and will doe their utmost to conquer the rest for him. Vpon condition on the other side. 1 That the King of England and his Successors should assist the said Lords, against the Duke of Burgundy for the murderr committed vpon the person of the late Duke of Orleans. 2 That he should assist against the said Duke of Burgundy and his fauourers, till they had repaired all the losses which they, their friends and tenants had sustained through that occasion. 3 That he should helpe to settle the quiet of the realme, &c.

(50) These Offers being put into the balance with the Articles, vpon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtained succours, ouerweighed them so farre, that about the midst of August, before all those which had bene sent with the Earle of Arundell to the contrary part, were returned into England, aydes were decreed to the Duke of Orleans, to the wonder of all men, who vnderstood not the secret, so that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Dorset and very many other principall men with a competent puissance were sent ouer to ayde the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Angouleme remaining hostage in England, for the sure payment of one hundred and nine thousand Crownes for performance of the other Articles: They came on shore in Normandy; but whether the confederates moued with the perill into which their Country & Nation should by these meanes be precipitated, or for some other causes, (though none indeed so iust, as the sorrow and shame for their so disloyall a combination with the Capital enemies of France,) the Duke of Orleans (contrary to agreement) came not at the appointed time and place, whereupon the English burnt, spoiled and tooke much riches in the Castles, Countrey and good Townes, therewith to satisfie themselves, till the Duke of Orleans should see them payd. At last yet the Dukes of Clarence and Orleans came to a treaty, after which the English campe rose peaceably and march into Aquitaine there to winter it selfe, the Duke of Orleans returning to his owne. While these matters were in hand, the Lord of Heyle Marshall of France with many other Lords, and about foure thousand * men of armes layd siege to a certaine strong place in Gascoigne; which Sir Iohn Blunt Knight, with three hundred souldiers not only defended, but draue them also from the siege, taking prisoners twelue of the principall and about six score other Gentlemen. * The King liued not to see the carriage, and fortune of these warres, for falling sicke at Eltham in the Christmas time (at which our ancient authors begin to draw the circles of their yeeres) but recovering himselfe a little, he repaired to London about Candlemas, there to hold a Parliament; the end whereof he liued not to see, but vpon the twentieth day of March finished his short, but politticke and victorious reigne, in peace and honour, had not the iniustice of his first entrance left a dishonorable stayne vpon his worthiest actions.

(51) The vulgar Chronicles tell vs a Strange Story, the truth whereof must rest vpon the reporters. The King, say they, lying dangerously sicke, caused his Crowne to be set on a Pillow at his beds head, when suddainly the pangs of his Apoplexie seizeng on him so vehemently that all suppoled him dead, the Prince comming in, took away the Crowne which, his father reuiueng, soone missed; and calling for his sonne, demanded, what he meant; to bereaue him of that, whereto hee had yet no right? The Prince boldlie replied; Long may you liue Soueraigne Father to weare it your selfe; but all men deeming you were departed to inherit another Crowne, this being my right, I tooke as mine owne, but now doe acknowledge for none of mine; and thereupon he set the Crowne againe where hee found it. Oh sonne, (quoth hee) with what right I got it, God onely knoweth, who forgieue me the sinne; how soeuer it was got, sayd the Prince, I meane to keepe and defend it, (when it shall bee myne) with my sword, as you by sword haue obtained it. Which the King hearing, hee entered discourse of aduise, shewing him that hee feared some discord would arise betwixt him and his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, who with better respect had borne forth his youth then Prince Henry had done, and whose distemper was like to breed great troubles, if it were not in time stayed. If my brethren (quoth Henry) will be true subiects, I will honour them as my brethren, but if otherwise, I shall as soone execute iustice vpon them, as on the meanest of birch in my Kingdome. The King reioycing at this vnexpected answer; both prudently and Christianly charged him before God, to minister the law indifferently, to ease the oppressed, to beware of flatterers, not to deferre iustice, nor yet to be sparing of mercy. Puniti (quoth hee) the oppressors of thy people, so shalt thou obtaine fauour of God, and loue and feare of thy Subiects, who whiles they haue wealth, so long shalt thou haue their obedience, but made poore by oppressions, will be ready to make insurrections. Reioyce not so much in the glory of thy Crowne, as meditate on the burthenous care which accompanieth it; mingle loue with feare, so thou as the heart shalt be defended in the midst of the body; but know, that neither the heart without the members, nor a King without his Subiects helpe is of any force. Lastly my sonne loue and feare God, ascribe all thy victories, strength, friends, obedience, riches, honour and all, vnto him: and with the Psalmist say with all thanks, Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs but to thy holy name be giuen the laud and praise.

(52) Vpon what foile these most Christian, true and excellent Councells fell, the following life will shew, being nothing else, but a full representation in act, of such things, as are here in precept only, shewing to the world how diuine a beautie Christian goodnes hath.

His Wines.

(53) The first wife of King Henry the fourth, was Mary one of the daughters and heires of Humphrey de Bohun, Earle of Hereford, Essex and Northampton, Constable of England, &c. Shee dyed An. D. 1394. before he came to the Crowne.

(54) His second wife was Iane, Queene, daughter to Charles the first King of Nauarre, hee being the widow of Iohn de Monford, Sirnamed Stream, Duke of Britaine; and died without any Children by King Henry, at Hauering in the Bower in the County of Essex 1437. the tenth day of Iulie in the fiftieth yeere of Henry the sixth, and was buried by her husband at Canterbury.

His Children.

(55) Henry, the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and afterward King of England, whose glorious life and acts next insue.

(56) Thomas, Duke of Clarence, President of the Councell to King Henry the first (his brother,) and Steward of England. He was slaine at Beaufort in Anion without any iustice. He married Margaret daughter daughter to Thomas Holland, Earle of Kent, the widow of John Beauford, Earle of Somerset.

(57) John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France in the time of King Henry the sixth, Duke also of Arquit and Alansin, Earle of Cenomania, Hartcourt, of Kendalland Dreux, Vifcount Beaumont. He married first with Anne, daughter to John Duke of Burgundy. Secondly with Jacobs, daughter to Peter de Luxemburgh Earle of Saint Paul. And died without any issue.

(58) Humfrey, was by his brother King Henry the fifth created Duke of Glocester, was Protector of the Kingdome of England for 25. yeeres, in the time of King Henry the sixth, in whose first yeere hee styled himselfe in his Charters thus: Humfrey by the grace of God, sonne, brother, and uncle to Kings, Duke of Glocester, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zelanda, and Pembroke; Lord of Friesland, Great Chamberlaine of the Kingdome of England, Protector and Defender of the same Kingdome, and Church of England. Hee was a man, who nobly deserved of the common wealth and of learning, as being himselfe very learned, and a magnificent Patron and benefactor of the Vniuersity of Oxford, where hee had bene educated; and was generally called, the Good Duke. Hee married first Jacobs, heire to William Duke of Bauaria Earle of Holland, who (as after was knowne) had first bene lawfully troth-plighted to John Duke of Brabant, and therefore was afterward diuorced from the said Humfrey. His second wife was Eliane daughter to Reginald, Baron Cobham de Scarborough. Queene Margaret, wife to King Henry the sixth, repining at his great power in swaying the King & state, secretly wrought his ruine, hee being murdered in his bed at Burton, dying without any issue, 1446. His body was buried at Saint Albans, yet the vulgar error is that he lies buried in Saint Pauls.

(59) Blanche married to William Duke of Bauaria, and Emperour.

(60) Philip married to John King of Denmarke and Norway.

HENRIE THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE TWO AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSE.

CHAPTER XV.

Mongst the many Monarchs of this most famous Empire, none is found more complete with all heritall vertues then is this King, of whose life by order and successe of story wee are now to write; which is Henry of that name the fifth, the renowne of England, and glory of Wales. Of whom, what was spoken of Titus in the flourishing times of the Romans, may for the time of his raigne be truly verified in him: both of them being the lovely darlings, and delightfull ioy of Mankind. But as Titus is taxed by his story-Writers, in youth to haue been riotous, profuse, wastfull and wanton, for which (as he saith) with the dislikes of men he steps into the throne; so if wee will beleue what others haue writ, Henry was wilde whiles hee was a Prince, whose youthfull pranks as they passed with his yeers, let vs haue leaued here to rehearse, and leaued them motives to our owne vse, as hee made them for his.

(2) His birth was at Moumouth in the Marches of Wales, the yeere of Christs assuming our flesh, 1388 and the eleuenth of King Richards raigne, his father then a Subiect, and Earle of Derbie, Leicester, & Lincolne, afterwards created Duke of Hereford, in right of his wife, then of Lancaster, by the death of his father; and lastly by election made the Soueraigne of England, (that vnfortunate Richard) being deposed the Crowne. His mother was Mary, second daughter and coheire of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, and Northampton, high Constable of England, as we haue said.

(3) His young yeeres were spent in literature in the Academie of Oxford, where in Queenes Colledge he was a Student vnder the tuition of his vnclie Henry Beauford, Chancelour of that Vniuersity, afterwards Bishoppe of Lincolne and Winchester, and lastly made Cardinall by the title of Eusebius. But his Father obtaining the Crowne, and himselfe come come to the age of twelue yeeres, had the succesi-on thereof entailed on him by Parliament, and accordingly was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and presently had the Title of the Dukedome of Aquitaine conferred vpon him, the better to effect the thing then intended, which was to haue obtained in marriage young Queene Isabel, late wife to the murdered King Richard, daughter of Charles the sixt, King of France.

(4) From Oxford, Prince Henry was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy then Earle of Worcester made his Gouernour; but being himselfe false to the Father, could giue no good example vnto the sonne, whose hostile attempts in the field of Shrewsbury cost that disloyall Earle his head, and almost had done Prince Henry his life, who in battell against him was wounded in the face with an arrow.
This marke of his manhood, with the ouerthrow of Hotspur in that bloody conflict, were hopefull signes of his following successe, which presently were seconded with as fortunate proceedings against Owen Glendower that scourge of his Country, and Arch-rebell vnto Englands peace, whom this Prince so pursued through the vast mountaines of Wales, that from the Denues of those deserts hee durst not shew his face, but therein perished by famine, & nature's other wants, though the Prince had then scarcely attained vnto fixteene.

(5) But growne from his tutors command, or control, and come to the yeeres for dispose of himselfe, as his youth stood affected, to were his consents, and those (many times) whose conditions were none of the best; whether led by an inclination of youth (which commonly lets the raine loose vnto will) or, to know that by proofe, which other Princes doe by report, I will not determine: yet vnto the latter doe I rather incline, knowing that Salomon the wisest of Kings did so himselfe; and rather by Koffet am lead, who writeth that Prince Henry in Oxford had in great veneration, such as excelled in vertue or learning, and among many, two hee na-meth, Thomas Radban of Ayrton Colledge a great Astronomer, by him preferred to the Bilhopricke of S.
Davids in Wales, and John Carpenter of Oriol Col-ledge, a learned Doctor of Theologie, whom hee advanced to the See of Worcester. But let vs heare how his wilde oates were spent, and with what increase the harvest was got. The translator of Luine, who wrote the storie of this worthy Prince, and dedicated his paines to King Henry his sonne, affirmeth for truth, that many actions he did, farre vnfitting his greatnesse of birth; and among other, doth taxe him with no better then theft, who in the raigne of his Father, accompanied with such as spent their wits vpon other mens spoiles, laide waite in the way for his Rents receivers, and robd them of that which indeed was his owne, when sometimes in thusing he nothing was spared, but bare away many knocks.
The lenders whereof hee would frankly reward, when they complained vnto him of their losses re-ceiued, which euer were abated in the foot of their accounts.

(6) Our learned Knight Eliot setting his pen to portraire perfect Gouernour, recordeth a story, retaining this Princes great fame, the credit whereof let it lie vpon himselfe. It chanced (saith he) a seruant of his to be arraigned for felony at the Kings Bench-Barre, where standing ready to receiue sentence of death, the Prince had intelligence, and posted thither, where finding his seruant made sure for starting, commanded his fetters to be stricke off, & the fellow arraigned to be freed the Court. All men amazed at this his approach and speech: the Chiefe Iustice stood vp, and shewed the Prince that his feare was the Kings, that lawes were the finewes of the Common-wealth, that himselfe was sworn to doe Iustice, and must yeeld an account for all that he did, that he honored him as the eldest sonne of his Soue-raigne, and Prince, but to set free the prisoner, hee could not, having so apparently endangered his life to the law; and therefore desired the Prince, if hee held him in such esteeme, to saue him by pardon from the King, and not to infringe the law, which he told him plainly he should not doe.

(7) The Prince enraged to haue the deniall, affai-ed himselfe to set free the Prisoner, which the Chiefe Iustice forbadde, commanding him vpon his allegiance to cease from such riot, and to keepe the Kings peace: whereat Prince Henry in a furiestep vp to the Bench, and gaue the Iudge a blow on the face, who nothing daunted, fate still, and with a bold countenance, spake thus to the Prince, Sir I pray you remember your selfe, this seat of iudgement which here I sitse, is not mine, but your Fathers, to whom and to his lawes you owe double obedience. If his Highnesse be thus contemned, and his lawes violated by you, that should shew your selfe obedient to both, who will obey you when you are a Soueraigne, or minister execution to the lawes that you shall make? wherefore, for this attempt, in your Fathers name, I commit you prisoner vnto the Kings Bench, there to remaine vntill his Maiesties pleasure be further known. With which words the Prince greatly abashed, stood mute by the Iudge, and fixing his eyes vpon his reuerend face, presently laid from him his weapons, and with humble obedience done, departed to prison. The King vnderstanding the whole circumstance, greatly reioyced that he had a Sonne of such obedience to his lawes, and a Iudge so vpright to administer them without either fauour or feare of the person; notwithstanding for this, and other like actions of his youth, he remoued him from being President of his Priue Councell, and placed in his stead Thomas Duke of Clarence his second brother; to Prince Henries no little griefe and discontent.

(8) Howbeit his followers were nothing diminished, but his Court frequented more then his fathers, which bred some suspition in the crazie kings head, lest among his other wild parts, hee would attempt to play with his Crowne; which was encrea-sed by his domestical flatterers, who daily buzzed new icalousies into his eares. This made Prince Henry (as Otterborne noteth) to strengthen himselfe with his chiefe friends, and well-willers, and with such a troupe repaired to his fathers Court, as a greater in those dayes had not beene scene. The translator of Luine reports the maner of his approach, euen from him that was an eye witness, and the same no lesse then the Earle of Ormond in Ireland, whose relation is this.

(9) The King somewhat crazie, and keeping his Chamber, hearing newes dayly of his sonnes loose exercises, too meane for a Prince, and their contractions euer made to aime at his Crowne, hee both be-ganne to withdraw his fatherly affection, and to feare some violence against his owne person: which when Prince Henry heard of, by some that fauoured him of the Kings Councell, in a strange disguise hee repaired to his Court, accompanied with many Lords and noble mens sonnes. His garment was a gowne of blew Satten, wrought full of Eylet-holes, and at euery Eylet the Needle left hanging by the silke it was wrought with: about his arme he ware a dogs-collare set full of s.s. of gold, the Thwert ther-of being most fine gold. Thus coming to Westminster, and the Court of his Father, hauing commanded his followers to aduance no further then the fire in the hall, himselfe accompanied with some of the Kings household, passed on to his presence, and after his duty and obedience done, offered to make knowne the cause of his coming. The king weake then with sicknesse, and supposing the worst, commanded himselfe to be borne into a withdrawing Chamber, some of his Lords attending vpon him, before whose feet Prince Henry fell, and with all reuerent obseruances, spake to him as followeth.

(10) Most gracious Soueraigne and renowned father,

"father, the suspition of disloyalty, and diuulged reports of my dangerous intendments towards your royall Person and Crowne, hath enforced at this time, and in this manner, to present my selfe and life at your Maiesties dispose. Some faults and mispent time (with blushe I may speake it) my youth hath committed, yet those made much more by such fleeing pickthanks, that blow them from ger into your vnwilling and distastie care. The name of Soueraigne ties allegiance to all, but of a Father, to a further feeling of natures obedience; so that my finnes were double, if such suggestions possessed my heart: for the Law of God ordaineth, that he which doth presumptuously against the Ruler of his people shall not liue and the child that smiteth his father shall die the death: so farre therefore am I from any disloyall attempt, against the person of you my Father, and the Lords an-nointed; that if I knew any of what you stoode in the least danger or feare, my hand according to duty shall be the first to free your suspition; yea I will most gladly suffer death to ease your perplexed heart; and to that end I haue this day prepared my selfe both by confession of my offences past, and receiuing the blessed Sacrament. Wherefore I humbly beseech your Grace to free your suspition from all feares conceived against mee, with this dagger, the stabbe whereof I will willingly receiue hereat your Maiesties hand, and so doing, in the presence of these Lords, and before God at the day of iudgement, I clearly forgiue my death. But the King melting into teares, cast downe the naked dagger (which the Prince deliuered him) and raising his prostrate sonne, embraced and kissed him, confessing his eares to haue bene ouer-credulous that way, and promising neuer to open them againe against him. But the Prince vnlesatisfied, instantly desired, that at least his accusers might be produced, and if convicted, to receiue punishment, though not to the full of their demerites; to which request the King replied, that as the offence was capital, so should it be examined by the Peeres, and therefore willed him to rest contented vntill the next Parliament. Thus by his great wisdom he satisfied his father from further suspition, and recovered his loue that neuerly was lost. Hetherto of Henry as he was Prince (some other of whose youthly actions we also touched in his fathers raigne) and now to his Acts after hee King.

(11) Henry ordained successor, and ouerfeer of his dying Fathers Testament, had in his entrance so fortunate proceedings, as hee seemeth to exceed all his Predecessors; his Nobles proffering the oath of their Allegiance, before himselfe had made his, for the iust government of the Common-weale, which to farre was from acceptance, that hee desired God neuer to admit him to the Crowne, vnlesse he should to his glory raigne, and rule the Scepter to the good of the Subiect. The day of his entrance and of his Fathers death, being the twentieth of March, and yeere of Christs Incarnation, according to our account, 1412. on the ninth of April following hee was solemnly crowned at Westminster, Thomas Arundel Archbishoppe of Canterbury performing the roall Ceremonies: which no sooner was ended, but to beginne a good government, hee beganne with himselfe, banishing from his presence and Court the vnbridled youthes which had bene his comforts, commanding them either to change their manners, or neuer to approach within ten miles where hee lay.
Then chose hee worthy and prudent men for his Councell of Estate, and aduanced his Clergie with dignity and power: being himselfe as zealous in deu-otion, as liberrall in building, and indowing of places for deuotion of others. His Iustice was found of all that sought it; for euery day after dinner for the space of an houre, his custome was to leane on a cushion set by his subord, and there himselfe receiued petitions of the oppressed, which with great equity he did redresse.

And for a further testimony of his tender and compassionate heart, the slaughtered body of K. Richard ouer-meane entered at Langley, in great estate he remoued into Saint Peters Church at Westminster, and there laid him enshroued by Queene Anne his first wife (as himselfe had desired and prepared) founding a weekly memoriall to be celebrated; and fix shillings eight pence thereon distributed vnto the poore, and yecrelike twentie pounds giuen vpon his annuierarie day, besides foure tapets to burne before his monument day and night for euer. And so neerely did his death touch this innocent King, that he sent to Rome to bee absolved from that guilt of his fathers Act, by the Popes holinesse, then accounted another God; whose penance enjoined, he willingly performed, and afterwards purposed to haue made warre in Palestina against the enemies of Christ; for which end, hee lent Sir Hugh de Lawy of Henault to Ierusalem, to discouer the state of things there; but before his returne he was departed to the heavenly Ierusalem himselfe.

(12) The obsequies of his Father being solemnized at Canterbury, and the King in person attending the Corps, fitt occasion was giuen vnto Archbi-shoppe Arundell to complain of the Wickliffites, (then termed Lollards) great rubs in the wayes of the Clergies pride and proceedings; whereof Sir John Old-castle was thought a chiefe, who by his marriage contracted with a kinswoman of the Lord Cobhams of Cooling in Kent, obtained the title thereof, a man strong and valourous, and in especiall fauour with his Prince. This Knight in their Synode assembled at London, immediately after the Kings Coronation, was accused by them to haue rent Christs seme-lesse coat, in maintaining Wickliffes doctrine to bee taught, especially in the Diocesse of London, Rochester, and Hereford: against whom also some choise Inquisitors at Oxford, appointed for Herefetes (though that whole vniuersity had formerly vpheld both Wickliffe and his doctrine,) informed and presented his name with two hundred forty fixe conclusions, which they had collected to be hereticall.

(13) The King incensed (by the Archbishops suggestions) against these discontented discipliners, was further made beleue that they themselves had set vp billes in diuers places, threatening that an hundred thousand persons were ready for armes, against all that withstood their reformation, and among these that Oldcastle his Knight was reputed the chiefe.
The King graciously inclined, heard the Archbi-shops complaint, and being at Kennington promised to conferre with the Lord Cobham himselfe, which accordingly hee did, instantly willing him to submit himselfe to the censure of the Church and obedience of the Archbishoppe: but Cobham, no turne-coate from his profession, humbly told the King he owed his subiection only vnto his Maiesty whom God had placed in these his Dominions, as his onely vicegerent to gouerne his people and Subiects, and that himselfe forced nothing Romes leaden sword, vnlesse checked by the Pope (that Antichrist) against the Lords seruants, nor would suffer the key of Canterbury to open the closet of his conscience, where the spirite of God was residing, bearing witness with him, that hee stood in the truth, for whose defence as his Champion, he was ready to liue or die.

(14) This answer receiued, was so deliuered vnto the Archbishoppe, with power to cite, examine and punish, as their owne Canons in such cases had decreed. The Lyon thus laid for, whose paw they still feared, was serued by proceesse to ap-peare in the Archbishopps Court, and the same deli-uered by one Zulier a seruant of the Kings Priue Chamber, for that the bold Sumner durst not doe it himselfe, and the Archbishoppe (diligent lest he should forget the day) caused his letters citatorie to be set vpon the gates of the Cathedral Church of Rochester, which were presently torned down, and others againe set vp, were againe pulled off, to the great

great offence of the Clergies eye, and the rather, for that the Actor could not be knowne. The Knight not appearing (as knowing their malice and his own danger) was condemned of contumacie, and afterwards in a Synode at Rochester, was by the Archbishop pronounced an Heretike, where himselfe then enacted that heretike decree, that the holy scriptures should not be translated into the English tongue. But marke the iudgement that fell vpon his own tongue, whose roores and blade thorowly after (as is recorded) grew so big in his mouth and throte, that he could neither speake nor swallow downe meat, but in horror lay languishing, till lastly he so dyed starved by famine.

(15) In the meane time the Lord Cobham wrote his * Belief, which was very Christianlike, and presented it himselfe to the King, who (being much prepossessed) in no wise would receive it, but suffered him to bee summoned in his presence, and priue Chamber, when the Knight for his purgation offered an hundred knights and Esquires, which would not be accepted; then, according to his degree of Order, and law of Armes, he required the single Combat to fight for life or death, with either Christian or Heathen in the quarrell of his faith, the King and Council onely excepted. This notwithstanding could not be suffered, but needs must he appeare before the Archbishop his Iudge: where, after diuers examinations (in all which hee most religiously iustified himself & his profession) he was condemned of Heresie, and committed Prisoner vnto the Tower of London, whence shortly he escaped, and got into Wales. Vpon which escape great feares were conceiued, especially of the Clergie, the causes of his troubles, and mortall Enemies to him & his wellwillers, for the king was confidently (but as it seemeth maliciously) informed, that Oldcastle with his adherents laid for his life, & that in S. Giles Fields nere vnto Holborne twenty thousand were to assemble in hostile manner, with an intent to destroy the Monasteries of Westminster, Saint Albans, all the religious houses in London, and the Cathedral Church of Saint Pauls. The King therefore in person himselfe after midnight with a great Army came into these fields, where (if wee will beleue their professed enemies) fourescore of that faction were apprehended, who sayd they came to seeke the Lord Cobham. But as the answerer of Capus from more ancient times hath obserued, that in daies of persecution, such assemblies often had beene made to heare the Gospell preached, which otherwise they could not enioy: so in this place * then overgrown with bushes and vnfit for battell, those few were in likelihood assembled vnto John Beuerly agodly man their Preacher, without any intent of treason, hauing for their Chieftaines no greater persons then Sir Roger Aston a Knight of no great account, a Minister, and a male man. But their Apologies we leaue to others; onely the Lord Cobham could not be found, though the King by Proclamation had promised a thousand markes to his taker, besides many liberties to the City or Towne, that would discloise him; whereby (saith Walsley) it may be ghesse, that the whole Kingdome, well nere, embraced his opinions which that Fryar calls his madness. Thirty thousand of that assembly were condemned, whereof of leauen were confuted with fire and strangled, Aston, Beuerly and Aulwy were likewise executed.

(16) As the zeale of this King is much commended for his fauours towards his Clergie, so is his Princely pittie in the commiseration of young Perceys distresse, whose father Hapfury slaine at Shrewsbury (as we haue said) and hee by his Grandfather sent into Scotland for security, was there notwithstanding detained a Prisoner, for that James their King was forcibly kept in England by Henrie, and as they tooke it against all Iustice. But fit occasion being offered for young Perceys releafe, and exchange made betweene him and Alrede sonne of Robert Duke of Albany (who had bene taken prisoner at the Battell of Halidon) the king restored him not only in blood, and to grace in his Court, but also inuested his person with the Title and State of his Grandfather, to his owne no little honour, and faithfull seruice attained of that honourable family.

(17) Vpon Archbishop Arundels death, starved by famine as we haue said * Henry Chicheley stout Champion also against Wicliffes doctrine, was with the Kings consent, by the Monkes of Canterbury elected their Archbishop, which the politticke Elect neither accepted nor refused, but left it to the will and pleasure of the Pope: who first tooke snuffe that it so farre proceeded without his direction, yet was soone pacified by Chicheleys submission, and (as faith mine Author) with other Gratulations besides. The man though not so rich by birth as Arundel was, yet as strong for the Clergie, and more gracious with his Prince as the sequele proued.

(18) The first affaires of both was made knowne in a Parliament holden at Leicester, where in a Bill exhibited, complaint was made, that the temporall Lands giuen to religious houses and spiritual persons for deuotion were either superfluous, or disorderly spent; whose reuenues (if better employed) would suffice for the defence of the Land, and honor of the king: fiftene Earles, fiftene hundred knights fixe thousand two hundred Esquires, and one hundred Almshouses, for the reliefe of impotent and diseased persons, and vnto the kings Coffers twentie thousand pound by yeere. Which Bill (saith Hall) made the fat Abbots to sweate, the proud Priores to frowne, the poore Friars to curse, the silly Nunnes to weepe, and indeed all her Merchants to feare, that Babbell would downe.

(19) To stop the breach of which searching spring, no better meanes could be found, then to diuert the Parliament with other busineses, and to driue other proiects into the kings minde; whose head (as this new Archbishoppethere tolde him) had the best right to the Crowne of France: for not onlie the Dutchie of Normandy, Aquitaine, and Anjou, the Counties of Gascoigne, Maine, and the rest, were his lawfull though vnlawfull (detained) inheritance; but therewithall the whole Realme of France, as true heire vnto his great Grandfather king Edward the third, and vnto Philip the faire, in right of his mother Queene Isabella, the only daughter and Child liuing of the said French king. As for the law Salique alledged against the English claime, he affirmed, that Text touched only those parts in Germany, which lay betwixt the riuers Elbe, and Sala conquered by king Charles the great, who placing his French there to inhabit, for the dishonest liues of those Germane women made this law. In terram Salicam Mulieres ne succedant, which the Glosse did fully expound for the whole kingdome of France. Whose practise notwithstanding he shewed to be the contrary, by many experiences both in king pepin which deposed Childericke by the claime of heire General (as descended of Blithild daughter to Clothair the first, and by Hugh Capet, who, vnto the Crowne vpon Charles Duke of Lorraine (the sole heire male of that line from Charles the great) to make his claime good (which indeed was the starke naught) deriued himselfe as heire to the Lady Lingard, daughter to Charlemaigne, sonne to Lewis the Emperour, that was sonne to Charles the great. King Lewis also called the Saint; (who was the heire to the vsurper Hugh Capet) could not bee satisfied in conscience, how he might iustly keepe and possesse the Crowne of France, till he was fully instructed that Isabella his Grandmother was lineally descended of the Lady Ermengard daughter and heire to the aboue named Charles Duke of Lorraine, by the which marriage the blood and line of Charles the great was againe vntied and restored to the Crowne of France. Whereby (saith the Archbishop) it most manifestly appeared, that the

the title of Pepine, the Claime of Capet, the possessor of Lewis, yea of the French Kings themselves to this day, deriue their onely rights from the heires female, and that this pretended Law Salique was but a shifting deuile to debarre the English Kings from the claime of the French Crown. Which exclusion howsoever they pretend to bee right, yet the law of God (saith he) hath made it meer wrong, which with better regard of the Sex alloweth the woman to inherite her fathers possession, as we see in the practise of that state, where of Christ himselfe is called king, where the sues daughters of Zelophehad for want of heires males, were admitted to succeed in their fathers inheritance, allotted them in the Tribe of Manasse; and a law made by the Lord himselfe, that if a man died and had no sonnes, then his inheritance should be transferred vpon his daughters. Neither is it to be doubted but that the daughter of Shebam was the sole heire vnto her fathers patrimony, she dying without issue male; though shee married an Egyptian, whose posterity had their possessions among the Tribe of Iudah, euen to the Captiuitie of Babilon: so that if such a law were, as in truth there was no such, better were the breach by the warrant of diuine direction, then the continuance by colour of such prescription, seeing God hath ordained as well for the daughter as for the sonne.

(20) The Archbishop vnexpected but not vnpremeditated Oration thus ended, so stirred the blood of the young Couragious King, that his heart was all on a flame; and so tickled the eares of his Auditor, as they presently conceiued that France was their owne; the Title whereof descending from Isabella, the mother of the famous third Edward, and shee the daughter and suruiuing heire vnto Philip the faire; his right was, lineally deriued thence as followeth, first Philip by Isane his first wife intituled Queene of Navarre, had three sonnes and one daughter, namely Lewis, Philip and Charles, all three successiue Kings, and this Lady Isabella, by whom the English claime: his second wife was Constance the daughter of the King of Sicill, who bare him a sonne after his owne decease which liued not many daies after his father. Lewis his eldest sonne and tenth of that name succeeded Philip in the Kingdome of France, and by Margaret his wife the daughter of Burgundy had his daughter Isane intituled Queene of Navarre, who made claime also vnto the French Crowne, but neuer attained it; so that her Title fell with her death. Lewis by his second wife Clemence of Sicill, had a sonne named John borne vnto him, but presently both father and sonne departing this life, left the Scepter to his second brother; who by the name of Philip the fifth, a while wore the Emperiall Crowne of France: his wife was Isane the daughter of Burgaine, who bare vnto him only foure daughters.

(21) Vnto King Philip succeeded his brother Charles the faire, the fourth of that name, whose first wife was Blanch, detected of incontinencie and brought him no fruite, his second wife was Marie daughter to Henry Luxembourge the Emperour, who bare him a sonne that dyed soone after birth, and the mother likewise shortly came to her graue. Margaret the daughter to the Earle of Burenas, was his third and last wife, who at his death hee left with Child, and thus the three sonnes of Philip were brached, reigned, and died, whom Queene Isabella their sister suruiued, and in that right her sonne King Edward the third, by his royall consanguinity whilst the Crowne stood thus at suspence, till a Prince should be borne, claimed to be Regent in the Interregnum; and in the nonage of the looked for issue, against which, Philip de Valois sonne of Charles the hardy, who was brother to Philip the faire, being a second branch from Hugh Capet, and first Prince of the blood of France, maintained that the Regency of the male (if so he were borne) as also of the Realme

(if a daughter or the sonne dyed) belonged onely vnto him as the next in blood. The state thus standing, and a daughter borne, Philip was saluted and proclaimed King, no other right alledged then this foisted and falsely termed fundamentall law Salique, for no otherwise doth Ottomane the French famous Lawyer esteeme of that vngodly and vniust Ordinance, if any such had bene ordained.

(22) The Kings right thus apparant, and sufficient possessions to be had in France: the Bill of complaint against the Clergies excesses was quite dashed, and all mindes addicted for the affaires that way; thinking it vnreasonable to pull the Prouisions from their natives and brethren, when as the Circuit of their inheritance extended more large in compass: and therefore with the Danies they determined no longer to sit so pent with increase, seeing God had giuen them another Kingdome, but would free their own straitnesse by dint of sword, and spread their Tentis wider in the Continent of France: Neither was there any motiue more forceable in conference, then was the successe of those intruding Princes, who assailed the Crowne by that vniust claime of law Salique.

(23) For did not the sword of God (rather then man) in the hand of King Edward the claimer cut downe the flower of France in the Battell of Crecie, with the slaughter of Lewis King of Bohemia, of Charles the French Kings brother, of James Dolphin of Viennois, the Dukes of Lorraine, and Burbon, the Earles of Auvergne, Saouy, Combillard, Flanders, Niuers and Hamecourt, the Grand Priour of France, the Archbishop, and Zancinus and Noyene, of Lords, Barons, and Gentlemen to the number of 1500 with 30. thousand of the French Souldiers, and Philip not able of himselfe to defend himselfe, inciting Dauid of Scotland to invade and weaken England, therein did but only vex his owne spirit, for in that attempt the Scottish King was taken prisoner and brought to London, leaving Philip to struggle with his hard fortunes in France, which with bad successe hee did to the day of his death.

(24) John his sonne by the same title and claime felt the same stroke of iustice from the hand of that thunderbolt in warre Edward furnished the blacke Prince, the sonne of Englands Mars, who farre inferior to the French in number, farre exceeded them in marshall power, when at the battell of poitiers the French royall Standard was stroke downe, an hundred Ensignes wonne by the English, the Constable, Marshall and great Chamberlaine of France with fifty two Lords and seuenteen hundred Gentlemen slaine in the field. King John himselfe, his sonne Philip, two Bishops, thirteene Earles, and one and thirty Lords taken prisoners by the Prince, to his great praise and confirmation of his iust cause.

(25) Nor was the punishment of the father any whit lessened in King Charles the sonne then reigning, who besides the intestine warres in his own dominions was by Gods iust iudgement stricken into a Lunacy, being vnable to gouerne himselfe much lesse his Kingdome, vpon which aduantage (as the French would haue it) King Henry now played; though it be most certaine he sought his right farre otherwise, for so it standeth vpon record dated the ninth of February and first of Henry the fifth his raigne, that he sent his Ambassadors vnto the French King, who could not be admitted to his presence, and him whom they employed to procure access was by the French committed to Prison: whereat King Henry most iustly conceiued a grudge. Paulus Emilius their owne Story-writer saith, that Henry King of England, sent honorable Ambassadors to demand in marriage the Lady Katherine daughter vnto the French King: which (as he saith) was neglected with this answer, that the King had no leisure to thinke on that businesse: whom Francisus Rosensius doth further enlarge, saying, the King scornfully smiling answered that France was neither destitute of Dukes, nor hee as honour, Richard Earle of Warwick was sent, themselves and attendants amounting to eight hundred horse: so as it stood in suspence whether their honorable presence more graced the assembly, or their learning or Iudgement bettered the whole body of the Councell: in somuch that two of these Bishops were there made Cardinals, and of the thirty in best esteeme appointed to asist the Cardinals in their Election of a new Pope, London, Coventree, Bath, and Wells were chosen, wherein Robert, Bishop of London was first nominated for Pope, and he first nominated him that succeeded, which was Otho Colonna by the name of Martin the first. Whose Coronation with great magnificence was celebrated of the five nations assembled, and this honour given to the English, that the Prior of Saint Johns was a supporter of the triple Crowne. Touching the decrees that this Councell enacted, let it suffice vs to know that Wicliffes bookes were condemned for heretical, that Iohn Hus (notwithstanding the Emperours safecouduet) and Ierome of Prague, were both of them burned. The holy maide Bridget canonized a Saint, and that England was made a nation in rancke before Spaine.

(36) The deaths of these two diuine manie lamented, especially the Bohemians, who had reaped much fruit from the seed they had sown, for whose doctrine they sent a defence vnto the same Councell, and often became humble Petitioners for their liues, as largely appeareth in their letters written on their behalfe; in whom may truly bee verified that the blood of the Martyrs is the seed of the Church, which so increased in the parts of Bohemia that Pope Martin fearing all would be dard (Zisca the scourge of the Papacy then in Arms to defend them) sent for aid out of England, to repress the Lollards (as hee termed them) and published his Bulls against those Heresies, with as terrible roarings as usually were his Cryadoes against the Turkes.

(37) His Legate for these holy warres, he made Henrie Beaufort, the rich Cardinal of Winchester, who with foure thousand English assisted with a subsidie of the Clergies Grant, did there verie valiantly for certaine months together, vntill hee was recalled by the Pope: wherein Countie Zisca (though euer a victor) lost both his eyes, and being blind led forth his army with such terror to his foes, as his name became fearefull, and oft-times was sufficient to attaine victory without any stroke, in somuch as hee commanded his owne skinn to bee slead off after his death, and to bee made the head of their drum, affirming that the very sound thereof, would drive the enemy out of the field. But from these Church matters and Prelates proceedings, let vs returne from whence we haue slept, and continue the affairs of our famous K. Henry hauing now set footing in France.

(38) His followers and fellows in these new begonne warres were his two brethren the Dukes of Clarence, and Gloester, as also his vnclies the Duke of Torke, and Earle of Dorset, accompanied with the Earles of Kent, Cornwall, and Huntington, besides a most noble fellowship of the other Lords, Barons and men at armes: with these from Kideaux hee marched towards Harflew, affecting that Towne the first, being a port commodiously seated vpon the mouth of the Riuier Seyne, and a safe entrance vnto his intended Conquest, as well for the landing of his men, as to hinder the passage vnto Roane and Paris, both which receiued traffique by the same Riuier.

(39) The Towne being seated betwixt two hills, that next the Sea the King tooke, at the foote whereof, he cauled a deepe trench to be cast, bringing in water to impeach the bottom, and raising the rampier to a great thicknes, whereon he erected many sconces of earth like vnto Castles, set thicke together: for betwixt them, there was not aboute a cubite wide, for the Souldiers to fallie as occasion serued: the trench thus finished, from the rocke to the Sea, his horses, munition, and victuals all brought a shore, with his whole armie, the King marched vp the hill, and from the height presented himself before Harflew. His brother Clarence hee sent with certaine Regiments of horse and foote, to lodge vpon the other hill, which before he could approach, (by reason of the nature of the ground and way) hee was forced to march fullie nine miles: which hill attained, he commanded his ships to cast anchor as neere the Towne as with safety they might, whereby the place became besieged both by land and Sea, then mounted he his Artillery, began his mines, brought his workes close to the Counter-scarpe of the ditch, prepared faggots to fillit, and presently wanne the bafe Towne.

(40) Within the Towne it selfe Monsieur Graucourt was Generali accompanide with Guyllay de Stouteuile Chastellaine de Beauuais Lionet de Brucquemont and others to the number of an hundred Knights and Squires, who with the Towne-men issued out of the Basille, vpon that quarter where Huntington, and Cornwallay, by whom with losse on either side, they were beaten backe, the gates fired, some breaches made, and fireworks shot into the streetes, to no little annoyance of the besieged, but nothing dismayed them more, then did the Mines made vnder the wals: against which though they within countermined, and came to fight hand to hand with the besiegers, yet they saw it litle preailed, the wals being ready to fall, and such batteries therein already made, as they well perceived K. Henry was resolved to carry the towne by assault: wherupon Monsieur de Graucourt foreseeing the eminent danger, demanded a Parley, promising to render the towne if it were not relucied by a certain day assigned.

(41) And albeit that Iehan de Boncignis, and Charles de Albues Marshall, and Constable of France, the one at Candeube Castell, the other in Harflew, either of them hauing in their companies one thousand and five hundred men at Armes, were yet so curbed by the English, that no great seruice they did, and lesse hope was looked for from the French king, whose strengthes were not ready as the Dolphin returned answere, either to remoue or relieue the siege at Harflew; wherupon the twenty two of September, Graucourt the Gouernour with twenty foure selected Capitaines and Burgeises came to King Henry, who fate in his Paulion vnder a cloth of estate, his Noblemen about him, and the Earle of Kyme vpon his right hand, bearing his casket, whereon was an imperial Crowne set with stones of great price: The Gouernour and the rest prostrating themselves at the Kings feet, deliuered vnto him the Keyes of the town, according to the couenants betwixt them comprised, which was a respite for five dayes, and then if no succour came to surrender the towne vnto the king, & to deliuer into his hand thirty of their chiefest personages: to stand for life or death at his owne pleasure, the rest to depart without armor, weapons, or any of their goods.

(42) Harflew thus surrendered in so short a siege continuance, the King sent Thomas Earle of Dorset with sufficient troupes to possesse the Gates, who then erected the Kings Standard, and Saint Georges banner vpon the principall Ports, and assured the Towne with guards competent. Morouer, he sent the said Monsieur de Graucourt, and with him Guyen King at Armes vnto the Dolphin to let him know, that hee would stay eight dayes in Harflew, to expect his comming, where they might treat of an accord, whereunto himselfe was wellinclined, if hee were not obstinate, for his purpose was not to demand more then his right, and if they could not accord, for the sparing of Christian blood, he was pleased to decide the quarrell by single combat between them two.

(43) His entrance into Harflew was not as Cassars into Rome with Coronets, Ensignes, and Triumphe, a treading his Chariot, but in a more humble humble manner hee passed along the streetes barefooted, vntill hee came to the Church of Saint Martin, where with great deuotion hee gaue most humble thanks vnto God for this his first achieved enterprise. Then that the Towne might be English, and free from French dangers, hee made proclamation, that whosoeuer of his English Artificers would transport themselves vnto Harflew, houses should there bee giuen to them and their heires whereby in short time the towne was repeople with English Artisans. Here King Henry abode the space of twelue or fiftene dayes, expecting an answer of his message sent to the Dolphin; but the time prefixed (and more dayes expired) hee commanded his souldiers to furnish themselves with victuals for eight dayes, leauing his vnclie Thomas Beauford Earle of Dorset Gouernour of Harflew, himselfe with two thousand horse, and thirteen thousand foot, marched towards Calis through the Countie of Caux and Eu.

(44) The French Court notwithstanding it swarmed with factions (whilst vnder a weake and braine-sicke King) the great ones fought to make themselves greater, and the common enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dolphin, his brother of Ponthieu, the King of Sicily, the Dukes of Berry and of Britaine, with the whole force of France assembled at Roan, and in Councell concluded, that the English should bee fought with, before they got Calis, and forthwith decreed to endamage King Henry on his way, which presently was attempted. For besides their continual skirmishes vpon his marching Army, they brake down the Bridges, plained the woods, intrenched the wayes, stricke stakes in the Foords, and in places of aduantage, laid store of souldiers to empach his passage, and conuayed all victuals out of the Countie, through which hee should goe; whereby they well hoped, as a Deere taken in the toile, so both hee and his host should haue beene insinared, who now was approached to Pirron, with purpose to haue passed the riuier Seame at Blanchetage: but there the French had fortified against him, so as hee well saw that was not the way; and thereupon changing his Counsell, hee marched by Wormes, and lodged at Baillev, with an intent to haue passed the riuier at Port le Remy, but that also guarded, he kept along the Riuier to Hargeff, the French Army marching vpon the other banke, vnder the leading of Charles de Albret Constable of France.

(45) Henry still seeking to get ouer Seame, meant to assay it, euen to the head, and passing by Amiens, Bomes, and Corbie, in a valley adioyning, there lodged his host, where hee commanded his Archers to prouide stakes harpened at both ends, which afterwards stood them in singular good stead: Then hearing by his spials that the water was passable at Bethencourt, by the negligent guard of them of Saint Quintins, hee got ouer the riuier. His souldiers both weary and faint, many of them sicke, and their provisions spent some twelue dayes before, were forced to feed vpon nuts, roots, and Berryes, such as they could get, and their drinke was the water that ranne in their way.

(46) The day they spent with great toile and long march, the nights were cold and wet, and no where good lodging, alwayes standing vpon their owne guard, and the French alwayes swarming about them without intermission. These things moued Henry as the French Writers report, to proffer the restitution of Harflew, with other holds in Normandie, and to make satisfaction for the harms done in France, to suffer him free passage vnto his Towne of Calis. But certaine it is, that great reliefe hee got by the iustice and piety that hee liued in those parts: for albeit hee was in the midst of his enemies, and his Souldiers pinched with penury and want, yet made hee Proclamation vpon paine of death, that none of his Army should rob any Church: wherein a souldier offending, hee cauled restitution to be made, and commanded the stealer to be put to death: the fame of which piety moued the people (albeit they were forbid by the French King) plentifully to supply the fainting English with their owne provisions.

(47) But the Nobility vnderstanding that the English had got ouer Seame, the Constable, the Dukes of Orleanse and Bourbon, sent vnto Henry an Herald with defiance, demanding battell vpon Thursday following; which the English King granted, but therein failed, faith the French Secretarie, and tooke his march towards Calis without any stay. True it is, that Henry was not desirous of fight, his impediments being such as wee haue said, and therefore returned answere, that he meant to keepe on his march vnto Calis, and would not seeke them: but if they would disturbe him, he committed the issue thereof to God, assuring himselfe that it would bee to their owne great danger and perill, and so passing forward to Forcenil, to Bonyers, to Leffailon, to Baugy, vpon Thursday the 24. of October, hee came to Azincourt, where the French in a field of aduantage (purposely chosen) in the County of Saint Paul, and neere vnto Azincourt had pitched their Banner rally, with an infinite host, whereof the Constable of France had the conduct.

(48) His power (saith Parradin) consisted of an hundred and fifty thousand horse (besides them for carriages which were innumerable) wherein were ten thousand men at Armes, all of them (a very few excepted) Princes, Noblemen, Knights, and Esquiers. The Vanguard was led by the Constable, the Dukes of Orleanse, and Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and Bouciquais the Marshall, Dampier the Admiral, Guyard Dolphin de Auuergne, and Cluuet of Brabant. The maine battell, by the Duke of Barre, the Earles of Alencon, Neuers, Blauumont, Salines, Grandpre, and Rouffe. And the rereguard by the Duke of Brabant Earles of Charle, Eurquenberge, and Monsieur de Lornay; the right wing was commanded by Arthur Earle of Richmond, and the left by Lewis de Bourbon, Count de Yendosme great Master of France, whole particular retinues Franciscus Rosenius doth largely declare: all ranged together in their array appeared to the eye (saith Parradin) fixe times to exceed the English, but Peter Diuors esteemed them to bee ten times more.

(49) King Henry seeing himselfe so farre ingaged, and many of his men sicke of the fluxe, sent the second time vnto these assembled Princes his profers, to surrender Harflew, and what else he had won, so as without disturbance he might depart for Calis. Whereunto the Constable and Marshall were willing, but the other young Princes despising the small number of their aduerariies, refused all conditions of peace, and were not only negligent in the duties of Commanders, but with an assurance of victory diuided the pray, disposed of prisoners, and prepared a Chariot to carry the captiue King in triumph; commanding the Cities and Townes adioyning to ring their bells, and to render thanks vnto God, who had deliuered their enemies into such place of aduantage as an assured victory must presently follow: and so confident were they thereof, that they sent to King Henry to know what ransom he would giue. But faith Chartier, what answere the King made, is vncertaine: for that all who were priuie therunto, were flaine, the Duke of Orleanse only excepted, and he a prisoner retained in England. They also sent for King Charles, and the Dolphin his sonne (then residing in Roane) to come in their persons vnto the battell, that so they might haue the honour of the field. Whereat the Duke of Berry was highly offended, and aduised the contrarie, laying before the King the hazard of warre, out of his owne experience, being himselfe at the battell of Poytiers, where King Iohn vnturnately was taken by the English, which proued (as he alleged) a great breake-necke vnto France.

indifferent, the French gallant, fresh, and through vain hope of honour, already mounted above men of meane rancke, the English weake, weary and forestarved, made no such shew, and yet their courage no lesse then the other. The one spending the night before Battell, in Feasts, Triumphes, and other like sports, distributing their Captives, dividing their spoiles, and decreeing none to be slayed but the King, and his nobles; all others must die or be incurably maimed: the other trimming their armour, sharpening their speares, buckling their armour, and refreshing their bodies for the next day; and besides other observances, by the light of the great fiers made in the French Campe, the English discerned what was therein done, and took the advantage of their order and ground.

(51) The morning approached, the French took the field, thronging forward, who should be first to this most easie and certaine victory (as they took it) their greatest strength consisting in horse. Against whose violence King Henry commanded two hundred strong bow-men to lodge in a low meadow, where a deepe ditch full of water might secure them from the horse, and the bushes cover them from sight. These having stakes prepared and shod with Iron at both ends, were appointed to stick them remote-wise in the ground, yet so that they might be removed as occasion was ministered, to guard them from the danger of the horse: which policy accomplished, King Henry (whose hope was in God, and the goodness of his cause) about ten of the clocke raunged his English, against the French then in field: he disposed his host into three battels, placing his bow-men on both sides of the maine.

(52) The vanguard, consisting of Archers, was led by Lord Edward, (his cosen) the Duke of York, & with him the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. In the maine Battell all in complete and bright shining armour, the King rode himselfe, his shield quartered with the royal achievements of England and France, upon his helmet he wore a Coronet, the circle whereof glittered with pearle and stones of an vnestimable price: his horse of a fierce courage carried as he went, the bridle and furniture of Goldsmithes worke, and the Caparisons most richly embroidered with the victorious Ensignes of the English Monarchy: Before him in gold and glorious colours the Royall Standard was borne, and many other banners in warlike order waied with the winde.

(53) The French had framed their Battels into two sharpe fronts, as intending with their points to haue runne through the English Squadrons; altogether relying vpon their horsemen, and shining in bravery with an incredible excess. And for the beauty and honourable horror of both the Armies, no heart can iudge of, vnlesse the eye had seene it, the Banners, Ensignes and Pennons streaming in the ayre, the glittering of armours, the varietie of colours, the motion of Plumes, the Forrells of Lances, and the thickets of shorter weapons, made so great and goodlie a shew; but the silent expectation of the bloody blast was as the bullet ramd into the Canon, whose roaring voice is not so soone heard, as the stroke of death felt by the aimed-at marke.

(54) The Battels thus raunged a while stood still, and faced each other euen in the face: The French (whether vpon error like to that of Pompeis at the Battell of Pharsalia where Cæsar was victorious, or to draw the English farther from their advantage of ground, is altogether vnknowne) but certain it is, that King Henry was resolved to open his way for Calis over the Enemies bosome, or else to die: and thereupon with a cheerefull countenance and words full of courage, he comforted his followers and said. "My most faithfull Companions and worthy soldiers, we now goe into the field of honour, and to the worke of manhood, which your great valours so long haue expected and praised for; loe this day "is now come, and your worke the noblest in the world; pour forth therefore your utmost forces, that ages may know what the lance, the Axe, the sword and the bow can doe in the hand of the valiant: Whosoever therefore desires riches, honour, and rewards here he shall find them. Nimium hæc mediæ pascuit Denu omnia Campo. When he had thus said, his army fell prostrate on the ground, and committed themselves vnto God every man taking into his mouth a peece of earth, in remembrance of his owne mortality, (being thereof made) or of the holy Communion whereof hee was incorporated to be a partaker; and so resolved, arising, the King with cheerefull countenance commanded his Standard to aduance forward, saying, because our iniurious enemies doe attempt to shut vs out, let vs vpon them in the name of the most glorious Trinity, and in the best boare of the whole yeere.

(55) The ranging of the Battell King Henry committed to an old experienced Knight called Sir Thomas Erpingham: who with a warder in his hand lead the way, which when he saw time hee threw vp into the ayre, whereat the whole army gaue a great shout; which done, he alighted from his horse, & came to the King, who was in his place on foot. The French beholding this Offer, kept still their forward standing, which the English perceiving, made forward and came on, giuing another shout, when immediately the Archers, layd in the meadow, darkened the ayre with a shower of sharpe arrowes, most fearfull to the sight, but more deadly to be felt, and withall, the English charged their Battell with an admirable Courage; the most of them for nimblenes being but halfe clothed, without hat, and bare-legged. And such was their courage notwithstanding their wants, as he that ere while could scarcely bend his Bow, is able now to draw his yard-long arrow to the verie head, whose roaring marke was the flankes of the French, so rightly aimed at, and so strongly stucke on, that their sides were altogether larded with arrowes, whereby the vanguard was instantly distressed, and disordered into such a confused presse, as they were not able to vfe their weapons at any advantage. Their wings likewise assayed to charge the English, but Monsieur de Lignie in the one not well seconded by his troopes was forced back: and Guillaume de Surres charging home in the other, was slaine. The Battalions now broke, for safety fled to the Main, where they breed both feare and confusion by the vnruines of their wounded horses, so galled with arrowes as they could not be governed.

(56) The first troope of the French horse, were exquisitely appointed, whereon their riders much presumed, and meant to haue burst through the Archers with a violent course, but they giuing backe left their sharpe pointed stakes sticking, which till then were vnlesse the French supposing the Archers had fled, came on with their horse vpon the spur, and that in such heat, as the earth seemed to tremble vnder their thundering feet, and being forced forward, without foresight of danger carried their proud Riders into the iawes of destruction: for falling by troopes vpon those goaring stakes, they were miserably ouerthrowne, and paunched to death. The tempests of arrowes still whirling in the ayre sparkled fire in their fells from the helmets of the French, and with their Steele heads, rang manie thousands their knels that dolefull day, who like to come cut downe with the scith, fell by whole plumps in that fatal field; the English still following the advantage: against whom Anthony Duke of Brabant, hoping by his example to encourage others, followed with a few turned head, and brake into the English Battell, wherein manfully fighting hee was slaine.

(57) With the like manhood Duke Alençon a lusty French Lord, pressed into the Battallion where King Henry fought, and encountering Humphrey Duke of Gloucester the Kings brother, both wounded

ded and ouerthrew him, to whose rescue if Henry had not come, he had died more honourable then afterward hee did, for King Henry befriding him, deliuered his laid brother from danger, and wanne himselfe much honour by the deed. Alençon then coped with King Henry in fight, and with his Axe cut a part of his Crowne, which blow was so furie laid on, that there with his helmet was battered vnto his brow, but the Lyon enraged, with redoubled strength, stroke the French Gallant vnto the ground, and slew two of his men that seconded their Master. The Duke thus downe, cried to the King, I am Alençon, whom Henry sought to haue slayed, and so had done, had not the deafe cares of reuenge stoppall found of life, against him, that so had endangered their Soueraigne Lord.

(58) The French Reregard surprised with feare, at the disaster of the vanguard, and the maine battell fled, not striking one stroke (except some principall leaders and they not many) the English horsemen fetched a compasse and wheeled about vpon their backs, which no sooner was perceived, but that the rage of fighting was ended, and the worke of killing began; as by the words of Walsingham doth manifestly appeare: The way (saith he) is at length made by fine forces; the French did not so much gaine place, as fall dead to the earth: for when they saw those beaten indeed vnder foot, whom they reputed invincible, their minds forthwith grew amazed, and such anie fear came lyd through their marrow, that they stood still like senselesse Images, while our men wrested weapons out of their hands, and slew them therewith as beasts. Slaughter then had lost the stay of itselfe, and fight did follow no longer, but all the warre was made at throates, which (as it were) offered themselves to be cut, neither can the English kill so manie of the enemies, as may be killed. Thus therefore the whole glory of the French name is almost perished, by the hands of those few, whom immediately before they held in most extreme contempt. But the sword now made weary and drunke with blood, all danger past, and humanity retired, prisoners were taken, and liues spared, which hitherto was neglected, least mercy might haue proued the destruction of themselves.

(59) Whilst the King was thus busied, & the success of the battell in dispute, his carriages (but slenderly guarded) by the French were assailed, & all made spoile of, that was to be had. The Captaines of this cowardly enterprize, were Robinet de Bourneville, Risslant de Clumasse, and Lambert de Agincourt, with fixe hundred Pealants, who had turned their faces at the first brunt of Battell, as men of better practise to pilfer, then to purchase by manhood the spoiles of the field.

Where among other things they found a rich Crowne and sword, which they bare away in triumph, while, sayning that King Henry was taken, and as a prisoner followed their troopes, the fight of certaine English prisoners by them taken and led away confirming the report more strongly in the beholders conceit. But King Henry breathlesse, and in heat of blood, seeing certaine new troopes of the King of Sicils appeare in the field, and the same strong enough to encounter with his weary men, fearing (as hee had cause) that the Bourbon Battallion vpon sight of fresh succours would gather into a body, and againe make head, considering withall how his men were over-charged with multitudes of Prisoners, who in number surmounted their Conquerours: that the charge would be double at once, to guard and to fight, and that the prisoners would be ready vpon every advantage to take armes and free themselves from their takers: these and other necessities constraining, King Henry contrary to his wonted generous nature, gaue present commandement that every man should kill his Prisoner, which was immediately performed, certaine principall men excepted. Which done, and falling againe in Order, hee sent his Heraulds vnto these troopes assembled, commanding them forthwith to come vnto Battell, or else to depart the field; either of which if they delayed, he threatened to reuenge with their deaths, without any redemption or mercy; at which severe sentence their hearts were so daunted, that with shame and dishonour they departed the field. The base surprisall of the Kings carriages, (the only cause as some alleage of the French prisoners death) was so ill digested by the French themselves, that the Duke of Burgundie imprisoned the Actors thereof, and was minded to haue put them to death, had not his sonne the Count of Charolais mediated for them, vnto whom they presented King Henries rich sword, the guards whereof was gold set with stones of great price.

(60) The day almost spent in spending French blood, and euening approaching nere the set of the Sunne, the field cleared, and no enemy scene, the reate was founded, and all were assembled to giue thanks vnto God; which done, while his souldiers pillaged the dead, King Henry sent for Montjoy herault at armes in France, and for other heraulds both English and French: vnto whom he said, we haue not of our selues made this great slaughter, which the sword in our weake hands hath laid at our feete, but the Arme of God for the offences (no doubt) of the French hath done it, whose blood let now rest vpon their owne heads, and wee guiltlesse in following our right: and then demanding the name of the place, was answered, it was Azincourt, then said he, to all posterities following, this Battell shall be called the Battell of Azincourt. Thus dismissing the heraulds, he returned to Amfoucelles, where he lodged the night before. The spoile was great, and the pray rich in armour, jewels, and apparel, for which by the Countrey Peasants many (left as dead) were stripped stark naked, who afterward crept from the place, but most of them mortally wounded without reliefe, lay in great dolor and died in the ditches: so certaine is the calamity of warre, and vncertaine the sword till it bee quietlie sheathed.

(61) King Henry lost his cosen Edward Duke of York, and the Earle of Suffolk that day, besides some others, the French writers say three or foure hundred, yet Caxton will haue them but twenty and fixe: and Paulus Emilius addeth to the two slaine Lords, two Knights and only ten priuate souldiers, without anie more; vnto whom an ancient manuscrypt addeth * David Gam an Esquire, and twenty eight priuate souldiers, affirming confidently, that no more of the English died that day.

(62) A farre larger role is writ of the French, slaine at this Battell, yet diuers and different among their owne Authors, the true Catalogue as wee cannot certainly set downe, yet as wee haue many Collections we will deliuer the same in part, and referre the rest to be scene vpon the record: Only naming the Officers and Leaders in the same field either slaine, or taken Prisoners, by this famous King Henry in this his triumphant and fortunate day.

To bee short, Jehan Tillet saith, that there were ten thousand slain, and almost as many more taken: and most of their owne writers account the successe of this Battell to be with the slaughter of foure thousand Princes, Nobles, Knights, and Esquires: but the history of Normandy accounted eight thousand to be slain of that ranke, whereof an hundred and twenty bare Banners: among whom died foure Dukes, nine Earles, one Archibishop, and ten thousand common souldiers, as the Heraulds relation in that behalfe hath reported.

(27) Prisoners of account taken in this field, were Charles the Duke of Orleans, and John Duke of Bourbon, Arthur Earle of Richmond, extremely wounded and left for dead, as he lay gasping among the slain, was by the English recovered and retained their Prisoner. Louis de Bourbon Com de Vendosme was there taken Captive, was Charles Earle of Eu, being carried into England, where he remained prisoner twenty three yeres. Others of great account were likewise taken and put to ranfome, as Edward de Rouen, Oliner de la Feild, and Jehan Giffart, with these and many more the next day King Henry marched to Callis, leaving the French to search for their wounded, that in ditches and bushes had made their heavy beds: In commiseration whereof, the Counte Charlois extreme penfive for the losse of his vncles, and other his friends, in charity came to the field, and caused the dead to be buried, the charge whereof he committed to the Abbot of Roussauville and the Bailiffe of Ayre, who inclosed a peece of ground with a deep ditch of two hundred and fifty yards square, fencing it with an hedge of thornes against the rauenings of dogs and wolues. Wherein were interred fife hundred and eight thousand Christian carcases, in regard whereof it was sanctified by the Bishop of Essex, and made a Churchyard.

(28) The Duke of Britaine with his forces was cometo Amiens within two daies march of Azin-court to ayde King Charles, but the French vpon a conceited assurance of victory, would not stay his coming: who now hearing of the glorious day obtained by the English, dismissed his troupes, and retired to his owne Countrey, not meaning any more to intermeddle in the warre betwene England and France. Now King Henry vpon Saturday the 26. of October, being the next day after Battell, tooke his march towards Callis, but in passing the field wherein they had fought, he caused search for all the English, which he caused to be entered according to their estates. But the Bodies of his slain cosen the Duke of Torke, and of Michael de la Poole Earle of Suffolke, hee tooke away thence, carrying them both into England, and so passing to Gushes with his Prisoners hee entered Callis, whither, those left at Harflew resorted, to pay their ranfomes to them assigned.

(29) His host now refreshed and courage augmented, it was disputable in Counsell, whether the King should retorne againe into France, to pursue his enterprize already begun, or else to imbarke for England. But the time of yeeres spent, the winter wet, and the field Camps very much subiect to fluxes, wherewith many of his souldiers were as yet infected, and more vnhaled of their wounds; it was thought fittest to make for England, and the sooner, for that victuals became somewhat scarce in Callis. These things premised, King Henry vpon the sixteenth day of November spread sayles for England, and in the passage was met with such stormes, that his French Prisoners were in as great feare, as they had bene in danger at the Battell of Azin-court: but arrived at Douer and all dangers past, vpon the three and twenty of November in triumph wife hee made his entrance into London, foure hundred Citizens riding before him in red and white hoodes, the gates and streetes were garnished with Pageants, and the Conduits plentifully pouring forth sweet wines. The religious men met him with procession, and foureteen mitted Bishops attended his approach vnto Saint Pauls, where, out of the Centers the sweet Odours filled the Church, and the Quier chanted Anthems cunningly set by note: in all which the honour was ascribed only vnto God, the King fo commanding it. And so farre was he from the vaine ostentation of men, that he would not adorn his broken Crowne, nor bruiet armour to be borne before him in shew, which are the vntall Ensignes of warlike triumphes. The Citie presented him a thousand pound in gold, two golden basons worth fife hundred pound more, which were received with all Princely thanks.

(30) And now to doe the last office of a souldier for those two noblemen slain at Azin-court, hee willed the body of the Duke of Torke to be interred in his Colledge at Fetheringhay in Northamptonshire, and the Earle of Suffolke at Woburne in Oxfordshire, commanding most of his Bishops and Abbots to celebrate the Exequies in London, whereunto likewise resorted his vncle Dorset the Governor of Harflew, whom for his good seruice done, he created Duke of Exeter, and gaue him a thousand pound by yeere out of his owne Exchequer: but in his absence some attempts were made by the French against the said Towne, whereby he was enforced the sooner to retorne.

(31) The calamities of these times by the stirred schismes of the Church, and these bloody warres among Christian Princes, Sigismund the Emperour a man of great wisdom and integrity, much lamented at the Councell of Constance, & as another Constantine solicited the three stiffe stirring Popes vnto vniuty, but failing of that purpose, from those parts hee trauelled into France, and thence into England: seeking to make peace betwixt these two Western Monarchs, the better to withstand the common knowne enemy of Christendome the Turke. King Charles hee solicited first, finding him in words very forward, with many faire shewes to imbrace the motion, whereupon taking with him the Archibishop of Rheims as Ambassadour from the French King, came vnto Calis, where he was most honourably entertained by the Earle of Warwicke, Deputy of the Towne, and diuers other Lords sent thither by King Henry to attend him, as also thirte of his tallest shippes to waite him to Douer gallantlie rigged and manned with a noble traine. The Duke of Glocester accompanied with many of the nobility, was appointed to receiue him at Douer, where they attended his coming.

(32) The Emperour arrived, and ready to take land, Glocester and the other Lords with their drawne swords entered the water, and thus spake to the Emperour, that if his Imperiall Maiesty intended to enter as their Kings friend and mediator for peace, they would receiue him with all willingness accordingly, but if as an Emperour to claime any authority in England, which was a free Kingdome, they were there ready to resist and impeach his entrance. Which rough demand being most mildly answered by Sigismund, he had present access, and by them was attended towards London.

(33) This worthy Emperour, King Henry greatly respected, as well for his owne worths, and the amity held euer with the house of Beane; as also for that he had married Barbara the daughter of the Earle of Zillie the Kings Cosen Germane removed. His entertainment was Princely, and charges altogether borne by King Henry, who the more to honor him at Windfore, solemnly enstalled him Knight of the Order of Saint George or Garter, with a most sumptuous fest purporely prepared, at which the Emperour sat in his Collar and Robes; but not following the cause for which he came, hee instantlie vrged the peace for France, wherein he was gentle heard heard by the English King, but vpon new displeasures for some losse of men in the Territories of Roane, the motion at that time was dashed, and would not proceed, least (as King Henry alleaged) the French should suppose that a small losse had weakened his spirits: yet the Emperour continuing his intercession for peace, had brought it to that passe by his pety persuasions, as had not the French that verie instant besieged Harflew both by Sea and land, it had bene effected.

(34) For not long before Thomas Earle of Dorset, having made a roade into the County of Caux, was fet vpon by the Earle of Armignac Constable of France with other strong men at Armes neere vnto Vadmont, who fo distressed the English, that Dorset tooke into a Garden for defence, and having had priuate conference there with the Constable, early before day, departed with the losse of foure hundred men. Armignac puffd vp by his got victory, with his French powers followed the English in a hasty march toward Harflew, and vpon the lands intercepted their passage, where betwixt them a cruell conflict was perourmed, with the ouerthrow of the French, and flight of the Constable, who retired to Nonfrenvillier for safety.

(35) This his unlucky attempt hee tooke greatly to heart, and therefore purposing to repurchase again his honor, hee determined for Harflew, where hee set downe his land siege, before the English Garrison within, were well aware, when also the Picount Narbon Vice-Admiral of France, with a Fleet of tall shippes entered the haven, so that the Towne was begirt on every side as we haue said. King Henry hearing of these newes, called home his Ambassadours, which were the Bishop of Normich and Sir Thomas Erpingham in commission then at Beauvais, and in conference for a Peace, and the Emperour well perceiving that the French plaid vpon aduantage, and that King Henry was not of temper to, turne edge at their strokes, saw it vaine to prosecute the peace for France further, and therefore sought to enter league with the English himselfe, vnto the which King Henry was fo willing as hee confirmed the same vpon these Articles following.

(36) That the said Emperour & King, their heires & successours should be friends each to other as Allies and Confederates against all manner, of persons of what estate or degree locuer, the Church of Rome, and the Pope for the time being only excepted (for hee was the Master Bee that then lead the swarme.)

(37) That neither themselves, their heires nor successours should be present in Counsell or other place, where either of them, their heires or successours might sustaine damage in lands, goods, honours, states or persons: and that if any of them should vnderstand of losse or hinderance to be like to fall or happen to the others, they should impeach the same, or if that lay not in their powers, they should aduertise the others thereof with all convenient speed. That either of them, their heires and successours should aduance the others honour and commodity without any fraud or deceit. That neither of them, nor their heires or successours should permit their subiects to leauy warres against the others. That it should be lawfull and free for each of their subiects to passe into the others Countrey, and there to remaine and make merchandize either by Sea or land, paying the Customes, gables, and duties due and accustomed according to the Laws, and Ordinances of the places, and Countreys where they should traffique. That neither of the said Princes, nor their heires, nor successours should receiue any rebell, banished man, or traitour of the others willingly, but should cause euery such person to auoid out of their Countreys, Realmes, dominions, and Iurisdiccions. That neither of the said Princes, their heires nor successours should begin any other warres against any other person, other then such as they had warres with at that present without the consent of the other his Confederate, except in defence of themselves, their Countreys and subiects in case of inuasion made vpon them. That it should be lawfull for the King of England to prosecute his warres against France for the recovery of his right, as should seeme to him expedient, and for the Emperour, for the recovery of any part of his right retained by the French. Lastly, that either of them should assit other in recovery and Conquest of their rights, lands and dominions, withheld and kept from them, by him that calleth himselfe King of France, and others, the Princes and Barons of France. These conclusions and agreements bare date the 19. of October, in Anno 1416. In the meane while the French that had felt the hard hand of the English, and seeing that Henry had with-drawne his commissioners for peace, King Charles made a league with the states of Genoua, requiring their aide against this dangerous enemy, who supplyd him with sixe hundred Crosse-bowes, and eight tall shippes of warre, and as many galleys with munition and victuals. These waiting the Seas with many brauadoes, King Henry in person meant to haue mette with himselfe, but the Emperour dissuading his purpose, the charge of that Enterprize was committed to John Duke of Bedford, accompanie with the Earles of March, Marshall, Oxford, Warwicke, Huntington, Arundell, Deuonshire, and Salisbury; these falling vpon the County of Narbon, a fierce encounter was begun, and long fought, till at length the victory fell to the English, so that the French Navy was most of them battered, suncke and taken; amongst others three great Carricks of the Genoues were sent to England, with whom the bastard of Burbon was brought away Prisoner; & the Vicount de Narbon, Le Sire de Montaigne, and Le Sire de Berrar chased into Britaine. This victorie obtained, the Duke past forward to the Towne of Harflew, and refreshed it with victuals without ante impeachment; for Armignac the Constable hearing how his Conforts had kept tunc on the Seas, thought it not best to set to their note, least his meane would not be heard, the bafe of this musick sounding too deepe, and therefore hee put vp his pipes, and got him to Paris. This seruice performed was so commended by the Emperour, as he openly said, that Realme was happy that had such a King, but the King more happe that had such subiects, and euer after held Bedford in a most speciall account.

(38) His affaires now finished, and Princely entertainments thankfully receiued, hee prepares for his retorne toward Germany, and King Henry to doe him the more honour would needs accompany him to his Towne of Calis, whither after their arrivalls the Duke of Burgogne repayed to doe his homage vnto the Emperour, which Burgogne some months before, had concluded a peace with the Earle of Warwicke in the behalfe of King Henry, for the Countreys of Flanders and Arthois. Henry therefore in hope of a further friendship with him, sent his brother the Duke of Glocester, and the Earle of March vnto Saint Omers to lye hostages with the Countie Charlois, for Burgognes passage and safe retorne, with whom hee sent Warwicke to conduct him to Calis.

(39) His entertainment was honourable both by the Emperour and King, which as acceptably hee receiued, and vnto Sigismund performed his homage, and with Henry renewed the truce for the time of two yeres, both which were fo distastie to the French stomacks, that the Emperour is taxed, hee came not with an intent to worke the good of France, but rather to augment her miseries by animating Burgundy to bandy against France: and that King Henry was putt with an humor of pride, his affaires fo prosperous against a weak King. But this buifnes ended, Burgundy returned to Grauling, Henry into England, and the Emperour toward Germany, being waited into the low Countreys with the Kings Fleet

(39) At Callis King Henry had made great proffers vnto Burgundy to enter with him into the warres against France, promising him part of his Conquests, and to spare and fauour all his vassals, allies, and friends, but Burgundy refusing the offers, remained his enemy for France, howbeit he sent Embassadors into England to treat a continuance of the truce, which was granted to the Commissioners to indure from the next Michaels-tide vnto Easter ensuing, which was confirmed at Porchester the 23. of Iulie and yeere of Christ 1417. For the signing whereof King Henry sent the keeper of his priuy Seale to Amiens where the Duke of Burgundy deliuered the same signed, which beganne in this sort. Iohannes Dux Burg. Comes Flandriae, Arthusa & Burgundiae, Palatinus, Dominus de Salina & Muchlina uniuersis presentes litteras inspicien: saluem, &c. datum in villa Ambianensis 17. die Mensis Aug. 1417. This notwithstanding the said Duke reuerted, and in Nouember following made a league (whereunto he was sworne) with the King and Dauphin of France against England, which his doings King Henry tooke nothing well. But his proceedings prospering in France hee called a Parliament at London, where the Lord Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, in the Kings behalfe made an eloquent Oration, declaring the great desire his Maister had to make Peace with the French, which their King norwith-standing resisted, and against the law of Armes denied vpon ranome to render his prisoners taken at Ag-incourt, so that the peace which was to be expected must be with the sword, concluding with this saying.
Let vs make warre that we may haue peace, because the end of warre is peace. Whereunto the whole body consented, and granted to the King a Subsidie and a Tenth which was graciously accepted, but was farre too short to defray the great Charge, so that he was forced to paunc his Crowne vnto the said Bishopp Beaufort his vnclie, for a great sum of money, as he did certaine Jewels to the Lord Maior of London for ten thousand Marks.

(40) Money thus got and the Seas made safe, King Henry purposed further to follow his fortunes in France, his aduantages many (as the French would enforce) through the weake-brained King, not able to correct the Factions of the Burgundian and Orleans, which troubled all France; and the death of Lewis the Dauphin whose funeral might haue bene solemnized by the mourners from Agincourt, his death (as was thought) happening immediately vpon that dis-tasture; and to heape more distractions vpon the miserable French, John the Kings second sonne and new made Dauphin, shortly left both his title and life, who together were entombed at Compeigne.
These, say the French, were the bane of the State, and the baits that made King Henry to bite, Norwithstanding wee shall finde them but curiaues to shadow the light if we looke into the proiect with an indifferent eye, for the Kings weakenes was supported by Burgogne Armagnac and other potent estates; Burgundy by Oath, made a mortal enemy against King Henry. Orleans in England a prisoner and without racket in hand could not bandy the Ball to marre the French plea: and as touching the deaths of the two Dauphins their raked vp ashes kept in the sparke that afterward was the only light of France, for these, (though Crowned) were not the pillars of strength able to sustaine the great weight of that Empire: The first a Prince of little valour, and great toyle, presuming to know much, and vnwilling to learne, busying himselfe with his selfe, and by his insufficiency rather troubled then managed the estate. The other, none of the wisest and of nature so remisse, that he was encready (as waxe) to take the stamp of anie impresse, but as the prouerbe is, let the loofers haue leaue to speake, and vs to relate our English French busineses.

(41) All now in a readinesse, King Henry with a puissant armie prepared his second expedition into France, his Fleet consisting of fifteene hundred saile, many Lords and men at Armes, the muster roll ingrossed with twenty five thousand five hundred twenty seven souldiers, euery fourth being a horseman, besides a thousand Carpenters, Artificers and Labourers: But before his departure he ordained his brother John Duke of Bedford to be the Protector of England in his absence, which done vpon the 28. of Iulie he tooke to Seas, the sailes of his owne ship, being of purple silke most richly embroydered with gold: and the first of August arriued in Normandy to such terror of the inhabitants that they fled further into the maine, leaving the Countrey bare of men and bestiall: Insomuch that twentie five thousand families of them repayed into Brittain, so dreadfull was the approach of the English.

(42) No sooner King Henrys foote had touched the shoare, but to the encouragements of his Marshal followers, he dubbed forth eight knights, and then sending to view Harflew laid his knee against Conquest, the strongest Castle in Normandy, which hee tooke the 16. of August, and gaue both it and the whole demaines belonging vnto his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence: And vnto Salisbury the leader of his second battell, he gaue the Castle Ambletters, which at the same time he had wonne, as also that of Louers vnto the Earle Marhall, and these were the first that were inuicled with any reueneue in France.

(43) Came to withstand the enemy was strongly fortified, well maned and victualled, so that nothing was wanting needfull for defence: yet the King fate downe before it, and his battery not working the expected effect, he attempted it by mine, and ruined some parts of the Wall: Notwithstanding the defendants made stiffe defence, and manfully put backe the entrance or scale. Neuerthelesse Henry seeing that they could not long subsist, vnwilling to carrie it in fury, which must bee the destruction of the Inhabitants, whom he fought to saue, and to make his true subiects, summoned them by an Herald, and promised them mercy: which they in hope of reliefe vtterly despised: thereupon his entry was forced, and great laughter made, till the King staied his souldiers furies, and caused the Citizens to disarme themselues, setting a strong guard aswell to keepe the spoilers from pillaging, as the Townemen from all hostile attempt: and they that did, were citril put to death or ranome, which was freele distributed among his Capitaines and souldiers, by which regular action King Henry got him the estimation of a great Capitaine, and an vpriht Prince.

(44) But whether by the working of the French, or by intigation of the discontented reformalists (as Walsingham hath it) The Scots would worke wonders in reuiuing a dead King Richard, that should indam-age the Lancastrians cause, and dispossesse King Henry of his Crowne: who now absent and forward of Conquest in France, at home was endangered by these his emulating neighbours, and his confines in hostile manner entered vpon, by the Duke of Albany, together with the Earle Douglas the Scottis Leaders: These bringing with them their flag-like K.
Richard, laid stiaite siege against Roxborough, and Bar-wicke, where all strates were attempted, by vndermining the wals, and turrets, all extremities vsed and nothing left vnattempted, that might annoy either by Sea or by Land.

(45) But Beauford Duke of Excester being at Bridlington in doing his deuotions, had present newes of this present necessity, and therefore scarce come to the end of his Orizons, he layd by his Beads and tooke to his armour, which was not rusty with lying, so lately put off, neither did John Duke of Bedford the Protector, forsooke any time, but with fixe thousand strong, repaired into the North, where, with the Earles of Westmerland and Northumberland,

his power was increased, vnto whom also the Archbishop of Yorke Henry Beves sided, with age so decre-pith, that he was borne into the field in his Chaire, the fame of whose coming, and the feare of their worthy Generals so daunted the Scots, that leauing their ladders and other engins of warre, in the night they broke vp their sieg, and well was he that could first attaine Scotland.

(46) The Kings affaires thus effected in the North, the Clergies eye-fore was also somewhat caused by the apprehension of Sir John Ouldcastle their disturber in the South, who not contented to set the God of Rome at nought, but likewise defaced the faces of his Saints, trimly limmed in their Letanyes and other like masse bookes; matter indeed of such moment, that the Abbot of Saint Albans (in whose precinct they were taken) sent these poore misfild and scratched faced pictures, to complaine of their iniu-ries vnto the King, but his peace not broken, for no blood was drawne, he remitted the offence and punishment thereof vnto Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, who sent them to Paules Croffe to shew their Contentuances vnto the people, the Preacher that day being their mouth, inuincing the offence to be done vnto the triumphing Saints in heauen.

(47) A Parliament assembled by the Regents authority for the supply of money to maintain the warres in France, a matter of as great importance was therein to be paid, and that was the apprehension and iudgement of the Lord Cobham, with a consideration of reward for his taker the Lord Powesse in wales, from whence fore wounded he was brought to Westminster before the Lords, and hauing heard his conuictions would not thereunto answer in his excuse, vpon which record and proceffe, it was adjudged that he should be taken as a traitour to the King and the Realme, that hee should be carried to the Tower of London, & from thence drawn through the streets vnto Saint Giles fields, and there to be hanged, and burned hanging, which accordingly was done. That N. D. author of the three conuersions hath made Ouldcastle a Ruffian, a Robber, and a Rebell, and his authority taken from the Stage-players, is more besitting the pen of his slanderous report, then the Credit of the iudicious, being only grounded from this Papist and his Poet, of like conscience for lies, the one euer flaining, and the other euer falsifying the truth: that Copus hath made the Lord Cobham a Traitour: and Stow from Otterburn allegeth Indentures drawne betwix him and the Scots, to bring in a Counterfeit Richard, and to inuade the land with forraigne power, that he acknowledged no King but the same Counterfeit in Scotland, and made himselfe a false Christ in rising againe the third day (as Walsingham will haue it) I am not ignorant: but his attainture of Treasons, I leaue it to the an-swere of Master Fox, who largely handled it: and for his combination with the Scots, vnto the letter of King Henrys owne hand, who hauing intelligence of the Scots intent, and the means by which they meant to worke, signifieth vnto his brother and vnclie in these wordes, as from the Originall is taken.

Part of a letter written with King Henrie 5. his owne hand to the Duke of Excester.

Furthermore I will that ye commune with my brother, with the * Chancellor, with my Cousen of Northumberland, and my Cousen of Westmorland, and that ye see a good order and ordinance for my North-Marches, and especially for the Duke of Orleans, and for all the Remnant of my Prisoners of France. And also for the King of Scotland, for as I am secretly informed by a man of right notable estate in this land, that there hath bene a man of the Duke of Orleans in Scotland, and accorded with the Duke of Albany that this next summer hee shall bring in the manuell of Scotland to sturre what he may. Also that there should be founden waies to the hauing away specially of the Duke of Orleans: and also of the Knights, as well as of the remnant of my forsaide Prisoners, that God defend. Wherefore I will that the Duke of Orleans be kept still within the Castle of Pomefret without going to Koberts place, or to any other disport, for it is better he lacke his disport, then we were deceived: of all the Remnant doth as yet thinketh.

(48) Wherein we see the Complot, but heare not a word that it should be of Cobham composing.
But as I affect not to iustifie the wicked, nor to make crooked things strait, so am I farre from discrediting authorities; only the eye of those times looking through the thicke foggy Cloudes, made the Sunne (which is bright in it selfe) to seeme in their sights all bloody and darke.

(49) The like troubles (though not for the like cause) happened vnto Queene Ioane in the Kings absence, and time of Bedford's regency, whose offence was Capitall, if the accusation were true; that shee should by forcery seeke the death of the King, shee therefore was committed to safe keeping in the Castle of Leedes in Kent, and from thence to Pomefret attended only with nine of her seruants: her Confessor Frier Randolph a Doctor of diuinity was likewise apprehended as her Counsellor and worker in this di-clicul art, for which he was committed to the Tower, where falling at words with the Parson of Saint Peters (the Church of that place) he was wounded to death; and Queene Ioane thereupon presentlie deliuered.

(50) King Henry proceeding in his Conquest of Normandy, about Hollantide laid sieg to the strong Towne and Castell of Fallais, continuing the same vnto the 20. of December, when the defendants not able longer to resist, demanded and had Parley, with whom Thomas Earle of Salisbury, Henry Lord Fitz-hugh, Sir John Cornwall, and Sir William Harrington Knights were by the King appointed Commissioners, who after some conference, lastly accorded vpon these conditions. 1. That if the King of France, the Dolphin, or Constable, did not by force raise the siege before the second of January ensuing, that the Towne should be rendred to Henry. 2. That all the strangers that were not properly Inhabitants of Fallais, and had formerly fought against King Henry in any place, besieged and taken within Normandy, should be left to his merie. 3. That all English Prisoners which were in the Towne should be set at liberty, ranome free and acquitted of their Oathes made vnto them whose Prisoners they were. 4. That all natiaues of England, Wales or Ireland, that had ser-ued against the King, should be left to his Iustice.
5. That neither Capitaine, Burgesse nor Townsman of Fallais should giue any reliefe to the Castell, or victuall or munition, during the truce accorded.
6. That no person within Fallais should receiue the Persons or Goods of any within the Castell, whereby they or their goods might be protected. 7. That the Capitaines and Souldiers should receiue no pre-iudice in their Horses, Armes, or Goods; great Artillery, Shorte, powder and Croffe-bowes excepted: but the strangers formerly spoken of in the second Article were exempted from that fauour.
8. That the Artillery, Powder, Shot, and Croffe-bowes afore mentioned, should not, during the truce, bee embazelled, wilfully broken, or made away.
9. That during the truce, the ruines made should not be repaired, and no new workes of defence erected. 10. That no oppression be vsed by the sayd Souldier vpon the Burgesse, and if any were found faulty and not presently banished for the same, they should loose the benefit which otherwise they should haue by the accord. 11. That no Capitaine, souldier, or Townesman should vnderhand conuay away any Prisoner, ornaments, Jewels, or Church Reliquies, either belonging to Fallais, or to any other Church or religious Houfe, that were brought thirther for safety. 12. That no goods should be purloined or carried out of the Town during the treaty.

13. That none of the Capitaines nor Souldiers, nor any Burgeisse should forsake the Towne, until the second of January next: and his Majesty of his grace and mercy, was pleased that all such as would remain in Fallais, should remain there in safety both in body and goods, so as they would be true subjects unto him. 14. That none of the defendants of the Castell should be received into the Towne, nor their goods secretly kept by the Inhabitants under any pretence or Colour whatsoever. 15. That during the treaty no assault or offence should be offered by the kings army, to the Towne or to the Inhabitants, so as they do not ayde, assist or relieve the defendants in the Castells. 1. That for the true performance of the Articles twelve knights & Squires should be delivered hostage to the King, and to be set at liberty when the Couenants above mentioned were fulfilled. These things concluded and subscribed with their names and seals, the 20. of December; upon the second of January no succours appearing, the town of Fallais was accordingly delivered, but the Castle standing obstinate, the king was as diligent, till the defendants failing in their spirits, the first day of February demanded a Parley. Whereunto Henry consented making Clarence his brother his sole Commissioner. The Articles accorded for the most part were as the former, whereto were added these which ensue.

(51) That upon the 16. of the said month of February, if the King in person, the Dolphin his sonne, or the Earle of Armagnac Constable of France, did not with force raise the siege, then Sir Olivier de Mauny Knight, Gouverneur of the said Castell, should render the same unto King Henry. 2. That the said Gouverneur and all other within the Castell should at the day assigned submit themselves to the King, and remain his prisoners, trusting to his Majesties royall promise not to receive offence either in life or goods: (Geoffrey Chastellain excepted) who was left simply to the Kings mercy. 3. That after the rendering of the said Castell Sir Olivier de Mauny the Gouverneur, should at his owne charges repaire all the breaches and ruines made in the walls during the siege, and leave it in the same fort as it was before the same was besieged. 4. That for the performance of these Articles, eight Gentlemen should remain Hostages with the King. 5. That when the Castell was prepared, Sir Olivier Mauny, and all his Company should be set at liberty, and until then to remain the Kings Prisoners, Geoffrey de Chastellain excepted. These agreements concluded, the Indenture subscribed, and King Henries seal of Armes therunto fixed, at the prefixed day according to these Articles the Castell of Fallais was rendered unto him: which done, he divided his Army into manie parts, under the severall conducts of the Dukes of Clarence, and Gloucester, and the Earle of Warwick: who vanquished Castells, himselfe the while marching to besiege Roane, where he set downe his siege, and began the assault in a furious manner: the defendants as obstinately bent to hold him out: so that to winne the Towne by force, Henry found it very difficult, as well for the strength of Bulwarks and Ramparts as for the number of hands within it, to make resistance, and therefore to reduce them by famine was his only designe.

(52) For Burgogne from King Charles had sent many worthy Capitaines with a thousand selected Souldiers to defend the City, and within it besides were fiftene thousand Citizens well trained and furnished: and the Towne stored with victuals for ten months continuance; notwithstanding K. Henry quartered about the Towne, and for his safety cast up a Trench betwixt the walls and his men: the River Seine hee blockt up with three Iron-Chains, one of them layd two foote above water, another with the leuell, and the third two foote under the water, to forbidde all reliefe unto the City by Boats.

(53) With the English, sixteene hundred Irish

Kernes were enrolled, from the Prior of Kilmaham, able men, but almost naked, their armes, were targets, darts, and swordes, their horses litte, and bare no saddle, yet very nimble, on which upon every advantage they played with the French, in spoiling the Country, rifling the houses, and carrying away children, with their baggage, upon their Cowes backs. Thus from June unto December the siege had continued, and now victuals failing, and the Towne in distresse, the Rouennois sent four gentlemen, and as manie Burgeisses, unto King Charles, and the Burgogne (then at Beauvais) to signify their miseries; fifty thousand already famished with hunger, and twelve thousand starvelings put out of the Towne, but not suffered to passe by the English, died by multitudes in the ditches, whose vnburied Carcasses did infect the Towne with contagious diseases, so that without present reliefe they must be enforced to render.

(54) Ayde was promised, and earnestly expected, but in stead of supplies, the Bishop of Beauvais accompanied with others, and the Cardinal of Vrsins sent from Pope Martin, were dispatched to King Henry, to entreat a peace, for the better accomplishing thereof, they brought with them the picture of the Lady Catherine, according to life, which King Henry well liked, yea and (as Serres saith) fell in love with: but demanding a hundred thousand Crownes with the Dutches of Normandy, Aquitaine, Anjou, and other Seignories for her dowry, nothing was concluded or done.

(55) And now the Rouennois helpeles of succour, and despairing of peace, resolved to make a braue rally upon the kings quarter: to performe which resolution, 10000. chosen men with their leaders issued out of the Towne, the vanguard (which was 2000.) being past and in fight, by misfortune the draw-bridge with over-weight of men brake, manie were drowned, slaine and hurt: neither was there any more passage that way, to releue their followers engaged in fight with the English; whereupon they made halt to the other Gates: but before they could come to give ayde, the vanguard was broken, and most of them slaine, and taken Prisoners. Upon this distresse the souldiers within mutined against Guy de Boullier their General, murmuring that he had continued the breaking of the bridge.

(56) In these distresses King Charles returning towards Paris, sent the besieged word to make what shift they could, which unexpected message strooke a sad feare into the miserable defendants hearts, who weake in men and victuals, knew no way to subsist, and thereupon in Counsell concluded to send unto Henry, which presently they did. For whose entertainment, he caused two tents to be set up at Port S. Hillarie. Their Commissioners were two gentlemen, two Clergie-men, and two Burgeisses of the Towne. Commissioners for the King were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Warwick: the demands of the Rouennois were many, but their answers were short; that no conditions would be accepted, but simply yielding to the kings mercy; whereupon the conference brake up, and these returned into the Towne, bred sundry distractions, some crying to yeeld, and other some crying to die like men, but Henry desirous to be Master of the Towne, and fearing it would be fired by themselves, if he was by force, made the Archbishop of Canterbury his Instrument, whose vocation was fittest to call again the Commissioners, and againe fell into treaty of Composition, which lastly was agreed, upon these Articles as follow. 1. That the Burgeisses should give unto Henry towards his expence in the siege, three hundred fifty six thousand Crownes of gold. 2. That Robert Linet vicar general to the Archbishop of Rouen, Jehan Tourdain who commanded the Canoniers, and Ailen Blanchart Capitaine of the Common people, should be left to his mercy without condition. 3. That all the people should sweare faith and loyalty to Henry and his Successors. 4. That Henry should protect and defend them against all men, and confirme unto them their priviledges, franchises, and liberties; which they had enjoyed ever since the time of Saint Lewis king of France. 5. That all such as had desire to leave the Towne, might freely depart, with his garments upon his backe only, and his goods to be confiscated unto King Henry. 6. That the souldiers should bring all their Armes to a place assigned, and should depart out of the Towne unarmed with a Cudgel in their hands, first taking their Oath not to beare Armes against Henry, for a twelue month next ensuing.

(57) This agreement was concluded the 16 of June Anno 1418. when as the hungry Citizens in multitudes came to the English Campe to buy victuals, which hee abounded with Prouisions, as a fat mutton was sold for fixe souldes of Paris money. Upon the next day following, Henry triumphant made his entry into Roane; the Ecclesiasticks of the Towne, in their miters and vestures, with their reliques, singing of Hymnes, conducted him to the Cathedral Church, where before the high Altar, upon his knees, he gaue thanks to God for the Conquest of this Towne, which had remained two hundred and fiftene yeeres in the possession of the French, euen from the time when Philip King of France won it from King John of England. The day followinge Ailen Blanchart the Capitaine of the common people was beheaded, Robert Linet, and Jehan Tourdain, put to their high ranfomes, the French Garriisons pillaged, unarmed, and put out of the Towne, but safely were conducted ouer Saint Georges-bridge to goe whither they would. Guy de Boullier, who was Capitaine general of Roane, became King Henries leigeman, unto whom he gaue all his lands, and a charge vnder the Duke of Gloucester. Immediately after the rendering of Roane, sundry other places of note yeelded themselves, as Caudebec, Montfrevillier, Diepe, Feschamp, Arques, Neufchastell, Deincourt, Eu, Moncheaux, Vernon, Mantz, Gorney, Harfleur, Pontenur-de-Mer, Molleneaux, Le Treict, Tancarville, Abrechier, Mauterrier, Valmont, Nonville, Bellaucombre, Fontaines, Le Bourre, Preaux, Neuquien-ville, Logemprer, Saint Germain, Sir Cagly, Baudemont, Bray Jille, Charles, Maifull, Les Boules Guillecourt, Fantesfontaines, Le Becq, Crepin, Backeuille, and diuers other places wherein Henry placed his Garriisons. France generally troubled, and trembling at the losse especially of Roane, Henry ready to pierce forward, and Charles declining through his infirmities encreasing; the Duke of Burgogne (who bare all the sway vnder that infirme King, and therefore much hated by the Dauphin, whose reuenge he feared,) much doubting Henries rising fortunes, held it best to vphold his owne greatness, by mediating a peace betwixt the two Kings. For which end he sent his Ambassadors to Henry, praying personal Conference; to which hee assented and assigned the place, which was at Melun, where in a field well trenched, and ramparted with strong Gates, two pavillions were arreard, the one for the Kings to repose themselves in, and the other for their counsell to consult in.

(58) Charles, Isabell, Burgogne, and Catherine, the Count Saint Paul, with a thousand horse garding them together, came first. King Henry with his brothers of Clarence and Gloucester, attended upon with a thousand horse, held the appointment; and now met, the two Kings embraced each others; Henry kissed Isabell and Katherine, who indeed became a precious pearle in his eye: Burgogne a little bending his knee, did his reuerence to Henry, who took him in his Armes; and the two nations though mortall enemies, demeaned themselves so civilly, as no cause of quarrell was offered on either side, much conference passed, but nothing concluded; Henries demands seeming to the French to be so vnreasonable. The treaty thus diffolved, and all ready to depart, King Henry not well pleased, spake thus unto Burgogne: "Cofen, I may not wel digest this refusal, but be you assu"red that either I will have your Kings daughter, and all my demands, or else I will banish both you, and them, out of France. You speake your pleasure, said the Duke, but before you shall thrust the King, and me, out of the Realme, you will be weary of the enterprise."

(59) The treaty thus broke, and danger nothing lesse, the Burgundians altogether French, and in heart no friend to the English, reconciled himselfe unto the Dauphin, which deed was loone after the cause of his owne death; and Henry displeased with this combination, quickened his thoughts (full of reuenge) to prosecute the warre more sharply then heretofore: the first enterprize he made, was upon Pontois, unto which Towne the last day of Iulie hee sent three thousand foote, which before the breake of day and not discovered by the Centinels, set their Ladders to the Walls, mounted vpon crying Saint George, and so opening a Port let in their Companions. The signeur de C. Isle-Adam Marshall of France and Gouverneur of the Towne, affrighted at the surprize, fled out at another Port towards Paris, after whose example about ten thousand Inhabitants did the like, so as the English without resistance were Masters of the Towne, where in great riches fell to the souldiers shares. When King Charles at Paris heard of the losse of Pontois, in great feare with his wife, daughter, Burgundy, and many noblemen, to be further from the fire so neere at hand, went unto Troyes en-Champagne, leaving Paris vnder the Government of the Count Saint Paul, and English de Laistre Chancellor of France, whilst Henry went forward with his intended enterprizes.

(60) For his brother of Clarence by three weekes siegeman the Castell Gisors by composition, the Earle of Huntington lacked Preaux, burnt Bretuill, Clermont, and the Castell of Venduill, and Henry himselfe besieged the Castell of Gaillard, and Rochewen, two of the strongest holds in Normandy; which vpon compositions were surrendered, and further procured more then the French wished. For the Dauphin, the only man that stood for the publike defence of France, was miserably poore, and for want of pay could make no great shew of follo wers in the field, whose chiefe Counsellor was the Constable Armagnac an old craftie foxe, that had euer sided with Orleans against the Burgundians. And now fearing least his owne esteeme should be lessened, or that Burgundy should be the Archite to crosse him the wife Architephell, or rather indeed thrust forward by destinee to be the scourge and fall of France, he counsellled the young Dauphin to seize vpon his mothers money, jewels and plate, for his further supply to the publike use, (which immediately hee did) to aduance the estate: but Queen Isabell impatient of these wrongs received in a womanish spleen studies the reuenge, wholly neglecting the common cause, which gaue the English surer footing in France, but the Dauphin to make good what hee had done, leades the King in ielousy that the Queens desires were dangerous, and altogether feare for the alienation of the Crowne, which hee weake man, no sooner heard then beleueed, being euer ready to take her at the worst and neuer ouergone in her loue at the best.

(61) These sparkes of sedition thus blowne in the Court, suspitions increasing, and maligners still working, Queene Isabell with her sister in law, the Dutchesse of Bauiere were sent prisoners to Blois, and from thence to Eours where they were kept with strait guard, three Gentlemen in Commission to take care of their safeties: till then her fauours had gone with Orleans, and with him had contested euergainst Burgogne, but now to quit her imprisonment, shee reconciled herselfe unto him, and solicited his assistance for her deliuerance; Burgogne well perceiving how much it would aduance his part, to draw the Queene to be of his faction, brake up his siege then laid before Corbeil, and with certaine choise troopes repaired toward Troyes, from whence immediately he sent the Queene word of his coming.

Orleanse newly married is in love with another.

Craon dismisst the Count for selling the Dutcheffe of the inconcency of her husband.

King Charles pur. luth Craon into Britaine.

Shee faining deuotion to the Abbey of Marmouster leated fowewhat without the Towne, made it known to her keepers, and they nor daring to contradit so great a Princeesse, mistrusting no danger, attended her thitherward with a competent guard as they supposed, where Fosseux and Pergie two especial men in the Dukes trust, were laid in the Ambush neere vnto the Abbey, and hauing notice the Queene was come to Church, came to salute her, and to signifie that the Burgogne was in person to attend her seruice. Her keepers conceiuing their seconds were not farre off, as men dismayed, told the Queen of some fear, & that an enemy was neere at hand; whereunto shee answered, I am not ignorant who they are, and thereupon commanded to apprehend those her keepers; her liberrie thus got shee became wholly for Burgogne, and by his meanes was made the Regent of France, and her picture stamped vpon the Seale of that State.

(42) By birth shee was a Germane, and daughter to Stephen Duke of Bawier, of an imperious spirit, and vnreconcilable enuie, not ouermuch beloued of her husband, and (as the nature of most women are) not ouermuch fauouring his fauorites, whose small authority and hatred against her owne sonne Daulphin Charles, sore bruised the Crowne, which her weak husband ware: his foregone infirmities and her new sprung Regency, were now as two fludgates let open to let in the deluge of France, hers is to be spoken of in the intercourse of the English; his, manie times hath bene, but not made knowne how it came: therefore a while in that subiect, before we passe forward in this place, let vs reade what others haue writ.

(43) This Charles the sixth, and sicke-brained King of France was the sonne of King Charles first named the wife, who with Salomon his wife might haue demanded this question: who can tell whether his sonne shall be a wiseman or a foole? for the flower of his youth and commendable dispositions of his middle age promised great hopes of a valiant, moderate and most happie Prince, only inclined to choller and reuenge, as by the occasion of his lunacy is easilie seene, which chanced on this manner.

(44) Peter Craon a Courtier, his minion, and an inward favorite of the Duke of Orleanse the Kings brother, blabbed out some secrecy of the said Dukes amorous passions vpon a wanton Lady, vnto his Dutcheffe Valentine; who but lately married, and so soon decheued of bed, took the wrong no lesse then it was, nor letted shee (as who can let a woman to speake) to tell him his faults on both sides of his head, the Duke could not hide what shee too well knew, and therefore fought to satiffie her with complements of kind words, but the Curtaine-sermons nightly enlarged vpon the same text, made him many times to lie awake with litle deuotion (God wot) to heare, and often to rise when hee would faine haue slept, which caused him lastly to complaine to the King that Craon had, and would betray their ouermuch trust. The cause no more, but yet too much against a Prince, Craon with all disgrace was discharged the Court, who not able to brooke such an open indignity, assaulted Clifton the Constable in a murdering manner, as the only man (as he thought) that wrought his disgrace, and escaping Paris, fled into Britaigne whose Duke was his kinsman, and an enemy to the Constable.

(45) King Charles transported with choller of this double offence, mindes to draw Craon by force out of Britaine to iustifie himselfe, whom the Countcell had declared guilty of high Treason, and enemy to the Crowne of France, and resolues in person to enter into Britaine: forthwith the expedition for men and manner of proceeding made Charles to loose both meate and sleepe, so as the vexation of minde and distemperature of body, carried apparant shewes in his face: in so much that the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne mistrusting the worst, counsellled that his journey might be staid; his Physicians disswade him in regard of his health, the summer extreme hot, and his blood as then once subiect to dangerous feuers. New deuises were wrought to stay him at home, giuing it forth that Craon was fled Britaigne, and in Arvagon was imprisoned by the Queene. All this notwithstanding, needes would he forward, so forward is man when his fate will so haue it.

(46) He departed Meaux in Iulie: the yere very hot, his head couered with a great Cap of scarlet, his body wrapped in a thicke velvet lerkkin warme enough for winter, his mind distempered with choller, griefe, and despite, and his body wearied with watching, distaule, and want of rest. Thus entering the forrest of Meaux about noone-tide, a man bare-headed, and bare legged attired in a Coat of white rugge, stepped sodainly forth from betwixt two trees, and caught hold of his bridle, staid his horse, saying, King ride no further but returne backe, for thou art betrayed. Charles whose spirits were otherwise dulled, and his blood greatly distempered, was amazed at the voice: which seene, his seruants ranne to this man, and with blowes forced him to leaue the reines of the horse: and so without any further search the man vanished away.

(47) The troopes of his nobles diuided because of the dust, King Charles was followed by the Pages of his Chamber, who ouercharged with heat and distemperature, tooke no great paines to guide their horse, so that thronging together, he which bore the Kings Lance, let it fall vpon him, who had on his head the Kings helmer, and in the falling made a clattering noise. The King much musing vpon the words spoken, and now withall hearing this vnexpected noise, was from a penitue melancholly suddainly stricke into a raging Lunacy, supposing himselfe to be betrayed indeed: and transported with this frensie he drawes his sword, and made towards his Pages with a maine cry: his brother Orleanse not knowing the cause, halted among them, whom Charles likewise pursued, and with the like rage ranne at his vncle of Burgogne, thus spending himselfe and his horse out of breath, all incompassed the still raging man, rooke from him his sword, disrobed him for heate, and cheered him with flatterings and faire spoken words, his brother and vncles saluted him, but hee knewes them not, sits mute, sighing and panning, and with troubled amazement moues both body and head, so that all signes of Phrensie appeared in this poore Prince, and the eminent misery that was to fall vpon France, very apparant to the insceing Statists: but now to proceed.

(48) John Duke of Burgogne ill digesting the threats that King Henry had giuen, and ioined in league with the Daulphin, as we haue laid: was notwithstanding suspected to be a great enemy to the State, and as the Giants are faine to heape mountaine vpon mountaine, for steps of assent to pull Iupiter out of his throne, so by sinister Counsellors Burgogne was accused of some intended stratageme, as meaning to mount the Chaire where the Daulphin should sit: Charles therefore from Montfren-Sur-fault yonne a Towne in Brie, sent for the Duke vnto Troyes in Champagne to confere further vpon the effecting of their affected accord, as also to employ their united forces vpon the common enemy the English, a third cause likewise was alleaged, and that was to haue him his meanes for a reconciliation to his mother the Regent, whose wrath, besides him, no man could pacifie.

(49) The Duke mistrusting no snake in the grasse, thought all things as sure as they were faire in shew, and accompanied with many noble-men, fies hundred horse, and two hundred Archers, he repaired to Montfren, at whose Gate the Daulphin had built 2. Barricadoes, & himselfe in armes stood there to receiue the Duke, Burgogne approached, kneeled downe vpon one knee, and with an honourable reuerence saluted him most humbly, the Daulphin neglecting all courtesies to him-ward, charged him with breach breach of promise, for that the ciuill warres and his garrisons were not surceast and withdrawne, the Dukes (word hanging too farre backe, and somewhat troubling his kneeling, he put his hand vpon the hilt, to put it more forward, whereat Robert de Loire standing by, sayd, doe you draw your sword against the Lord Daulphin? at which words Tannequy de Chastell with a battle-axe stroke him on the face and cut off his Chin, and others with other wounds made an end of his life, before he could arise from his knee or get out his sword.

(50) Queene Isabel another cruell Medea and vnatural mother, hauing a double offence done her, redoubled her wrath and continued her tragick passions against her sonne the young Daulphin, who not only incites Philip now the new Duke of Burgogne to reuenge his murdered fathers death, but torments her poore husbands spirits, in perswading him to disherite Charles their sonne, and to giue in marriage Lady Katherine vnto King Henry, who now had let his foote farre into France. Duke Philip for his part ready for reuenge, sent the Bishop of Arras with other his Ambassadors vnto Rouen to King Henry to entreat a peace, and againe not many daies after their returne sent backe the said Bishop, whose message was so pleasing that Henry sent the Bishop of Koeberster, the Earle of Warwicke and Guien vnto Arras, who were as welcome vnto Duke Philip; to that betwixt Rouen and Arras messengers continually passed till a peace was concluded; which was proclaimed to continue from that day (then about the feast of the Epiphany) vnto mid-March ensuing, betwixt King Henry, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgogne.

(51) King Henry thus farre gone in his affaires for that Crowne, sent his Ambassadors vnto the new made Pope Martin the first, such was the fate of Romes Apostolical fathers in those faire Sun-shine and Golden daies, that the greatest Monarch was but a vassal to attend vpon their stirrup & their Crownes subiect to be spurned off, with their feete. Henry therefore minding to stop the violence of these narrow Seas, and to make the streame milde betwixt his two Realmes, had now none to let, but only him that was all in all, and bare an Oare in euery mans boat: & therefore from King Charles, Burgogne, and himselfe, his Ambassadors solicited his fatherlie consent, to admit him his most Christian sonne of France, and to giue his holy blessing for the confirmation of the marriage, and peace concluded betwixt those two famous Princes. King Henry right to the French Crowne they plainly laid forth, what calamities France had felt in their resistance, Agincourt, Normandy and Aquitaine (as they shew-ed him) were most lamentable witnessses, and the holde that the Lyon had got (at that day) of the Flower de Luce, was not to be wrested out of his fast graped pawes. But his dull care was deafe hereunto, answering that this peace was preiudiciall to the right of Charles the Daulphin, and therefore hee denied to confirme it.

(52) But with what quill these wines were vented from the titled Lees for the Daulphin, vlesse it was the golden vice, (a powerfull key indeed to vnlocke the Popes silent lips,) I know not; most true it is, the conditions went forward, and the place for the confirmation of couenants was Troyes in Champagne, where King Charles; and his Queene then lay, and whither Burgogne, Guien, the Lord Rasse, and others attended with five hundred horse, were sent Ambassadors from Henry. In their way they besieged (and after fifteene daies wan) the Towne of Crestie that held for the Daulphin, demolished the Castell, razed the wals, and departed vpon composition.

These comming to Troyes were honorably receiued, and louingly concluded on a final peace, where Lady Katherine was attended as the English Queene, and some left to guard her by King Henries command. His Ambassadors returned, and affection enflamed, himselfe attended with the Dukes of Clare rence, and Gloucester his brethren, the Duke of Excester, the Earles of Warwicke, Huntingdon, Salisbury, Guicenne and many other nobles, (his guard consisting of fixteene hundred Launces and Archers) departed from Rouen to Ponthois, to S. Denis, and from thence into Provinc, where he was met neere vnto Troyes by the Duke of Burgundy and many other French Lords, and with all Princelie attendance was conducted into the Towne. Theioy was great with which he was receiued, especially of the King, the Queene and Lady Katherine, whom he found in S. Elers Church expecting his comming, where forthwith he and the Lady was affianced; and falling eftsoones into conference of the conditions of amity, they were consented vnto by the French and King Henry.

1. That K. Henry should take Lady Katherine to wife.
2. That Charles Bur should retain the name of King and Queene, and should hold all their dignities, rents, and possessions belonging to the Crowne of France, during their naturall liues.

4. That the same summe of forty thousand lites yearly, shall bee confirmed vnto Queene Katherine by our lawes, according to our vsual rights, at the time of our death.

5. That the said Lady Katherine so ouerliuing vs, from the time of our death, shall haue for her Dowry in the Kingdome of France, the summe of twenty thousand franks yearly, out of the lands, places, and Lordships that Blanch (sometime wife to Philip Beaufall held and enioied.

7. And for as much as our said father is infirme by reason of sicknesse, and may not entend in his owne person to dispose of the affaires of the Realme, therefore during the life of our said father the faculties and exercise of the government, and disposition of the publike villitie of the Realme of France shall be, and abide to vs, so that thence forth wee may gouerne the Realme, and admit to our Councell and assistance to the Councell of France (such of the English Nobility as we shal thinke meete.

9. Also that we to our powers shall defend and helpe all, and euery of the Peeres, Nobles, Cities, Townes, Cominalties and singular persons, now or in time to come, subiects to our father, in their rights, Customes, priuiledges, freedoms, franchises, belonging, or due vnto them in all manner of places, now or in time comming subiect to our father.

Also that we shall to our power trauell truly, & diligently, to see that Iustice be administred in the same Realme of France according to their lawes, Customes, and rights of the same Realme without personal acceptation, and that we shal keepe and hold the Subiects of the said Realme in tranquility and peace to our power, and shall defend them against all manner of violence and oppression.

11. Also that we to our power shall prouide that able and profitable persons shall execute the offices aswell of Iustices and other offices belonging to the gouernance of the demaines of the Realme of France for the good and peaceable Iustice of the same, and for the administration that shall be committed vnto them.

12. Also that we of our power, so soone as it may commodiously be done, shall traualle to put into obedience of our said father, all manner of Cities, Townes, Castles, places, Countreys and persons within

And neuer after, this Realme of France shall obey to man as King and Regent of France, but to vs, and to our heires, also they shall not be in Counsell, helpe, or assent, that we loose life or limme, or be taken with euill taking, or that we suffer harme or diminution in person, estate, worship, or goods, but if they know any such thing to be contriued or imagined against vs, they shall let it to their powers, and shall doe vs to witten thereof, as hastily as they may by themselves, by message, or by letters.

22. Also that we to our power shall see recompence to be made by our said father, without diminution of the Crowne of France to persons obeying him and fauouring the party of Burgundy, to whom Lands, Lordships, Rents and possessions belongeth in the said Dutchie of Normandy, or other places in the Realme of France conquered by vs hitherto, giuen by vs in places, Lands, gorten, or to be gorten in the name of our said father vpon rebels and inobedients to him, and if so be that such manner of recompence be not made to the said persons in the life time of our said father, we shall make that recompence in such manner and places of goods, when it happeneth by Gods grace to the Crowne of France, and if so be that the Lands, Lordships, Rents or possessions belonging to such manner of persons in the said Dutchie and other places, bee not giuen by vs, the same persons shall be referred to them without any delay.

23. And during the life of our father in all places, now, and in time to come, subject to him, letters of common iustice, grants of offices, gifts, pardons, remissions and priuileges shall be written, and proceed vnder the name and seale of our said father. And forasmuch as some singular case may fall that may not be foreseen by mans wit, in the which it may be necessary and behouefull, that we write our letters; in such case if any hap for the good and surety of our father, and for the gouernment that belongeth to vs, as is aforesaid, and to auoid perils which otherwise might fall to the preiudice of our said father, to write our letters, by the which we shall command, charge and defend after the nature and quality of the need in our fathers behalf, and ours, as Regent of France.

24. Also that during our fathers life, we shall not call, nor write vs King of France, but shall verily abstaine from that name, so long as our said father liueth.

26. That we shall put no impositions or exactions to charge the Subjects of our said father, without cause reasonable and necessary. No otherwise then for common good of the Realme of France, and according to the Lawes and Customes provided for the same Realme.

27. Also that we shall traucell to our power, to effect that by the assent of the three states of the Realmes of England and France, that all manner of obstacles may be done away, and this chiefly, that it be ordeined and provided, that from the time, that we, or any of our heires come to the Crowne of France, both the Crownes, that is to say, of France and England, perpetually be together in one, and in the same person, that is to say, from our fathers life to vs, and from the terme of our life thence forward, in the persons of our heires, that shall be one after another, and that both Realmes shall be gouerned from the time, that we, or our heires come to the same, not severally vnder diuers Kings in one time, but vnder the same person, which for the time shall be King of both Realmes, and our Soueraigne Lord, as is aforesaid, keeping neuertheless in all manner of things, to either of the said Realmes, their rights, liberties, customes, vsages and lawes, not making subject in any manner of wise, one of the same Realmes to the rights, lawes or vsages of the other.

28. That thenceforth perpetually shall be still rest, and that in all manner of wise, dissensions, hates, rancours, enuies, and warres, betweene the same Realmes of France and England, and the people of the same Realmes drawing to accord of the same peace may cease and be broken.

29. That from henceforth for euermore, peace and tranquillity, good accord and affection, and stable friendship friendship shall be betwixt the said Realmes and the Subjects of the same, and shall keepe themselves with their Counsels, helpes, and common assisiance against all men that enforce them to doe, or to imagine wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or greouances to them or either of them, and that they shall be conuerfant in merchandizing freely and surely together, paying the Customes due and accustomed, and that all the confederates and allies of our said father and the Realme of France, as also our confederates of the Realme of England shall in eight months space from the time of this accord of peace, as is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, sauing neuertheless their obedience to either of the same Crownes, and to all manner of actions, rights, and reuenues, that belong to our said father and his Subjects, and to vs, and our Subjects against all manner of such Allies and Confederates.

30. That our father, neither our brother the Duke of Burgundy, shall begin nor make with Charles calling himselfe the Dauphin of Vienne, any treatie, peace, or accord but by Counsell and assent of each of vs three, or of other the three estates of either the said Realmes aboue-named.

31. Also that we with the assent of our brother of Burgundy, and other of the Nobles of the Realme of France, which ought thereunto to be called, shall ordeine for the Gouernance of our said father, surely, louingly and honestly, after the degree of his royall estate and dignity in such wise, as shall be to the worship of God, of our said father, and of the Realm of France.

32. Also that all manner of persons, that shall be, our father, to doe him personal seruice, not onlie in office, but in all other attendances, aswell the Nobles and Gentlemen, as others, shall be such as haue bene borne in the Realme of France, or in places belonging to France, good, wife, true, and able to doe him seruice, and our said father shall dwell in places vnder his obedience, and no where else, wherefore we charge and command our said liege subjects, and other being vnder our obedience, that they keepe, and doe to be kept, in all that belongeth to them, this accord and peace, after the forme and manner as it is accorded, and that they attempt in no manner wise, any thing that may be preiudiciall, or contrary to the same accord, and peace, vpon paine of life and limme, and all that they may forfeit vnto vs.

33. Also that we for the things aforesaid, and euery one of them shall giue our assent by our letters Patentes, sealed with our seale vnto our said father, without all approbation, and confirmation of vs, and all other of our blood roiall, and of the Cities and Townes to vs obedient, sealed with our great seale, shall make or cause to be made letters approbatory, and confirmed of the Peeres of his Realme, and of the Lords, Citizens, Burgeses of the same vnder his obedience, all which Articles we haue sworne to keepe, vpon the holie Euangelists. Yeuen at Troyes the 30. of May, Anno 1420. And the same were proclaimed in London the 20. of Iune following; for the Copies of this treaty, the French King sent to euery Town in France, as King Henry did likewise into England, there to be published by Proclamation. These Articles were concluded betwixt the two Kings, in the presence of Queene Isabell, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Kings Councill, the Prince of Orange, Seigneur Chastellain, Marshall of France, with many others the prime Nobility, both of England and France, both the Kings with the Queene, taking their solempne oath there, vpon the holie Euangelists, as did likewise the Duke of Burgundy, and the rest, Burgundy being the first man that laid his hand on the booke, and swaue homage to King Henry; who thereupon was stiled and proclaimed Regent of France.

(53) In whose presence also vpon the third of Iune, (being the morrow after Trinity Sunday) the marriage of King Henry and Lady Katherine, with all pompous solemnity was celebrated, in Saint Peters Church at Troyes, the Bishop of that See, doing the Ceremonies. And after royall feasts and Princely entertainements, before the dissolution of that roiall assembly, King Henry, inuited the French King and others his great Peeres to a sumptuous banquet, made a pithy and pleasing Oration vnto them, thus testifying his Princely desire to aduance their weale, and demerit their loue.

(54) As the chiefe marke whereunto my cares and endeours haue hitherto leuelled, hath bene, to vnite and incorporate these two Kingdomes of France and England into one, which now by Gods goodnes is most happily effected; so is it still, and euer shall be, both my desire and care, that vnto posterity we may leaue it sealed in the same sort, and free from all emperchments, of factious, discords: that beingas (it is) the greatest, it may be also the happiest Monarchie of Europe. For the cleere accomplishment of which worke, there rests now nothing, but the depressing of the Dauphin, who is by your doome already, not only depriued of that dignity, but of succession to the Crowne, and prosecuted as a Traitor to the State; and of whom this we must be assured, that while he liues, France cannot but be in a perpetual combustion. For preuenting whereof, I both need and intreat, both your Counsels and aide, nothing doubting of your readines in either; for how can we expect any safety, or you any goodnes at his hand, who, in his young yeeres, did so perfidiously murder the Duke of Burgundy, his vncl? I am now, you see, your Regent in present, and Successour to the Crowne in hope; Let it not therefore sticke in your hearts, that I am an Englishman borne, for you know I haue much French blood in my veins, which warms my affections as well to French as English; but looke on me as the lawfull heire to the Diademe, both by iust Title, and your owne consents, who therefore am, and ought to be, wholly yours; and your kindnes and iust dealing bind me so to be. Yours also am I now by fresh alliance, as sonne in Law to your King, vnto whom I will performe all offices of loue and honor, as to mine owne father; and you his subjects shall I loue and cherish, as mine owne children, and will defend France and the French, so long, as you defend my right with your louing aide, and will deterre me your loue with your loiall affection.

(55) These affaires thus accomplished at Troyes, the Kings, the Queenes, and the rest of the Peeres in great citate rode vnto Paris, where all faire countenances were shewed, and great entertainment giuen to the English. But the Dauphin and his followers neither feared nor fainted, though the present courtes pleased not their palat. Their first Counsell therefore was, how to preferre themselves in so eminent danger, to sit still and doe nothing, they knew it was but to increafe and aduance the successes of the English; and to rise without strength, was to fall into further misfortunes, hauing no means to hold warre with so potent an Enemy. In this distraction their voice was best heard, that spake most for the safety of the Dauphin (whose only life gaue breath vnto the after-hopes of France) and for the strengthening of those places which might be of most aduantage to themselves, and offence to the Enemy. This then past by decree in that Counsell of warre, that the Dauphin should at no time hazard his person in field, and that a leuy of Souldiers should be had, to lie in Garrison in places conuenient; for Time, which neuer stands still, they well hoped might yet turne the rice for them, fortune being (said they) as subject to fawne, as to frowne; in which resolution each man tooke to his charge, and all to withstand the doings of Henry.

The French refute to submit to their owne King.

Nichol. Giles.

French fo in Paris a Parliament of the three eſtates was aſſembled, wherein ſuch as were guilty of the death of Burgundy, were juſtified, the diſherizing of the Dauphin confirmed, and warres prepared againſt theſe Townes which held for him. Againſt Sens the two Kings with their Queens, Clarence, and Burgundy, marched; which after 12. daies was rendered vpon compoſition of life, thoſe excepted as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy death. Monfrelau was the next, which by force was entered, where the body of the Duke of Burgundy, vndeſtantly buried by the Dauphinois, was taken vp, and by his ſonne Philip ſent in great pompe to Dion in his Dutchy, and there honorably interred. The Towne being taken, the Caſtle held out: vnto whoſe Capitaine twenty Captiue Gentlemen were ſent, whole liues from King Henries mouth (ſay the French) were ſentenced to death, vnleſſe they could perſwade the Caſtellan to ſurrender; but thoſe men (ſay our Engliſh) to mollifie that (ſeuere doome) were all eſpecial friends of that Capitaine and ſuch, as had giuen opprobrious words to the Kings Herauld, being ſent vnto them in the ſiege of Monfrelau. Howſoeuer, in this extremity they ſollicited Guiluy vpon their knees, vrging their owne deaths, and his great danger if he held out; but Guiluy, a true Frenchman, and friend to the Dauphin, withſtood the aſſault, and thereupon theſe Gentlemen Petitioners were preſently hanged in the ſight of the defendants: ſo bloody is Mars to maintaine his owne Lawes, and ſo eager was Henry of his full Conqueſt of France, whoſe thirſting ſword had heretofore bene ſomewhat ouerlaid in blood, but neuer more (perhaps) then in this bloody act; which I with might be obliterated from the number of his other glorious actions. Yet at length was that Caſtle enforced to ſurrender vpon compoſition of life, excepting the guilties of Burgundies death.

(57) Then was the ſiege remoued to Melun, a Towne of great ſtrength, and made more ſtrong by the valours of her commanders, who were Seigneur Barbaſon an abſolute ſouldier, Pierre de Bourbon a Prince of the blood, Preaux, and Bourgeois, whole Garriſon was ſeuē hundred Dauphinois; and indeed no default in defence, could anie wife be imputed, but the Canon opening a breach, the Engliſh and Burgundians made an entry into the Bulwarke, and ouer the River Seine built a bridge with Boates; ſo that from either quarter they had paſſage one to the other without impediments, and encamped themſelues for their beſt advantage; vpon whom the enemie neuertheleſſe made diuers ſallies, with the loſſe of ſeuerall parties. King Henry enforced his ſiege to the vtmoſt, and made a myne vnderneath the walls, which being perceiued, the defendants countermined againſt him; where the King (too forward) as the very firſt man entering his myne, and Barbaſon like wiſe his within the Towne, met each other at point of ſword, where they performed nobly the parts of priuate ſouldiers, (nobly indeed, if priuate ſouldiers they had been, but Princes ſhould remember they are not ſuch) till laſtly they agreed to diſcouer themſelues, and firſt Barbaſon made known his name, then King Henry did his, whereupon the French Lord ſuddenly getting backe, cauſed the Barriers to be cloſed, and Henry returned to his Campe.

(58) This enterprize failing, King Charles himſelfe came into the Campe, to induce the defendants to render, at the preſence of their naturall Lord; which neuertheleſſe was little reſpected; for anſwere was made, that if their King were at liberty, and free from King Henries power, they would doe him the duty of naturall ſubiects, and yeeld him their charge as their Liege Lord: but being as he was, they deſired to be excuſed, for to the mortall enemy of France they would not yeeld.

(59) Whileſt King Henry lay at the ſiege of Melun, the Duke of Bauer (who was Paſſegraue of Rhyne Elektor) came to King Henry hauing married his ſiſter, and thence ſent a defiance vnto the Dau- phin his kinfeman by Queene Iſabell his mother, the Prince of Orange likewiſe came thither vnto Henry, but becauſe he required an Oath of him, as a ſubiect of France, he went away diſpleaſed, ſaying, he was a free Prince, and ought neither obedience to England nor France. At which time the Parisians with more reſpect of their owne ſafety committed their City vnto K. Henries deuotion who deputed his brother Clarence (though Count Saint Paul with his French diſpleaſed) Gouernour thereof, and put Garrifons into the Baſtile of S. Anthoine, the Louue, and the Houſſil de Neſle. During this ſiege, mandatory letters were ſent by King Charles into Picardy, to put all places that held for him in thoſe quarters into Henries poſſeſſion, and to take the Oath of their obedience vnto him as to the only heire, Succęſſor, Regent, and Gouernour of France; the execution whereof was committed to the Count of Saint Paul, the Biſhops of T. Rouenne and Arras, the Viſcount of Amiens, the Lord of Venducill, the Gouernour of Liſle, Pierre Marigny Ad-uocate of the Parliament, and George Offend the Kings Secretary, beginning thus; Charles par le Grace de Dieu, &c.

(60) The diſtreſſe of Melun, was wonderfull great aſwell vpon the ſiegers, as defendants; the one afflicted, and their troups ſore weakened with mortality, the other oppreſſed with famine, and other defects incident to a long indured ſiege. In this State eighteen weekes were ſpent, and more had bene, but that the Engliſh were ſupplied with ſouldiers out of Picardy, whole colours diſplayed a ſarre off, put the Towne in hope of reliefe, as ſent from the Dauphin, but vpon their neerer approach, Melun was rendered by theſe capitulations. 1. That the Towne and Caſtle ſhould be deliuered to the King. 2. That aſwell the men of warre, as the Burgelleſſes, ſhould ſubmit themſelues to King Henry, to be dealt with as pleaſed the King. 3. That all ſuch as ſhould be found guilty of the Duke of Burgundies murder ſhould ſuffer death. 4. That all the reſt of the ſouldiers ſhould be receiued to mercy, but to be priſoners vntill they put in good caution for their true obedience in after times. 5. That the Nations of France ſhould be ſent home to their owne Countreys. 6. That all the mouables and Armes in the Towne ſhould bee carried into the Caſtle. 7. That all the Priſoners they had taken either before or during the ſiege, ſhould be enlarged ranſome-free, and acquitted of their promiſes. 8. That for the performance of theſe Articles, 12. of the principall Capitaines, and 6. of the wealthieſt Burgelleſſes ſhould deliuer themſelues in hoſtage. 9. That all the Engliſh, and Scots, ſhould be deliuered to Henry and left at his diſpoſition.

Theſe things accorded, an Engliſh Garriſon was put into Melun, commanded by Pierre Farrolle. Pierre de Bourbon, Seigneur de Preaux, and valiant Barbaſon, with fixe hundred Priſoners of quality, were ſent with a ſtrong guard vnto Paris. The guilties of Burgundies murder were all of them put to death, amongſt whom were two Monkes, and Bertrand de Chantmont a Caſcoigne, (a man in great fauour with King Henry) for that he at King Henries entry into Melun, had conuained thence one Amien de Lau, who was proued guilty of Burgundies death. The Duke of Burgundy himſelfe, as alſo Clarence earneſtly labored with King Henry for Bertrands pardon, but the King, though much grieved, and proteſting that he had rather haue loſt 50000. Nobles, yet was reſolued he ſhould die for example to all ſuch, as ſhould dare to offend, vpon preſumption of their nearnes and grace with their Princes.

(61) Melun being rendered, and theſe things thus diſpoſed, the two Kings with their Queens moſt honorable attended, returned to Paris, before whoſe entrance the Citizens and Students met them in moſt ſolemne manner, hauing beautified the City with flagges, ſcreemers and rich hangings throughout the ſtreets where they ſhould paſſe. The two Kings rode rode together vnder a rich Canopie, Henry vpon the left hand, next vnto whom followed the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and vpon their left hand the Duke of Burgundy clad all in blacke, the Princes and Nobles of either Nation mingled together in their degrees, the Clergy with proceſſions, and their venerable reliques, going before them to Noſtre dame Church; and the next day the two Queens entered the City with as great a ſhew. King Henries Palace was prepared in the Louue, which was moſt rich and magnificent, and Charles his Court in the Hoſtel of Saint Paul, being but homely and meane, for (ſaith Asſell) young Henry commanded all, and his brethren exerciſed ſupreme authority, whiles olde Charles flood as a Cypher, and the French Nobilitie had nothing to doe.

(62) During the two Kings abode here, a great Aſſembly was called as well of the Spirituality, as of the ſecular Nobilitie, in whoſe preſence, in the great Hall of the Hoſtel, a State for Iuſtice was prepared, where the two Kings ſitting, as ſupreme Iudges, vnder one Cloath of eſtate, the Court was furniſhed with Princes and Officers in moſt ſolemne wiſe. Before whom, Nicolas Rollin aduocate from the Duke of Burgundy, and the Dutcheſſe his mother, craued audience (and had it granted) vnto an inuectiue and long Oration againſt Charles Viſcount Narbone, Tanneguy Barbaſon and others, for the cruell murder of John Duke of Burgundy; and not only that the murderers might be accordingly executed, but withall, that a Church might be founded and furniſhed with ſacred Ornaments for twelue Chanons, fixe Chaplaines, and fixe Clerkes to pray for his ſoule for euer, euery Chanon to haue yeerely two hundred pound Paris money, euery Chaplen one hundred, and euery Clerke fifty, to be leuiſed vpon the Lands of the Dauphin, and his aſſociates in the murder: that the ſame foundation ſhould be engrauen vpon the Porch thereof, and the like inſcription ſet vp publickly in the Cities of Paris, Rouen, Grannt, Dion, Saint James of Compoſtella, and Jeruſalem. This motion was ſeconded by a Doctor of Diuinity appointed by the Reſtor of the Vniuerſity, who concluded with an humble requeſt to the King and thoſe Princes, that iuſtice might be done. Wherevnto the Chancellor of France, in the behaue of King Charles, promiſed that no endeavour on his part ſhould bee lacking; and thereupon cauſed his ſonne to be ſolemneſly called to the Marble-Table, to anſwere his accuſation, by the name of Charles Duke of Touraine, and Dauphin de Vienne, which done three ſeueral times, and he not appearing, by arreſt of the ſame Court of Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realme, and iudged unworthy to ſucceed in any of the Seignories as well preſent, as to come. But the Dauphin appealed from this ſentence to God and his ſword, and ſtill was the ſame, though his fortunes were changeable. Monsieur de Barbaſon was vehemently accuſed to haue his hand in the murder, and therefore King Henrie accordingly gaue ſentence on him to ſuffer to death; but he in open Court defended himſelfe, not to bee guilty of the crime, although he confeſſed to be a true ſeruant to the Dauphin. Notwithſtanding, had he not appealed to the Officers of Armes, King Henries iudgement of death had gone againſt him: for the Law Military, as he therealleged, forbiddeth, that any man, hauing his brother in Armes within his danger, ſhould afterwards put him to death for any cauſe or quarrell, and proued himſelfe to be the Kings brother in Armes, for that he had in the Countermines cooped in combat with the King. Thus by a quirk of Heraldry acquitted from death, he was neuertheleſſe retained in priſon the ſpace of nine yeeres, and laſtly at the winning of Caſle Galliard from the Engliſh, was deliuered out of moſt ſtrait imprifonment, to the great ioy of the French.

(63) This execution of Iuſtice on thoſe Murderers, was a great, but not the only act of K. Henry at this great Parliament of three Eſtates of France in Paris. For therein alſo was the final accord betwixt the two Kings, openly acknowledged by the French King, as made by his free aſſent, and with aduile of all the Councell of France, whereupon it was there alſo ratified by the general ſtatutes of France, and ſworne vnto particularly vpon the holy Euangelists, by all their Nobles and Magiſtrates, ſpiritual and ſecular, who alſo ſet their ſeales to the Inſtruments thereof, which were ſent into England to be kept in the Kings Exchequer at Weſtmiſter. King Henries glory thus aſcended to the height verticall in France, his Court was not only honoured daily both with Courtly and military ſhewes and paſtimes, but alſo was ſtill frequented both with forraigne Ambaſſadors, and domeſticke Commiſſioners, whoſe directions depended only vpon his voluntary aſſigne, himſelfe redreſſing all things at his pleaſure, placing and diſplacing Officers and Gouernours, cauſing alſo a new Coyne to be made, called a Salute, wherein were the Armes of France, and the Armes of England and France, quarterly ſtamped. King Charles the while in his Palace, was but for faſhions ſake viſited, and but by ſome of his olde ſeruants, his Sunne was drawne to nere vnto the ſetting. The great affaires of France thus ſetled, (as well as that vnſetled time would permit,) King Henry minding to Crowne his Queene in England, ordained his brother of Clarence, (a wife, valiant, and a great Capitaine) his Lieutenant general of France, leauing alſo the Duke of Exeter with 500. men of warres to keep Paris; and ſo attended with great ſtate, he came to Amiens and Calais, where taking to Sea, he arrived at Douer vpon the third of February, and was receiued of his Subiects as an Angell from heauen, or another victorious Caſar on Earth.

(64) All things in a readines for his faire Queens Coronation, vpon the four and twentieth of the ſame month, with all roialty the ſame was ſolemniſed at Weſtmiſter, and the Engliſh rich diademe ſet on her head. The feaſt was great, with all Princely ſeruices, and the ſtate ſuch as deſeruethe report; for the Queene ſitting at Table, at the right ſide of her Chaire, kneeled the Earle of March holding a Scepter in his hand; the Earle Marſhall kneeling on the left ſide, held another, and the Counteſſe of Kent ſate vnder the Table at her right foote; vpon her right hand at Table ſate the Biſhops of Canterbury and Wincheſter, and vpon the left the King of Scots, the Dutcheſſe of York, and the Counteſſe of Huntington; the Nobles giuing their attendance, each man according to his office and place.

(65) Preſently, after Eaſter, in the month of May, a Parliament was held at Weſtmiſter, whole chiefſt intent was to haue meanes to continue the Kings Conqueſt in France; but ſuch was the ſtate of thoſe laſt times, that, to ſtop the current of this melting mint, ſome, minding more the heapes of their money, then the ſpreading abroad of Englands faire Monarchy, exhibited their Bills vnto the three eſtates in Parliament, and petitioned vnto the King, to commiserate the poverty of the commons, which (as they ſaid) were beggered by their warres. For which cauſe, as it ſeemeth, no ſubſidy or ayde was demanded, but the King againe pawning his Crowne to his vnkle Beaufort, the rich Cardinall, for twenty thouſand pound, before the ſaid month was expired, with foure thouſand horſe and foure and twenty thouſand foote returned into France to follow thoſe warres.

(66) Neither was his haſt more then needed: for John Earle of Bueghaman, and Archbald Douglas, two valiant leaders of ſeuē hundred reſolute Scots, repaired into France to ayde the Dauphin, and joining with the French in Amion, meant to haue ſurprized the Duke of Clarence before he had bene aware: in which enterprize, foure ſtrangling Scots, taken and brought to his preſence, as he ſate at dinner, reuealed the intent and ſtrength of the Enemy, whoſe approach was verie nere at hand. ner came, but the Duke overhastily got to horse (saying, they are all ours) leaving his troups to follow him with almost celerity as they might. His suddaine and vnlooked-for approach, caused the Scots to take into the Church of Bargie for their safety, where whilst they were making defence, the rest tooke the Alarme, and the Earle of Bucquaban manned the Bridge, to whose ayde, Hugh Kennedy with an hundred horse presented himselfe.

(67) The Duke of Clarence seeing no possibilitie to free the passage with his slender troupe of horse, alighted on foot, & gaue forth a furious charge, where the Earle of Bucquaban came to blowes, being followed by two hundred horse; and either side fighting with equall courage and rancor. Clarence gaue singular demonstration of his great valour, vntill, as he was remounting, one John Swinton a Scot, wounded him in the face with his Lance, and threw him to the ground, being the first man of the English that there was slaine, where likewise died the Earle of Kyme, the Lords Gray and Rosse, besides other men of marke, and fifteene hundred common souldiers, the Earles of Huntington, and Sommerfet, with Thomas Beaufort his brother, were taken prisoners. The * cause of this ouerthrow, is imputed to the Dukes halt in not staying for his Horsemen. Clarence that day vpon his Crest wore a Circle set with precious stones, which being taken off his Helmet by a Scot, was solde to John Steward of Derby, for a thousand Angels. For this fortunate dayes success, (wherein yet the Enemy also lost eluen hundred, and sundry of them men of principall note,) the Daulphin made the Earle of Bucquaban Constable of France. This losse receiued the Earle of Salisbury, (who followed with the other forces, but came too late to the encounter,) thought to requite, and bringing forward his troups, the enemy gaue ground, whereby yet he recovered the dead bodie of Clarence, and sent it to Rouen, from whence it was conueyed into England.

(68) After this victory the Dolphin besieged Alençon, which the Earle of Salisbury with his best forces sought to releue; but finding the enemy too strong, retired to the Abbey of Becqin whole retreat the French charged vpon him, and slew three hundred of his troups, but finding no meanes to possesse Alençon, raised their siege & returned to Aniou.

(69) King Henry therefore vpon notice of his brothers death, was much perplexed, for besides the naturall affection of a brother, his widome, valour, and counsell in the warres was highly esteemed by him, and to speake truth, there were very few Princes of that age to be equalled vnto him. Wherefore ordaining his other brother, John Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and leaving his faire Queene most honorably attended, vpon the tenth of June he landed at Calis, having in his companie James King of Scotland, in hope either to draw the Scots vnto his seruice, or else to withdraw their aides from the Daulphin, by the sight of their owne King vnder his roiall standard. But the Scots, constantly French, being demanded why they would fight against their Soueraigne, answered directly that they might not acknowledge any duty vnto James, who as yet liued vnder the obedience of another. His designe thus sayling, his confidence was in his right and his sword.

(70) The morrow after his arriuall he dispatched the Earle of Dorset, and the Lord Clifford with twelue hundred horse and foot vnto Paris, to releue the Duke of Excester, who was straitened of victuals by the Dolphin, that harassed the Countrey adjoining, taking Bonneuil, Calandon, and some other forts, and in his fortunate successes, and now conceiued hope then marched to Chartiers with seuen thousand men at Armes, foure thousand Crosse-bowes, and sixe thousand Archers strong, where he began the siege, whom the Bastard of Thian brauely resisted, and sent to King Henry for aide.

(71) Henry, after a few daies stay in Calais, marched to Montrelet; and there lodged, quartering his Army in the villages about, where he found the Duke of Burgogne somewhat impaired of health: three daies spent in conference, King Henry marched into Ponthieu, and the Duke to Abbeuil vpon some, to facilitate his passage there to be made, whereof some doubt was held by reason of the Inhabitants disposition, altogether vnstedfast, and as ready to offend, as affect. Henry in his way tooke the Fort called La Ferte, commanded by the Bastard of Belley, which vpon summons rendered, and being committed to the Custody of Borfflers a Picard, was betrayed againe by him vnto the Daulphin: from hence departing, he passed the riuer at Abbeuil, where he was roiallie receiued, and richly presented, whence he marched to Beauuauis, Gisors, and so to Bois-de-Vincennes, where Charles and his Queene resided, and receiued him with great honour, and lastly to Paris where he was receiued in triumph.

(72) But more minding a Conquest then the delicate pleasures of Court, after he had consulted vpon his affaires, and leuiued French forces to adde to the English, he marched toward Meaux, intending (in reuenge of his brothers death) to fight with the Daulphin, who had now laine before Chartres the space of three weekes, and given it forth he would come into the field. But hearing of King Henries coming, and that his Armie by the access of supplies, from Paris and Normandy was much increased, he brake vp his siege and departed: which newes related, Henry marched to Dreux and fate downe before it. The inhabitants and Garrison sensible of the danger, praied parley, and accorded to render the Towne, if the Daulphin did not relieue them by a certaine day, which expired, the Towne was deliuered, and eight hundred of the Daulphins souldiers permitted to depart vpon their Oathes, not to beare Armes against King Henry, nor his allies for the space of one yeere: then following the Daulphin (who fled still before him) in his march he tooke Bazengy, Roumment, and other places of defence.

(73) Seeing his pursuit of the flying Daulphin to be fruitlesse, he diuered his Army vnto Luigny vpon the riuer of Marne, where * he caufed many engines and habiliments for the warre to be made; having a designe to besiege Meaux in Brie, and inset the Faulxbourg, sending before him the Duke of Excester with foure thousand strong, to prevent the burning of Meaux, by the Inhabitants, and a few daies after followed himselfe. His first worke was to secure his Armie, by entrenching his Quarters, which done, and the Artillery mounted, he beganne to batter the wals, and to make his Mines, wherein neither his industry nor personall labour was spared; and within, the Bastard of Vaurus with many men of Marke, besides the inhabitants, and a thousand trained souldiers, were as busie and resolute for the defence. Meane while Iagues de Harecourt, in seruice of the Daulphin, with seuen hundred souldiers harassed the parts about Vimeux, against whom, some English Garrisons thereabout, assembling, slew three hundred of his retinue, himselfe hardly escaping by the swiftnes of his horse.

(74) Whilst King Henry lay in his siege before Meaux, newes was brought him that his Queene at the Castle of Windfore was deliuered of a sonne, named also Henry, whereat he exceedingly reioiced, though, as some will haue it, he liked not well the place of her deliuey, having before commanded the contrary, and prophesying, that what Henry of Monmouth should get, Henry of Windfore would lose. At the same time likewise he heard that Auranches in Normandy, was surprized by the Daulphin; and about three hundred English there in Garrison put to the sword, or taken Prisoners; to remedy which, King Henry sent part of his owne Armie vnto the Earle of Salisbury his Lieutenant of Normandie, who within few daies recovered Auranches and reuenged the death of the surprized.

(75) But Henries siege lessened through the first fire in Normandy, and his mind busied vpon his affaires that way, fitted opportunity to Seignieur de Offemont, vnto whom the besieged had many times made knowne their desires to haue him their Gouverneur; on a night therefore (ladders made readie to put ouer the wals to receiue him) he secretly approached the place, but being discovered by the Centinels; and the alarm taken, he not able to recover the ladders, fell into the ditch, whence by reason of his heauy armour hee could not free himselfe, and in taking was wounded in the face: the King esteeming the taking off so braue and valiant a Captaine, as a prize of much importance. The Defendants now hopelesse of succour, and finding themselves not able to hold out, carried all their goods from the towne into the * Castell; but the assailants discovering their actions, and perceiving their feare, gaue a fierce assault, and by force made way into the Towne with their swords: then Henry planting his Canons, began to batter the Castell, and shortly brought it to that extremity, that besides want of bread, most of their hand weapons were broken, and all of them in a manner dangerously wounded; yet desired they not to prouoke the English with opprobrious words, which caused such heauy conditions to be laid on them, as the like had not bene of any surrender before.

1. That the March of Meaux should be rendered vpon the eleuenth of May next ensuing. 2. That Mesier Louis de Gaf, the Bastard of Vaurus, Jehan de Romieres, Tramagon, and Barnard de Meueuille should be left to K. Henry to execute. 3. That Gueichard de Sisyay, Pierron de Luppe, Robert de Geraines, Philip de Gamacher, and John de Ourage should be at the kings will vntill they had rendered or caused to be rendered all the Townes, Castels and Fortresses which they or any of them held in France, and then to be secured of life. 4. That all the English, Welsh, Irish & Scots that heretofore had bene in the Kings obedience should be left to the Kings discretion. 5. That all the rest, allwell souldiers as Burgeses should be left to the Kings pleasure, their liues only excepted. 6. That the Earle of Commerçon, who had bene prisoner to Pierron de Luppe, and at the beginning of the siege of Meaux, was deliuered at the instance of Henry for a ranfome, should now be freed without ranfome. 7. That all the Armes and goods in the March should be brought to one place there safely guarded, and an Inuentory of the same deliuered vnto King Henry. 8. That all the Reliques and Church ornaments should likewise be put in safety. 9. That all the Prisoners aswell in the March, as in any other place vnder any of their commandements should be set at liberty, ranfome free, and acquired of their promises. 10. That no man vntill the assigned day of rendering should goe out of the March, and that none should be admitted to enter into it, but such as King Henry assigned. 11. That these Articles should be subscribed and sealed by an hundred of the best men amongst them. 12. That for the true performance of the concord, foure and twenty persons elected by King Henry should remaine in hostage.

(76) The place thus rendered vnto the King, hee presently sent eight hundred selected persons prisoners to Paris, Rouen, and England. The Bastard of Vaurus, and the Gouverneur of Meaux, the King caused to be hanged before the Towne on a Tree, named (by the Bastard himselfe) Vaurus, whereon hee had formerly hanged many English and Burgundians, and his head was fixed vpon a pole on the toppe of the same tree. Mesier Louis de Gaf, Denis de Vaurus, brother to the Bastard, Jehan de Romieres, and Barnard de Meueuille were sent to Paris, & there executed; the goods of the March were distributed by Henry amongst his Captains, and deserting men. Then order was taken for repairing of breaches, and a strong Garrison left in Meaux and the March. After whose surrender, Cressy, the Castell of Pierrepont, Merlau, Offemont, and sundry others submitted themselves to Henry, whilst the true Dolphin set fire on theirs; before hee could attaine to their siege.

(77) Queene Katherine in England daily hearing of the Kings success, desired greatly the sight of his person, and to that end prepared her voyage for France, vnder the conduct of Duke John the Kings brother, then Regent of England, who deputed for the time of his absence, his brother Humfrey Duke of Glocester, and tooke shippe at Southampton. The winds prosperous, the 21. of May she landed at Hartflewe, and with still encamping troups of Noblemen, by easie iourneys came to Rouen, and thence to Bois de Vincennes, whither her husband, her father and mother with great state came to meete her, of all whom shee was receiued as some Angelicall person, who together removed to Paris, where King Henry and Queene Katherine in the Loure, vpon the festiual of Pentecost, fate in their roiall robes, with their imperiall Crownes on their heades, and kept their Court with great confluence of people, K. Henry assigning the affaires of the Prouinces.

(78) But though Champaigne, Picardie, Brie, and Normandy with the life of France were in Henries possession, yet was not all reduced to his quiet obedience, a great and strong party holding out still for the Daulphin, who with twenty thousand strong besieged La Charay vpon Loire, and tooke it, from whence hee marched to Cone vpon the same riuer, whose Defendants agreed, that if Burgundy did not raise the siege by the sixteenth of August, they would surrender; which the said Duke accepted, and thereupon sent profer of battell to the Daulphin, who was likewise as readie (and by his Herald gaue his faith) to trie his fortune in the field: The day assigned, and preparation made, the Duke of Burgundy sent to King Henry for his assistance; whose answer was, that himselfe and his forces would not faile to bee with him that day, and run the same fortunes with him in the field.

(79) But great Henries stout mind was crossed with his new crazy body, his health being so empaiwed with a burning feauer and fluxe, that he was disswaded from the March; so the command of the Army was committed to his brother John Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Warwick, who ioyning their forces for auoiding of contentions, through all their ranks intermingled the English, Burgundians, and Picardes together, and so the night before the designed day of battell, came to Cone and encamped neere to the Towne; yet vndaunted Henry, who neuer mis-carried in any of his personall enterprises, taking his leaue at Senlis of K. Charles, and the two Queens, in his horse-litter (with a guard for his person) marched (though weak) after them; but at Meun finding his sicknesse to increase, and himselfe (who could endure all things) now vnable to endure trauell, he returned to Bois de Vincennes.

(80) The English colours displayed in the Daulphin eye, and his power inferior in shew vnto them, howeuer hee had vaunted, he thought it not best to aduenture the field, and therefore dislodging from Cone, he marched to Barry, both to protract time, and to weary the enemy. Cone thus relieved, the Dukes marched to Troyes in Champaigne, and set down their Army for the siege; but before the cords of their tents could be sufficiently made fast, the Duke of Bedford had heauy newes of Great Henries increased sicknesse, and danger of death: wherefore leaving the Duke of Burgundy with the Armie, hee posted to Bois de Vincennes, where finding the relation too true, hee greatly lamented his dying brothers estate: but the King much reioicing of his brothers coming, cheerfully comforted his mourning friends and Nobles, and made vnto them this graue and his last dying speech.

(81) I well see you lament my death; but I doe not so: for this short life of mine shall leaue behind mee the witnesse of my faith, integrity, iustice, honesty,

His cheerfulness in his sicknesse.

His last exhortation.

"nefly and mercy, which shall crowne my memoiry with glory, and free mee from blame and slander, which in long raignes can hardly be auoided: but you haue iust cause to mourne at my vntimely death, and it cannot bee but a generall griefe to my people, that in such an Ocean of businesse yet depending, I shall leaue you and them destitute of a Prince able to gouern: but your sorrow ought to be so much the lesse, when you call to mind the frailty of worldly things, and that euermore there will bee somewhat wanting which wee desire. My first request vnto you shall bee this, that with an unanimous affection to aduise, foresee and provide, that the counsell which I name may be followed. I further earnestly entreat you to loue my Infant Henry, to instruct him with your wisdomes, that by your counsell, care and loue, he may be made able & worthy to weild so great an Empire. Committ my deare wife, the most afflicted Creature liuing, extend your loues vnto her in the same proportion as I haue cuer loued you. Touching the publike I admonish and exhort you to brotherlie concord, and neuer to breake league with Philip Duke of Burgundie, and if you shall thinke it good, let my brother Humphrey Duke of Gloucester gouerne England, and not depart vpon any occasion whatsoever, vntill my sonne Henry be of yeeres to sway the estate; and my brother John Duke of Bedford with the assistance of Philip Duke of Burgundy, to manage the Realme of France. Concerning Charles (commonly called the Dauphin) either he must by your sword be made to submit himselfe, or else you shall neuer be in quiet, and it were as good to render him the possession of what you haue: wherefore sleepe not, and while you haue meanes and opportunity be industrious. Lastly, I beseech, charge, and command you, (howsoever time or occasion may perswade, or iauite you to the contrary) that Normandy receiued by my industry, and your sword, being the ancient inheritance of the Crowne of England, be not alienated for any cause whatsoever. Among other things then enjoined, he willed that the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Eu, Guacourt, and Guichard de Sifay should not be ransomed, vntill yong Henry were of yeeres to gouerne.

(82) Thus said, and drawing neere to the period of his short but glorious life; he demanded of his Physicians how long (in their iudgement) he might liue? wherunto when one of the answered, Sir, thinke on your soule, for your time is not about 2. houres: he made his confession, & his Chaplains after ward kneeling in prayer, when one of them out of the Psalms made mention of Ierusalem, the king no sooner heard the name, but with a loud voice he said; Lord thou knowest, that my purpose was to conuere Ierusalem from the Infidels, if it had pleased thee to haue giuen me life: & then in a right faith, assured hope, perfect charity and sound memory, he rendered his soule to his Creator, after hee had reigned nine yeeres, five monethes, and fourteene dayes, leauing none like vnto him amongst all the Kings and Princes of Christendome, for which cause his death was not onely bewailed of the English, whom hee gloriously had ruled, but also of the French, whom hee had victoriously conquered. This was the manner of this triumphant Monarches end, which moues men iustly to wonder at Helior Boetius, who faith, he was stricken by God for sacrilege, and died miserable: Helior friends haue occasion to wish, that his Readers should not make that miserable iudgement, the rule and measure of crediting or discrediting his other writings, yet lamentable his end was indeed, if he perished by poison, wherof there was a vehement suspicion, as Polydore Vergill hath auerred, and the carriage of the French affaires afterward makes it more then probable.

(83) His workes of pious affection were shewed in erecting the Monasteries of Beihlem & Briget, neere vnto his Manour of Richmond, as also his princely gifts vnto the workes and furniture of Westminster Church, besides the brotherhood of S. Giles without Creepe gate London. And (which had surpassed all the rest) hee intended (such was his loue to learning, and to the place where himselfe was a learner) to haue founded in the great Castell at Oxford, a magnificent Colledge for Diuines, and Students of the seuen liberal Sciences; the ploe and ordinations of which foundation he had already drawne, and resolved to endow it with all the lands in England, belonging to Priors Aliens; but his vntimely death prevented both that, and many other noble workes. To leaue a domestike testimony of his affection to Armes, hee first instituted Garter principall King at Armes: besides other augmentations to the Order of Saint George. In a word, neuer liued English King with more true glory, nor cuer died any in a more vnseasonable time, nor more lamented: for he was godly in heart, sober in speech, sparing of words, resolute in deedes, prudent in Counsell, prudent in iudgement, modest in countenance, magnanimous in action, constant in undertaking, a great Abneggiuer, deuout to Godward, a renowned Soldier, fortunate in field, from whence hee neuer returned without victory. These, with many other (I might almost say, all other) vertues are attributed to this most renowned amongst English Kings; the more to be admired in him in so short a raigne, and in those yeeres, hee being but of 36. yeeres, when he breathed forth his glorious soule.

(84) His bowels were interred in the Church of Saint Maure de Fosse, and his embalmed Corps was cloied in Lead, and attended vpon by the Lords of England, France, Normandy, and Picardy, was brought vnto Paris (where in the Church of our Lady solemne exequies were performed) and thence to Rouen, where it rested till all things were ready to set forward for England; though the Cities of Paris and Rouen stroue, and offered great summes of gold to haue Henries royall remains entred amongst them. His picture artificially was moulded of boyled hides, and countenance painted according to life, vpon whose head an imperiall Diademe of gold and precious stones was set, the body clothed with a purple robe, furred with Ermine, in his right hand it held a scepter royall, and in the left a ball of gold; in which manner it was carried in a Chariot of State, couered with red veluet, embroidered with gold, and ouer it a rich Canopie, borne by men of great place. Thus accompanied by James King of Scotland, many Princes, Lords and Knights of England and France, he was conuaued from Rouen to Abbeville, to Hesdin, to Menstruill, Bologna, & Calais, the Chariot all the way compassed about with men all in white garments, bearing burning Torches in their hands; next vnto whom followed his household seruants, all in blacke, and after them the Princes, Lords, and Estates in vtures of mourning adorned; then two miles distant from the corps followed the still lamenting Queene, attended with princely mourners, her tender and pierced heart more inly mourning, then her outward sadde weedes should in any sort expresse.

(85) And thus by Sea and Land the dead King was brought vnto London, where through the streets the Chariot was drawne with foure horses, whose Caparisons were richly embroidered, and embossed with the royall Armes, the first with Englands Armes alone, the second with the Armes of France and England in a field quartered, the third bare the Armes of France alone, and the fourth three crowns or in a field Azure, the ancient Armes of King Arthur, now well becomming him who had victoriously vniued * three Kingdomes in one. The body with all pompous celebrity was entered in the Church at Westminster (for so Henrie had by his last will commanded) next beneath King Edward the Confessor, vpon whose Tombe Queene Katherine caused a royall picture to be laid, couered all ouer with siluer plate plate guile, but the head thereof altogether of massy siluer. All which at that Abbeyes suppression, (when the battering hammers of destruction did found almost in euery Church) were sacrilegiously broken off, and by purloining transferred to farr prophaner vses, where, at this day, the headlesse monument, (worthy to be restored by some more Princely and sacred hand) is to be seene, and with these verses writtten vpon his Tombe.

*Dux Normannorum, verus Conquestor eorum.

*Here Normans Duke, so styled by Conquest iust,

His Wife.

(86) Katherine, daughter to King Charles the sixt of France, vpon an agreement of peace forementioned, was married vnto King Henrie at Troyes in Champaigne, Junij 3. A.D. 1420. and after Febr. 14. was Crowned at Westminster with all solemnities. Shee was his Queene two yeeres, and about three months, and suruiuing him, was remarried vnto Owen Theodore of Wales, vnto whom shee bare three sonnes, Edmund, Iasper, and Owen, and a daughter who liued not long. Owen tooke the habite of religion at Westminster, the other two by King Henry the sixt (their halfe brother,) were honorably preferred; Edmund was created Earle of Richmond, and marrying Margaret, the sole heire of John Beaufort Duke of Somerset, was father by her vnto Henry (the only heire of Lancaster,) afterwards King of England. Iasper, the second brother, was created the same yeere, Earle of Pembroke, who requited his brothers kindnes with continuall assistance against the house of Torke; and when that faction preuailed, he was forced to flee into Flanders, but it againe waning, he was both restored, and to his greater honour created Duke of Bedford, dying without any issue legitimate: This Queene, either for deuotion, or her owne safety, tooke into the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, where dying Jan. 2. A.D. 1436. shee was buried in our Ladies Chappell within S. Peters Church at Westminster; whose Corpstaken vp in the raigne of King Henry the seuenth her Grand-child, (when hee laid the foundation of that admirable structure,) and her Coffin placed by King Henry her husbands Tombe, hath euer since so remained, and neuer reburied: where it standeth (the Couer being loose) to be seene and handled of any that will; and that by her owne appointment, faith Report, (which doth in this, as in most things, speake vnto truth) in regard of her disobedience to King Henry, for being deliuered of her sonne at the place hee forbade.

His Sonne.

(87) Henry the only child of a roiall couple, borne at Windore, and not nine months old at his fathers death, succeeded in his dominions, though not holding his Empire with the like glory. Crowned he was with the Crownes of two Kingdomes, but vnable by much to weild the scepter of one, that of France was lost by the factions of his Nobles, before it was well wonne, and Englands Crowne twice plucked from his head before his death. Of whose adventures and variable raigne (the times when England lay goared in the blood of her ciuill warres) we shall speake in the ensuing relation of his innocent, but vntortunate life.

Henry V I.

HENRIE THE SIXTH. KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE THREE AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ad God almighty (the *giuer and transferer of Kingdomes) thought good that the English should haue scled in the Continent of Europe, and not haue bene shutt vp within their Ilands, hee would not so soone haue depriued them of their late incomparable Captaine and Soueraigne Henry the fifth. But it seemes that God hauing humbled the French Nation vnder Henries victorious hand, ment now again to restore them to his wonted fauor by taking away their terror & triumph, substituting his son (an Infant) in his place, Henrie of that name the 6. born at Windsor, who was crowned about the eight month of his age. The pretty hands which could not feed himselfe, were yet made capable to weeld a scepter, and hee that was beholding to nurses for milke, did neuertheless distribute the sustenance of law and iustice to so great and warlike Nations. Counsell supplies the defect of age. At his fathers death hee had vnclcs, men of approued valour and discretion, to whom the principall care of all publike affaires by the fathers last prouisions was committed. Humfrey Duke of Gloucester (the younger brother of two) had the * gouernement of England entrusted to his fidelity: the regency of France was assigned for Prouince to Iohn Duke of Bedford, the eldest liuing vncl of the King, as to a Prince of much magnanimity, prouesse and felicitie in conduct, with whom was * ioynd Philip Duke of Burgundie. The guard and custody of the royall Infant was assigned to Thomas * Duke of Excester: the nurture and education to his * mother, the Queene Dowager: vpon the two vnclcs (as betweene the two Poles of the English Empire) the whole globe of gouernment moued: whatsoeuer is done by the kingly power is said to be done by the King. We shall behold notwithstanding in the tragical glasse of this Henries raigne, how farre the imbecillity of the kingly person son may affect the body politicke with good or euill. If histories were ordayned to stirre affections, not to teach and instruct, neuer any Princes raigne since the Conquest did better deserue to be described with a tragical style and words of horror & sorrow, although the beginning (like the faire morning of a most tempestuous day) promised nothing more then a continuance of passed felicities.

(3) For the State of the English affaires was great and flourishing, England without tumult, the naturall fierce humors of her people confuming or exercising themselves in France, and France herselfe (for the nobler parts together with the grand City of Paris head of that Monarchie) was at their deuotion. There wanted nothing which might aduance the worke begonne. Most noble and expert Leaders as those which had bin fithioned in the schoole of warre, vnder the best martiall master of that age, the late Henry, arms full of veteran souldiers, most of which were of skill sufficient to be commanders themselves: their friends firme, no defect nor breach (by which disipation might enter to the ouerthrow of the English greatnesse) as yet disclosing themselves. Wildome, pietie, riches, forwardnesse at home, courage and like forwardnesse abroad. It is a fruitfull speculation to consider how God carrieth his part in the workes of men, alwaies iustly, sometimes terribly, but neuer otherwise, then to bring all worldly greatnesse and glory into due contempt, and loathing, that the foule may be erected to her Creator, and aspire to a Crown celestiall. The first diaduantage which hapned to the English cause (after the late Kings decease) was the death of Charles the French King, who suruiued the other but * fiftie and three dayes. This wee may worthily call the first (as it was a great, as well as the first) diaduantage, for the imbecilities of that Prince were a strength to the English; On the other side (God obseruing a talio and parilitie) the infancy of young Henry was an aduantage to Charles the Dauphin of France, now by them of his faction called King of France, as the English vied in derision to enstyle him King of Berrie, because little else was left vnto him.

(3) In England (whose condition the order of nature wils vs first to describe, because there was the seat of counsell, by which all the actions of the generall state were directed) a Parliament was assembled to establish the Crowne vpon the Infant, and to provide for the publike vics and necessities of State. Money* (alwaies one of them) was liberally granted. It was a strange sight (and the first time that euer it was scene in England) which in the next yeere hapned, an infant sitting in the mothers lap, before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of Soueraigne direction in open Parliament. Yet so it was, for the Queene to illumine that publike conuention of States with her Infants presence, remoued from Windsor to London; through which Citie (her selfe royally seated with her young sonne vpon her lappe) passed in maiesticke manner to Westminster, and there tooke seate among all his Lords, whom (by the ordinary mouth of that high Court) hee saluted and spake to them at large concerning the premises; where, as hee vttered the mind of his place by anothers tongue, so hee elsewhere prosecuted all affaires by other mens hands and Organs.

selues endeavour nor endure, that by others their Soueraigne Lord young Henry should be defrauded of his inheritance, or that the hatreds and enmities which now beganne to die betweene the French and English names, should through the practices of most faithlesse men be renewed, and rekindled: That they would remember how (by Gods speciall fauour and goodnesse) the two Kingdomes of France and England were vniued under one most faire and goodly Monarchie in an eternal league, and lately so established that no humane force could resist: It has albeit they had sustained damage by the warre, yet the same would be recovered with aduantage, if they honored loved and obeyed their lawfull Soueraigne Lord King Henry, and prosecuted his enemies with extremity, according to bounden duty. This Oration found plausible admission in them: Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and such chieffes as were present did their homages, taking oath to be true: The like Obligation and Sacrament of allegiance was put vpon all the French through the English Dominions in France.

(5) Charles (who as sonne and heire to the late King entiled himselfe King of France, by the name of Charles the seventh) being then about the fawen and twentieth yeere of his age, full of courage and new hopes, gathered what force he could: his chieffe Leues were made in Dauphynois and Italy, from whence (for money) he drew sundry troupes. But the best finewe of his Army moued in certain thousands of the Scottish Nation, which serued vnder him. The first steppe which the Charolmes, or forces of Charles made into hostile action was vnfürate, for comming to raise the siege which the English held about * Crepan they were put to flight, with the losse of about two thousand of their numbers. This was noble in Charles, and his Charolines, that their minds funke not at the horrour of such an euill Omen. It was faith Amyllus of them, resolved to encounter aduerse fortune with encrease of courage. The Regent on the other side was vigilant vpon all occasions: the power of his Regency extended it selfe without contradiction * through Vimeux, Pontieu and Picardie, from Paris to Reines, Chalons and Troyes, up to the water of Loir and the Sea: A goodly scope of territory, and absolutely the best of France. That late losse & foile of the Charolines was repaired shortly after by an ouerthrow in skirmish which they gaue to the English party, from whom (with the slaughter of about fiftene hundred) they recovered a great booty, specially of Cattell which the English had gotten in the Countries of Nuyon and Main, but thus intercepted vpon their return into Normandy, Charles (which Paul, Amyllus omitteth) doubreth that success: for * Meulan vpon Sein is by him taken where all the English are put to the sword: but the possession was short, and the reuenge speedy: Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury (a man (saith Polydor) more like the old Romans then people of that age, so great was his vertue and cheualric) hauing with him Iohn of Luxemburg, General of the Burgundian horsemen, recouers the place, killing all the French which were found therein.

(6) At the Citie of * Amiens in Picardie the three great Dukes of Bedford (Regent of France) Burgoyne and Britaine meet to consult of the whole course & summe of affaires. There they renewed the League, adding, that each should be others friend, and that all of them should defend King Henries right with their best forces. For the better assurance of this profitable amity, the Regent (then a Bachelour) tooke to wife the Lady Anne, sister to Philip Duke of Burgundie: while the Regent was absent from Paris vpon these iust occasions, the Parisians (who not long before had * sent Ambassadors into England, to acknowledge their obedience to King Henry) practised with Charles to deliuer their City. The Regent had notice of this dangerous treason, and with his presence retained them in duety. The chieffe Actors paid their liues for satisfaction of the trespass. In good time there arrived out of England ten thousand fresh Souldiers. Over them hee ordered Captaines, the famous Earle of Salisbury, William Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Willoughby and others. Himselfe lead about with him for the generall service, eightene hundred horsemen, and eight thousand foote. With these field-forces the maieme of the English estate in France was held together, though not without difficulty, and diuers adventures. In them he tooke from Charles sundry strong Townes, and Fortresses as *Crotay, Bafide, Riol, Rula, Gyronde, Bafle, Mermond, Milham, Femel, Seintee, and many other.

(7) The Regents chiefe designe was to draw Charles to fight, hoping by his overthrow to conclude many daies workes in one. For this cause he drew into Normandy. Charles was then in Tourain, where he mustered his people. The Regent profpers in the meane time, and takes by siege a place of good importance, presuming to dare the French out to a Battell. John Duke of Alanson is sent with an Army and instructions to fight if occasion served, but Charles himselfe was not suffered to hazard his person. Not farre from the Towne of Vernail, which the *English had taken before the *Duke of Alanson, and his Charles could succour it, the two Armies embattelled themselves. The fight began with shot, which seeming not quicke enough to dispatch the work, the battells came to hand-strokes, where for some houres, there was maintained a constant and doubtfull battell with great furie on both sides. The English enured to the French warres, hauing borne the first heats of their enemies, (which are in that Nation most ragell:) by perseverance vterly brake and put them to flight. The Regent himselfe with a battle-axe fought most fiercely, winning immortal honor in that bloody journey. There were slaine of the enemies side: John *Earle of Boughwhan Constable of France: Archembald Douglas Duke of Tourain and Lieutenant of France: Archembald his sonne Earle of Wigton, with many other of the Scots. Of the French there were slaine the Earle of Vantadour, and sundry others. In all there died vpon that side certaine thousands. None writes of fewer then foure or five thousand, nor any of a-boue fiftene. The great number of the slaine, is not the measure of a victory, but the vice and effects which it drawes. The Duke of Alanson himselfe was taken prisoner, with about two hundred others of speciall worth. The English paid for this noble victory, the bodies of about two thousand of their souldiers which lost life there, for it was fought vpon faire termes in the open fields, and carried by meere manhood. That which followeth till the siege of Orleans, Paul *Amylius comprehendeth in some few lines. The fierce Conquerour besiegeth Maits in Main, and with Ordinance beates downe part of the walls. It yields hereupon. The English Garrison left shreine, after the taking not being sufficient to containe the Towne in due subiection, is compelled to flie to a Tower for their safetie, the enemies which were admitted into it by the Burgers enjoying the rest. The Lord Talbot (the most noble Captaine of the English) presently arriveth to the rescue, and puts the malefactors to death. The English Empire extends it selfe to the River of Loir. Charles they call in scorne the King of Berry. Thus roundly hee.

In nine Articles and capitulations drawne and concluded at the yielding of Maits, this was one, as perhaps it was in euery like occasion, That if any persons were found within the City, which had beene consenting to the murder of John Duke of Burgain, father to Philip Duke of Burgain, in full reuenge whereof, he had hitherto adhered to the English, that they should simply bee at the Regents mercy.

(8) The chiefe things which passed in England, during these happy proceedings in France, were briefly these.

James Steward the young King of Scots, hauing beene casually taken vpon the Sea, in the reigne of King Henry the fourth, and after his fathers death not sufficiently tendered nor respected by the Scots, remained still a Prisoner. The rather therefore to hinder the Scots, (that was the hope) from aiding the French, it was now thought fit by the Councell of England to enlarge him. Which was accordingly done vpon pledges. Not long after the which, he married the Ladie Lane, daughter to John Earle of Somerset, neere cosen to King Henry. Principall matters forward of this marriage (as by likelihood of his liberty also) to honour their family with a Kingly alliance, were the Earle of Somerset and the Bishop of Winchester, both of them Beauforts, who together with sundry other of the English Nobility, conducted the new married Couple to the Scottish Borders. Much of his ransom was abated, and his new kinsmen bestowed vpon him a store of plate, gold, and siluer, & among other gorgeous Ornaments suit of hangings, in which the labors of Hercules were most curiously wrought. But this wife King (hauing had the benefit of excellent and Princely education in England) did not suffer any obligations contracted in the time of his durance, to preponderate with him the Generall state of Scotland, whose freedome did much depend vpon the fortune of France, whereby the maine drift of his enlargers was not much advanced. The reason notwithstanding which lead this action was probable, and so much the more commendable, for that it was tempered with humanity. The forerime mischief thus howsoever intended, hereby to be avoided or qualified, Sir John Mortimer (a dangerous firebrand at home) being Prisoner in the Tower was arraigned for many treasonable speeches vied to a yeoman, (seruant to Sir Robert Scot, a keeper of the Tower of London) to draw the said yeoman to let him escape: promising him great matters. The points of his speeches were as that fellow charged vpon him in open Parliament.

1. That the said Mortimer meant to flie into Wales to the Earle of March, and with an armie of forty thousand men to enter England, and strike off the Protector's head, and the Bishop of Winchester's.

2. That the Earle of March ought by right to be King of England, and if the Earle would not, that then hee himselfe was next heire.

3. That if he could not safely reach to the Marches, he would flie to the Dauphin of France, and there serue with honor, which he was assured of.

For these ouertures of escape, and conspiracie the Knight was drawne hanged and headed: Of whose death so small a slander arose. Perhaps he that writes so doth meane that the whole was but a stratageme to rid him out of the way. Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, the party whom the said knight mentioned, was sent not long after with many other Lords, and competent numbers of men, into Ireland, where he deceased without issue, whose great patrimony descended to Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, the fatal disturber of the Realme of England, vpon the pretence of Mortimers title to the Crowne.

(9) The amity with the Duke of Burgain, which the English had hitherto found so auailable toward their Conquests, hauing otherwise receiued some few slight flaws was now in danger of vter breaking vpon this occasion. Humphrey Duke of Gloucester Protector of the Realme, following councell vnworthy of his person and place, contracted himselfe with the Ladie Iaqueline of Barrois, Inheretrix of Holland, Zelaud, Henault, and many other faire dominions in the Netherlands, notwithstanding that John Duke of Brabant, her former husband was then liuing, and that the suit of diuorice commenced by Iaqueline depended still betwene them. The Duke of Burgain held with Brabant. This bred bitter humor in the Duke of Gloucester, who being not vied to meet with any rubs or confrontments, and now when in person he came with an armie to take seision seision of Henault in right of his supposed wife, finding himselfe hard vnto, by the aids which Burgain ministred to the Duke of Brabant, he challenged Combat of the Duke of Burgain, calling him traitour. It was accepted and hee strongly thrust vpon Gloucester, who (leaving the light Lady at her Towne of Maits in Henault) returned into England, doing nothing of that for which at that time he came. Mediation tooke vp the quarrell afterward betwene the Duke of Burgain and him. Not long after the returne of the Duke of Gloucester into England, the first marriage which had beene made and consummated betwene the Duke of Brabant, and the said Lady Iaqueline, was pronounced lawful by Pope Martin the fifth. Hereupon the Duke of Gloucester (hauing sustained many losses awell of friends as treasure in punishment of that great sinne, in taking anothers wife) forthwith marries Eleanor, daughter to Reigald Lord Cobham of Sterborough, whereby he made her amends for that vnlawfull familiarity which had formerly passed betwene them.

Meanwhile the Court of England doth well shew that the King was an infant, for it was full of dangerous emulations and sittings, the Duke of Gloucester (whose high office it was to tender the welfare of the King and State) laying sundry grievous accusations against the Cardinal Beaufort (sonne of John Duke of Lancaster) Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor as being a person very dangerous vnto both.

(10) The news of these home-contentions coming to the Duke of Bedford into France, easily drew him home, though the state of that Realme could not well want his presence. For John Duke of Britaine, (notwithstanding his late renouation of league with the Regent at Amiens) ialous of the *English greatness turned fodeinly to Charles, and with him, Arthur, Earle of Richmond his brother. This puts fresh spirit into the drooping Prince. Arthur is by Charles made Constable of his France, in place of the Scottish Earle, who was slaine at the bloody Battell of Vernail. The Duke of Britaine ouerlives this reuolt but a small time. Arthur to declare his forwardness on the behalfe of Charles, assembles about twenty thousand men, and with them fodeinly besiegeth S. Iean a Towne of Normandy, vpon the frontier of Britaine; which Edmund Duke of Somerset, Gouverneur of Normandy, had lately fortified and stult with souldiers. The vnexpected arrival of the French, did greatly at the first perplex the English, but vpon better aduise, they valiantly sallied out vpon them, both before and behind, which stroke to great terrour into the enemy, that with losse of their Artillery, and many of their people they forsooke the sieg. To redeeme this dishonour, he turnes his fury vpon the Countrey of Angiou, which in many parts he depopulates and spoiles. The Regent being resolved to returne into England, leaves behind him Beauchamp Earle of Warwick, a lieutenant, who was lately arrived in France, hauing six thousand fresh Souldiers in his company.

(11) The presence of the Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to the State of England very necessary. For the wisdom and authority of so great a Prince, being eldest vnckle to the King, and one whom many great deedes made famous, allayed the distemper which he found at his arrival. It was a worke worthy of his labour, and he also found it to be a worke indeed, and not easily effectuable. The differences were debated first at Saint Albans, then at Northampton, lastly in a Parliament at Leicester, which continued there till toward the end of Iune. The Duke of Bedford himselfe, to auoid the note of partiality, for that his brother of Gloucester was a party did not intermeddle otherwise then as in Generall words to perswade amity, but the whole cause was referred to arbitrators of greatest Nobility and prudence: by whose endeouours all those differences and greuan-ces were equally thrust into one sacke, to be sealed vp for euer by obliuion, and without mention of amends on either side, the Duke and Bishop (the one hauing sworn by his Princelikehood, the other by his Priesthood, truly to obsecure the award,) shooke hands, and were fully for that time reconciled. After which holy and necessary worke of priuate atonements, ensued acts of feilitie and honor. For in the same Towne of Leicester the young King, not then six yeeres of age, was at the high feast of Pentecost dubbed Knight by the Regent of France. Immediately whereupon the King honored Richard Earle of Cambridge, (who by the fatal error of the Councell was at this Parliament created Duke of Yorke, the same who was father to Edward the fourth) with the order of knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Richard Duke of Yorke was hee, who brought vpon this Kingdome and nation most dolefull diuisions to the vter extirpation of all the males in either house, that is to say, his owne, and that of Lancaster, whereof the young King was head. From Leicester the King was conueighed to Killingworth, and Thomas Duke of Excester dying, Beauchamp Earle of Warwick, was constituted Guardian and Tutor to the King.

(12) The Regent hauing thus worthily provided for the quiet estate of the King and Countrey, returns to his charge in France. There went ouer at the same time a choise and great number of fresh men, vnder the conduct of that immortally renowned, the L. Talbot, whose victories (saith Polydor) were so many, that his name was not only most dreadful to the French, but most famous through the world, euen at this present. That yee may know the man not to haue beene studious of fine Phrases, vpon the one side of his sword-blade was engrauen, Sum Talboti, and vpon the other this boisterous blunt sentence;

Pro vincere inimicos meos.

The Duke of Alanson (taken at the Castell of Vernail) was set at liberty vpon payment of two hundred thousand Scutes of gold. At Montargis about Orleans the English receiued an overthrow with the losse of about fiftene hundred of their numbers, and in Britaine the French sustained great damages by a Captaine of the Duke of Somerset. These were petty matters: They of Maits in Maine had drawne in the French by night, who massacred the English. William Earle of Suffolke Captaine of the place sends to John Lord Talbot for succour. It came, and that so vnexpectedly, that the French were alike distrest. All but souldiers were spared, and many also of them, though thrust into prisons. The Traitors which had caused so much mischief, had their defects by death. From hence the Lord Talbot marched to other enterprises. The quality of our taskes calvs to the maine.

(13) Thomas Lord Montacute Earle of Salisbury, being with the Regent at Paris, and considering what forces of men, and all prouisions the English then enioied, bethought himselfe of some action, which might answer the greatness of his owne name, and of the publike meanes. The sieg of Orleans is by him propounded to the Councell. The credite of the Motioner was alone an argument of power to conuince the possibility. His desires were therefore furnished with all competent prouisions. They of Orleans hearing what a storme was coming (for the name of this Earle was worthily terrible) with great diligence ordaine for their defence. The Suburbs (answerable in bignesse to a good City) they leuell with the earth, that the enemy might not from thence annoy them. Men, viuals, munition, and constant intentions to fight for their liberty, and safeguard abounded. The Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Talbot, and a dreadfull puissance vnder most expert commanders present themselves before it. Orleans was and is an Episcopall See, a Parliament Parliament Towne, and Vniuersity, richly situate vpon the riuier of Loir, whose best glory it is, being the chiefe City which that renowned streame watereth. No enemies appearing abroad, he approacheth close to the walles. Assaults * prouing vain, he entrencheth about it, and to secure his Campe, casts vp ramparts and other works, one of which (by reason of the hugeness thereof) was called London, by the name of the chiefe City of England. The Fort which stood at the Bridge foot beyond the Loyr, hee seileth vpon and closeth them vp on euery side. Charles of France could minister no sufficient succor. God, when mans helpe failes interposeth his hand, which as all vs daily seele, so is it most conspicuous in the deliuerance of Nations. The City is driven to some miserie through the beginning want of all things; for the siege had now endured about 60 daies * not without much bloodshed on both sides. The Earle of Salisbury impatient of such delay, purpeth to giue a general assault. The better to consider vpon the course, hee stands to take view at a window barred with Iron which overlooked the City toward the East. Behold how God began to vncut the knot of those bands with which the English held France bound, a bullet of a great peece (which lay ready leueld at that window) discharged by the Gunners * sonne, a lad, stroke the grates, whose splinters so wounded the Earle, and one Sir Thomas Gargrave, that they both dyed of the incurable hurts within few daies. Heare now the common iudgement of Writers concerning this Earles losse: *Presently after the death of this man the fortune of the war changed. * Now both mortal and immortal powers began to looke fauorably vpon the State of France. This to the * English was Initium malorum: for after this mischance they rather lost then wanne, so that by little and little they lost all their possession in France: and albeit that somewhat they got after, yet for one that they wane, they lost three. So that Polydor not without cause (after many other great praices) doth elsewhere call him the man in whom the safety of the English state consisted. The vertue therefore of a fortunate General is ineffimable.*

(14) Howbeit the siege did not determine with his life, William Earle of Suffolk, the Lord Talbot & the rest maintained the same all the winter. The wants of the Campe were relieved from Paris by a conuoy, vnder the guard of Sir John Fastolf and fiftene hundred souldiers who arrived safe in despite of all the attempts to distresse the, which the French made. The City would yeeld it selfe, but not to the English. The Duke of Burgundie they were content should haue the honour. A suble stratagem, rather then an offer of yeelding, for there was likelihood in it to breake thereby the amity betweene the English and him. The Regent and his Counsell being sent vnto, thought it not reasonable (* Emylius erroneously makes the late Earle of Salisbury the Author of that refusal) neither indeed was it, theirs hauing beene the cost and labour. The Duke of Burgundie construed this repulse fowerly, which marred his taste of the English friendship euer after: yet the Regents answer was iust and honest. That the warre was made in King Henries name, and therefore Orleanse ought to be King Henries. Among these difficulties stood the French affaires. Charles of France vnderstanding the miserable straites of his deare City, & ignorant how to remedy so neere a mischance; there presented her selfe vnto him at Chinon a yong maid about eightene yeeres old, called Joan of Lorraine, * daughter to Tames of Arck dwelling in Dormey neere Auclours, a * Shepherdesse vnder her father, whose flockes shee tended, bids him not faint, and constantly affirms, that God had sent her to deliuer the Realme of France from the English yoke, and restore him to the fullnesse of his fortunes. Shee was not forthwith credited; but when the wife of both forts, aswell Clerkes as Souldiers had fitted her with manifold questions, the continued in her first speech so stedfastly, vterring nothing but that which was

* modest, chaste and holy, that honour and faith was giuen vnto her sayings. An * old woman directed her. Joan armed her selfe like a man, and requires to haue that sword which hung in * S. Kathelines church of Eierboke in Touaine. This demand encreased their admiration of her; for such a sword was found among the old Donaries or Votiuie tokens of that Church. Thus warlike arrayed the rides to Blair, where forces and fresh victuals lay for the reliefe of Orleanse. Shee with the Admirall and Marshall of France enters safe. This did greatly encourage the fainting French. Joan the maide of God, so they called her, (though * some haue written that it was a practise or imposture) writes thus to de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, who succeeded Salisbury in the maine charge of that siege.

(15) King of England do reason to the King of heauen for his blood royall; yeeld vp to the Virginie the keyes of all the good Cities which you haue forced. She is come from heauen to reclaim the blood royall, and is ready to make a peace, if you bee ready to deserue it: yeeld therefore, and pay what you haue taken, King of England: I am the chiefe of this war, where soeuer I encounter your women in France, I will chafe them: will they or no. If they will obey, I will take them to mercy. The Virginie comes from heauen to driue you out of France. If you will not obey, shee will cause you great a stirre as the like hath not bene these thousand yeeres in France. And beleeue certainly, that the King of heauen will send to her, and her good men of Arms, more force then you can haue. Goe in Gods name into your Country: bee not obstinate, for you shall not hold France of the King of Heauen, the sonne of S. Marie, but Charles shall enioy it, the King and lawfull heire to whom God hath giuen it. Hee shall enter Paris with a goodly traine; you William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, John Lord Talbot, Thomas L. Scales Lieutenant to the Duke of Bedford, and you Duke of Bedford terming your selfe Regent of the Realme of France, spare innocent blood, and leaue Orleanse in liberty. If you doe not reason to them whom you haue wronged, the French will doe the goodliest exploit that euer was done in Christendome. Vnderstand these newes of God, and of the Virginie. Yet Charles had at this time no whole Countries vnder his obedience, * but Languedoc and Dauphin against which both the Sauoyard and Burgundian prepared, but miscarried, the Prince of Orange the third confederate being discomfited.

(16) This letter was entertained by the English with laughter. Joan reputed no better then a Bedlam or Enchantresse. Though to some it may seem more honourable to our Nation, that they were not to bee expelled by a humane power, but by a diuine, extraordinarily reuealing it selfe. De Serres describes this Paragon in these words. Shee had a modest countenance, sweete, ciuill, and resolute, her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastity without vanity, affection, babbling, or courtly lightnesse. Let vs not dissemble what wee finde written. By her encouragements and conduct the English had Orleanse plucked out of their hopes, after they had suffered the Duke of Alanson to enter with new force, and with much losse were driuen to raise the siege. Joan her selfe was wounded at one sallie in which shee led, being shot through the arme with an arrow. Iudge what shee esteemed of that hurt, when shee vied these admirable and terrible words. This is a fauour, let vs goe on, they cannot escape the hand of God. In all aduentures shee was one and formost. The English lost at this siege, the Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Molins, the Lord Penninges, and many other. But doe not rashly beleeue Serres in saying, that of all forts were slaine in such sallies, as the martiall Virginie made eight thousand. Our Writers say but * sixe hundred. The Lord Talbot marched away with about nine thousand, whom Joan would not suffer the French to pursue. In memory of this admirable deliuerance, they of that City erected a monu-

(17) There was an interchangeable taking and recouering of Townes and places of importance vpon both sides. The Lord Talbot tooke Launell, and the Earle of Suffolke puts himself into lergause. Thither the Duke of Alanson with Joan and other great Captaines come, which they force by assault. Sir Alexander Paul the Earles brother was slaine, with many others in the fight, the Earle himselfe remained prisoner. The Duke added some other places to this Conquest: soone after his numbers are augmented by the repaire to him of Arthur Constable of France, the Earle of Yandome, the Lord Dalbret and others, so that now their whole Army contained about twenty and three thousand men. With these they encounter the Lord Talbot (who had scarce the fifth part of their numbers) at a village called Raisy, whom they charged so sodainly, that his Archers had no time to fortifie their batels (after their manner) with a Palizado, or empalement of stakes, so that the chiefe fight must bee made vpon horsebacke. After three houres bloody resistance, the English were put to the worst. * The Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Ramplene, and euen the Lord Talbot himselfe (being first wounded in the backe) were taken. The footmen enforced to truit to their * swords vnder the shelter of such horrements remained, retreated in order, and came to a place of safety. The English lost about a thousand, the French about 600. This blow shooke the whole fabrick of the English greatnesse in France, at the very foundations, awaking multitudes (euen of those who before had vowed fealty to the English, and now had colour of diuine warrant for violating that vow) to ioyne with the victors for the recouery of common liberty. There followed the present reuolt of lundry townes; neither was it long before Charles himselfe issues out in Armes, recouers the City of Aunerre and Reims; where according to the Maides direction, hee was solemnly crowned King. Hitherto shee might bee thought propheticall and fortunate. It should seeme now that the chiefe part of her employment was accomplished, yet the flourish a while longer. The Duke of Bedford to buttresse the shrinking state of English affaires in France, and to encounter euill fortune in the face, vpon the vnpleasant newes of Orleanse rescued, and Talbots taking, musters his whole present forces which made about ten thousand English, besides certaine wings of Normans: with these hee marcheth out of Paris, and opposeth himselfe to the Current of Charles his new hopes who meant to attempt that City, some of whose Citizens held strict and secret correspondence with him. But vpon this affrontment hee suspended the execution of that design, hauing as then no hope to achieve it. The Regent returns to Paris, Joane the Puell dissuaded Charles from fight.

(18) Places of speciall note as Campagne and Beauuon yeelded themselves voluntarily to Charles. The Regent hauing felted the Estate, and Garrisons of the chiefe City, passeth into Normandy, to provide for a safe retreat there, if perhaps the English (by the ineuitable will of God) should beeenforced to quit their other holdes and dominions: which hee began to suspect, for that hee had intelligence of a secret purpose, which the French pursued to winne the Burgundians from King Henries side. While the Regent was absent vpon this occasion, Charles got the Towne of Saint Denis, (a neighbour to Paris) though hee held it not long by practise. From thence hee sends the Duke of Alanson and Joane to trie their friends and fortunes at Paris. They found not hoped successe, for the English gaue them so rough an encounter, that Joan her selfe was * wounded; and the rest with much slaughter driuen to fall off. The Regent hearing of these attempts, entruseth the Coast Townes of Normandy, to the care of Richard Duke of Yorke, and Roan (the Capital City of that Dutchy) to Edmund Duke of Somerset, himselfe speedes to Paris, where hee commends the souldiers and Citizens for that they had not imitated the disloyaltie of their Neighbours. New supplies came out of England. The next enterprise was to reduce Campagne to obedience. John of Luxemburg with Burgundians and some English besieged it. Here the glory of Joan vnfortunately ended, for coming to the rescue shee entered indeed, but afterward falling forth, her troups were beaten, and her selfe (being betrayed, say her fauourers) taken prisoner by the said Burgundian * Knight, who for the value of her ransom (ten thousand pounds * Turnoys, and three hundred Crownes yearly rent) deliuered her vnto the English. The siege was notwithstanding rayled; they sent her to Roan, where shee (about nine or ten moneths after) was burnt to death. Clahis was faued by * Perseus, and it is not to be doubted, but that the magnanimity of the English would haue spared her, had they not found it necessary to deface the opinion which the French euen with superstition had conceived of her. Our * Writers shew how the course of her life being legally examined by the Bishoppe of Beauuon (in whose Diocesse shee was taken) and thence thereupon forcerie, bloudshed, and vnnaturall vie of manlike appparell, and habiliments contrary to her sex, condemned to die, was notwithstanding vpon her solemne aburing of such her lewd praactices, pardoned her life, till againe convicted of peruriours relapsing, though acknowledging her selfe a * strumpet, and faying to be with child, shee deseruedly vnderwent that punishment which shee sought to delay. The rumor of her end, and the ignominious cause thereof was somewhat incommodious to the affaires of Charles. It was thought that the comming of King Henry to Paris would be much more.

(19) Hee had already with great solemnity receiued the Crowne of England at Westminster, being about nine yeeres olde, a most fashionable and waxen age for all impression either of good or bad. The next yeere after his Coronation in England, hee passeth ouer into France there alio to receiue the diadem thereof. The Constable of England, was before his departure, assigned by Patent for terme of life to Richard Duke of Yorke (which gaue him a more feeling of greatnes and secretly whetted his ambitious appetite,) vpon this occasion. One John Vpton, of Feuerham in Kent Notarie, accused John Down of the same place Gentleman, that hee and his complices did imagine the Kings death at his Coronation. The combar was granted, and in Smithfield (the Duke of Yorke exercising the office of high Constable) they fought in lifts. In the end the Kings name was vied to part and forgie them. It is a vice to suspect too farre. The Duke of Yorke (a most suble man) seemes neuer in heart to haue benee true subiect to King Henry: yet no man faith, hee was any author in this. Henric (the common wealth hauing yeelded to liberal grants of money) is now ready to enter Paris. England remained vnder the gouernment of the Duke of Glocester.

(20) There is no doubt that the English there at their Kings presence, set forth their greatnes to the full shew. The yong King attended vpon with two English Cardinals, Yorke, and Winchebster, and great Princes of his blood, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Prelates, and the flower of our nation, with many alwel French and Burgundians, as Normans and others, excellent well appointed, makes a triumphant entry into the head City of that most noble Monarchy. There was no signe in the People but of ioy and welcome; the shewes were many and magnificent. Vpon the seuenth day of December, hee was solemnly Crowned King of France, by the * Cardinal of Winchebster, his great vncle, in the * Chiefe Church of Paris, called of New Lady. of the Affinity with a set speech, wherein he declared, King Henry his Nephew undoubted title to that Crowne, and commended the same to their fidelities, adding ample promises of honour and emolument. Such of the French Nobilitie as were present, did their homage. The people had good and gracious words given vnto them, and certaine quantities of money, Corne, and wine, in the nature of a donative, liberally distributed among them. Proclamations were made, that all Frenchmen who came in by a day there named, should be protected. The Kings Patents and grants touching French matters, passed vnder the seale and stile of Henry King of the Frenchmen and of England, which Seale (for variety) we haue prefixed, as we found it annexed, to a writing directed by the King to his Court of Requests in his Pallace at Paris; but for English affaires he vied another Seale, being in euery point like vnto that of King Henry the fourth, and (as some thinke) the very same stamp, (which therefore we haue here omitted,) as likewise some Charters of his thereare, whereunto he affixed the seale of his father. Charles of France esteemed not himselfe the lesse a King for all this, but pursues his affaire. The King hauing thus taken possession of France, not long after tooke his farewell thereof. His returne was by Rouen, and so ouer land to Calais, from whence vpon the eleuenth day of February, hee arriued safe at Douer. His vncke the Duke of Glocester was able to giue an honest, and good account of the Government during the kings absence. The suppression of an insurrection, beginning at Abington in Oxfordshire was not the least seruice. A weauer (the Balliffe of the Towne) was the vicious head, to which that corruption gathered, who had changed his own name, and called himselfe; Jacke Sharpe of Wigmore land in Wales. The speciall colour of his attempt was to haue massacred Priests whose heads (he said) hee would make as cheape as Sheeps-heads; that is, two or three, or ten for a penny. But the mention of Wigmore lands, the ancient inheritance of Mortimer, (then the possession of the fatal Duke of Torke, who afterward in the right of that name, challenged the Crowne of England from King Henry) insinuates somewhat further. The varlet forfeited his head and foure quarters for his attempt. It is to be wondered that the Councell of Estate vnder King Henry, hearing that title so oft glanced at, provided not better against the mischief. But the eyes and hearts of the wife are blinded, when God hath a purpose to referre a scourge, or to hide the fire which shall afterward be vfed to consume a nation. Vnquiet humors were aswell abroad as at home. The fouldiers of Calais discontented with their wages as little began to be continually troublesome. The Regent comes thither in person in Easter weeke, where he exerciseth necessary discipline severely. Foure, the most faulty lost their heads, one hundred and ten are cashiered, and banished from the Towne, as fixe coe others had formerly bene. Why dwell we vpon so petty accidents? The losse of the Kingdom of France is imminent. Let vs diligently note the degrees which God found out to deprive our Nation of that honor. In this iourney of the Regent, King Henrys interest was not aduanced. The Regent (a widower) roade from thence to Turwin, where (without the Burgundians priuiey) he married the Lady Jaquet, aged about a feuentene yerres * daughter to Peter of Lutsembourge Earle of S. Paul no friend to the Burgundian. This was nothing prosperous to the English affaires. For Anne, the Regents former wife, sister to the Duke of Burgundy, being, while shee liued, a strong reason and assurance of amitie, weakened the same by her death; and this second marriage, nor pleasing the Burgundian, did yet more diminish it. These were but degrees.

In the meane space, the accidents of warre between the English and French, were manifold and perplex, now wee, now they feeling, or gaining, as opportunity serued: which vncertainties brought forth their ordinary progenies, fearefull outrages, and * sacrifice of all things needfull for the vfe of man. It would be wearisome, and not much necessary, to recount the particular lesser actions, neither indeede is it easie; for who can readily tell the sieges, surprises, skirmishes and the like, being so confusedly set down by Authors, wherein diuers of both Nations wanne to themselves much honour, and serued the vtes of those times, and their owne. The vttermost effect of those great labours, was that the English Regency fell not forthwith into nothing. Permanent leaders in those publike seruices were the Regent himselfe, their maine Pillar and Chief life, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Earle of Warwick, Henry his Sonne, the Lord Willoughby, the thrice noble John Lord Talbot, (who was now at liberty,) the Lord Scalles, besides Knights, Esquires, and other valiant Captaines a multitude.

(21) The fortune of Renate Duke of Barre, is not to be omitted, for thereafterward, our King luckily married into his house. He had to wife Isabell the daughter, and heire of Charles Duke of Lorraine, by whom hee had issue two sonnes, and two daughters, the youngest of which was Lady Margaret, to whom King Henry afterward tooke to wife. Charles Duke of Lorraine dying, Renate thinks to succeed in that estate. Antony Earle of Vallemant, brother to Charles presumes he hath a nearer right. The matter comes to be determined by blowes. Charles King of France was a steadfast supporter of Renates claime, in lieu oflike offices performed by Renate to him in the times of most difficulty. The Regent and Philip Duke of Burgundy, stood for the Earle. Their aides preuailed so much, that Renates forces were beaten with losse of about a three thousand, from the siege of Vallemant, and himselfe with not fewer then two hundred others remained prisoner to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whose subiects commanded in chief at that enterprize. This * Renate was afterward entituled to the Crowne of Naples and Sicilia, by the testament of Ioane Queene of them. The King of France might seeme to haue sustained a grieuous losse by the entralment of this Duke: but the English gained nothing thereby: for his perswasions, and priuate offices on the behalfe of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Burgundians heart (which now was knit to the English but with feeble Arteries) to accept in time the holy impression of reconciliation. The French who liued vnder the Regency, or in danger of the English, made choise of the Burgundian to protect them, which could not be embarrased to them, for that he was as yet King Henrys pretended friend. Indeede this Scene and vnstable state of affaires was full of horror, which Polydore Vergill describeth well enough. While the English and French (quoth he) contend for Dominion, Souerainty and life is selfe, mens goods in France were violently taken by the licence of warre. Churches spoiled, men euery where murdered, or wounded, other put to death, or tortured, Maids rauished, Maids forcibly drayne from out their parents armes to be deflowered, Townes daily taken, daily spoiled, daily defaced, the riches of the Inhabitants carried whither the Conquerors thinke good, houses and villages round about set on fire: no kind of cruelty is left vnpractised vpon the miserable French; omitting many hundred kinds of other calamities, which all at once oppressed them. Adde hereto that the Commonwealth being destitute of the helpe of lawes, (which for the most part are mute in times of warre and mutinie) floateth vp and downe without any anchorage anchorage at right or iustice. Neither was England herselfe void of these mischiefs, who euery day heard the woe of her valiant childrens funerals, slaine in perpetuall skirmishes and bickerings, her generall wealch continually chid, and wained, so that the euils seemed almost equall, and the whole Westerne world echoed the groanes and sighes of either Nations quarrels, being the common argument of speech and compassion throughout Christendome.

(22) The course certainly which the English held, did only faintly keepe aliae the Generall State of the Regency, without giuing period to the warre, either by finishing the Conquest, or feeling that which was conquered. Some would haue had large supplies of men, and treasure leuied, that King Charles might not where haue any rest: Of this opinion were Badford * himselfe, the Dukes of Torke and Sommerfet. This Councell was not followed, but another, in few more frugal, which fed the euils, but redressed none. Present sparings doe oftentimes draw after them infinite wails, and no husbandrie proues so ill, as vnreasonable Parimony. In the mean time, the Earle of Arundel and the Lord Talbot, carry about victorious Armes, and terrible Angion, Main, and other places with their successes. In Normandie, neuertheless the common people drew together in huge multitudes. There were threescore * thousand of them rebelliously knotted together in Vexin, Norman, and twenty thousand in Caux. Their purpose was (through dislike of the English Government, or practise of the French) to haue reacht one hand to King Charles, and to haue thrust King Henrys officers out. What is a multitude without aduice? To stoppe their insolency and course which * they held toward Caen, the Earle of * Arundel, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with about thirteen hundred light horse, and fixe thousand Archers, march against them, by direction of the Dukes of Torke and Sommerfet, who had the chiefe Leutenancies in Normandie. They diuide their forces to vfe them with the more aduantage. The Earle staves in Ambush with two parts, the Lord Willoughby drawes them into it with the third. A thousand of the Rebels were cut down before the fouldiers hands could be flayed to spare the rest, who basely (as it became them) threw away their weapons, and fell to the earth, crying mercy. The multitudes were suffered to returne, their ringleaders lost their liues. All that the world could collect by this popular insurrection was, that the Normans would be gladly rid of the English. Nothing else was done. This Earle of Arundel hauing done sundry noble deeds during the wars in France, receiued his deathes wound shortly after in a skirmish at Gerberoy in Beauuoisine, where La Hire (a famous Captaine among the enemies) had the day.

(23) The Regency yet held, and the miseries of France (being burnt vp by the fiery reflections of two Counter-Sunnes) were nothing diminished: Who should giue to them a Period? while the Duke of Burgundy continued English, it could not be. To prepare therefore a separation betweene them, such of the Nobility as went ouer to the Burgundian Duke told him, * That King Charles vpon all occasions (when speech was ministered) spake of him honourably, and inwardly wished him well, and that he neuer heard any mention of the murder committed vpon the Duke his father, (cause of the sonnes hatred to France) but he heartily sighed, protesting hee was neither party nor priuy therunto. These and the like mollifying salues applied to the tumors of his reuengefull affections, did worke strongly, the rather for that his minde heretofore possessed with the English amity, was now vacant in that part, the same (by the means of sundry leaculies and auserions) lying open to contrary impressions. There wanted but an outward honourable meanes to fashion him entirely to the French partie. Let vs heare * Serres in this point: The Deputies of the Generall Councell presse both French, English and Burgundians to end all quarrels by some good composition. The City of Arras is allowed of them all to treat in. From the * Pope and Councell of Pisa, there came the Cardinals of S. Croisse and Cypres, with twelue Bishoppes. For the King of France, there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Conblable of France, the Archbishoppes of Reims, Chancellour of France, and many others, great, noble, wise and learned men. For the King of England, the two Cardinals of Torke and Winchester, the Earles of Suffolke (* John Holland Earle of Huntington) the Bishoppes of Saint Dauds, John Ratcliffe Keeper of the great Seale, the Lord Hungerford, Rafse the wife Officiall of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Diuinity. For Philip Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Guelers, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishoppes of Cambray, Count Vernambourg, the Bishoppes of Leige; hue other great Earles, besides the Deputies of many his best Townes, sufficient to shew, that though hee was in title but a Duke, yet that his greatness was equall to a King. When it came to communication, the English being also in possession, urged farther for themselves the right of descent, and the act of Charles the sixth, father to this Charles, by which all the Crowne of France was sold vpon Henry the fifth, and the issue of the Lady Katherine his wife, and therefore they propounded no other condition of peace, but that Henry their King might haue all, and * Charles to hold of him. The French offered Normandie and Guien. There ended the hope of agreement betweene them, for neither party would accept. King Charles therefore resoluing to maime the English faction vpon any termes (how base soeuer) sends Duke Philip a blanke, bids him therein to prescribe his owne conditions and demands: hee did so: and his Conditions were so vnreasonable, and so many, euen a great volume full, (saith a French man) as it is strange, so great a Monarch should stoop so much to his subiects and vassall, but that necessity hath no law. They * ioine hereupon most firmly, and the Duke (a man wholly transported by profite) declares himselfe a publike enemy to all the enemies of King Charles, and friend to all his friends. This was the first parting stroke which severed the French Dominions from the English Souerainty: the euent declared, that the English had done more wisely, if they had accepted Normandie and Guien; but as the case stood, then they could not in honour do it; and Councels are not to bee measured by euents; for so the most foolish may sometimes passe for prudent. King Henry not only lost now hereby a most needfull friend, but was compelled to relie vpon his single strengthes, aswell against King Charles his naturall enemy, as against the Duke of Burgundy, who plainly seemed to haue betrayed the cause. To set a gloss vpon this fact, the Duke * dispatcheth Ambassadors into England to King Henry (who as * Aemilius erroneously saith was present at this treaty of Arras) to make known the reasons of his peace with King Charles, and to perswade the King to entertaine the same. This Ambassage was so odious to the English, that they forbore not to call the Duke a deceitfull man, a turn-fewer, a perjured person, and a Traitor.

(24) The popular hatred also was such against the Dukes Subiects, reliant in London, that they were beaten and slaine many of them, before the furie thereof could be flayed by Proclamation. The Ambassadors returne with honest admonitions to their Master, against which, his cares and senses were strongly mured; for King Charles had set about them as it were a Barricado of royalties, priuiledges, honours, money, Cities, Townes and whole Provinces, which he confirmed to the Duke, only to withdraw him from vs. The whole Countiees of * Auxerre, Ponthieu, Bolein, Artois, the towne of Abbeville, and other lands, the Cities and Townes in Picardy, vpon the water of Some, Amiens, Corbie, Perren, *S. * foure hundred thousand Crownes were satisfied: Briefly, what nott the Charity of King Charles was so feruent to make the Duke of Burgundy a true Frenchman once againe: hee paid so deare for it, that wee may thinke him worthy to obtaine his desire; yet was it worth his cost; for Amylius saith most truly, that the ceasing of that indignation did re-leeme the French from a foraine government, as the first assuming thereof had made the English, Lords ouer France. But, howeouer the high and iust displeasure, which this Prince tooke for the wicked murder of his father, (abundantly satisfied for by this treatie) moued him first to embrace the English amity, hee afterward most subtilly conuerted the revenge (by way of taking amends) to the enlargement of his proper riches, power and amplitude.
After his Ambassadors returned, hee sends backe all contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounceth the alliance of England with a watchword, that every one should looke to himselfe.

(25) Each man hereupon (saith * Serres) sharpens his sword and scourges his Armes, to recouer that by force which they could not obtaine by reason; Serres might better haue said, reasoning. All things certainly fauoured the French designs; for this was the generall estate of the English affaires.
King Henry leaues out of his Child-hood; and when he came to mans age, not Man enough to manage so turbulent occurrents; the Princes of the blood weakly vnited in loue, for the common good; the Protector vigilant ouer England, the Regent carefull for France, but both priuately enuid; Richard Duke of Yorke (whose strengths daily increased, which in time he meant nothing lesse then to vse for the benefit of King Henry, ambitiously referuing himselfe for a deare day; most of the great warriors slaine; and in briefe a great inability (for want of a Soule, willing and fit to looke so sterne and dismal adventures in the face) through the whole body of the English forces; which though otherwise they might haue lingred out the warre, and kept their footing, yet the death of the great Duke of Bedford Regent of France doubled the difficulty, or rather the impossibility. In taking this triumphant Peere away, God made it manifest, that he held the English vnworthy and vnfit to continue their Empire among the French any longer. This Prince not long after this reuolt of Duke Philip, died at Paris, vncertaine to some, whether through griefe of the euils he foresaw, or other malady. But the Analogy and colour of his whole former life, doth contradict their conceit, who thinke that such a grief should determine his daies, because it could not but proceed from a kind of offeare and despaire, an humor absolutely opposit to Magnanimitie, wherein hee abounded. How mighty a Prince he was this his * style sheweth: Regent of France; Duke of Bedford, Alanson, and Aniou, Earle of Maine, Richmond, and Kendale; and Constable of England. But (which excelleth his greatnes) he was one of the best Patriots and Generals, that euer blossomed out of the roiall Kojlar of England. His valour was not more terrible to the enemy, then his memory honorable. For (doubtfull whether with more glorie to him, then to the speaker) * Lewis the eleuenth being afterwards counsell'd by certaine en-uious persons to demolish and deface his stately Tombe, (withrein with him, * saith one, was buried all the Englishmen: good fortune in France) which was erected ouer his body in the Northside of the high Altar, in our Ladies Church at Roan, vsed these indeed most Princely words.

(26) What honor shall it be to vs, or you, to breake this Monument, and to pull out of the ground the bones of him dead, whom in his life-time, neither my father, nor your Progenitors with all their puissance, were once able to make like one foot backward? who by his strength, pollicie, and wit kept them all out of the principall dominions of the Realme of France, and out of this noble Dutchy of Normandy? wherefore I say first, God saue his soule; and let his body now lie in rest: which when he was alive, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all: And as for the tombe, I assure you, it is not so worthy, or commendable as his honor and acts deserved.

(27) The Regent being now dead, the late peace made at Arras betweene King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgundie, presently disclosed, and put forth effects most dangerous to the English; for many Townes voluntarily yeeld, and multitudes of the French (who hitherto through feare contained themselves) starting away, all the English dominions were full of priuate conuenticles, practises, and correspondences with the Enemy. Such English as then were in France, are not altogether sloathfull, but yet, through a fatall either security or negligence at home, there was not speedy sufficiencies of resistance ministred.

(28) Richard Duke of Yorke, (whose seruices neuer did good to the English common-wealth) is created Regent of France, and Edmund Duke of Sommer-set his perpetuall riuall, or perhaps an intelligent censor of his manners) continues his commands in Normandie. The Duke of Somerset* opposed the ad-uancement of Yorke to that slipperie dignity. He was no babe in so doing, but more fore-seeing then the Protector, and all the Councell of England. Yet his opposition was vselesse, and fruitlesse, for the others carriage had woonne such a party about the King, (whom he meant by embracing to pull down) that notwithstanding the disadvantage of his silenced title, which was alone a great cause to haue made him euertlingly incapable of so great trust and meanes, he prevailed. But before he could arriue, Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was Gounour there for the English, who had with him but about two thousand, the faith of the Citizens was presumed vpon to make vp the rest at a pinch, for a common resistance. On the contrary, they perceiuing vpon what termes the English affaires stood in France, chiefly after the late Regents death, conspire against them. The treason was carried so cunningly by some of the principall Magistrates of the Towne, who capitulated for a generall pardon from King Charles (which was gladly yeelded vnto,) that the mischief sooner tooke effect, then it could be discouered. Thomas Lord Beaumont began the losse with his misfortune; for Arthur Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, hauing about Paris, in hope to recouer the same, the Lord Beaumont with certain hundredth of English, fell into his danger about Saint Denis, and were distressed. While as yet the terror of this discomfiture (not great in regard of the numbers slaine, but in regard of the Circumstances) was fresh, the French aduance their Banners vpon the City, where a gate was opened vnto them by their partizans. What should the English doe in this generall mischief? The townsmen, lately vassals, turne enemies on a sodaine; women and children assaile the English from their windowes with all sorts of mis-fill things. Many are beaten downe and massacred in the streetes. The Lord Willoughby Gouernour of Paris, Lewis of Luxemburg Bishop of Therouan, Chan-cellour of France for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux and Meaux, with other, flie to * S. Antonies gate and the Bastile, places which they had reserved for defence till extreme necessity. Many more had been sued in those places, but that the perfidious Citizens drew chaines thwart the streetes, and empached their retreat. Heare the rest in a * Francmans words,

(29) All runne to the Bastile. The Tournels are presently fixt, and all approaches into the Bastile are somewhat widd. Such as were within it, at first made some shew of defence, but all things were prepared to force them: they demand a Parle, and agree to depart with their liues and baggage. They are conducted about the Towne beneath the Loure, to embark vpon the Riuier of Seine, and so passe to Roan. They could not well haue passed through the City. The people hereof aduertised runne to the walls, and cry out with great routes, * baisting the English like Dogs, whom a little before they had feared, and honoured as their masters. Who of the English reads these things without indignation? But they are the perpetuall manners of the base multitude, & the fortune therein of the English, the same which fol-loweth all like accidents. Some will thinke that the Lord Willoughby, and his people might haue done more nobly, to haue taken vp their graues in the place which they pretended to make good against the French. Fortitude is neuer separated from Prudence. Succour was despaired. The Duke of Yorke was not as yet arriued, and in maintaining their strengthes against the whole City of Paris, and all the present French forces for the space of about ten dayes, they sufficiently cleared themselves both in point of honour and loyalty. Paris * is thus lost in the worst time for an Army to march in. They did wisely to chooseth vnseasonable a season, their market might haue else bene marred; for the new Regent (not so much hindered from sooner coming by the Duke of Somerset's emulations, which some affirm, as by the very quality of the winter weather) arriued afterward, accompanied with the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, the Lord Falconsbridge, and other worthy persons, with an Army of eight thousand men. But this Regent did neuer good in France: Hee who so writes, might haue also safely added, nor elsewhere. The English affaires were not as yet come to the very breake-neck point. They held; (in the late conquered parts of France) Normandy entire, though not without much troubles, for the people againe rebell in Cause: but that mischief was destroied with the greater and more mercilesse confusion of the Authors and Actors, then the former. About fise thousand of them were trampled to death by the iust fury of the English, vnder the leading of the Lord Scalles, the Lord Hoo and others. They burnt all their dwellings, made booty of their goods, draue their whole numbers out of the Country. The Lord Scalles not long after discomfited La Hire, and his Companie not farre from Roan. The war was handled on all sides without full or complete armies.

Skirmishes were the ordinarie formes of fighting.
The French were schooled from feeling their rest vpon a pitch field. Thus houered the affaires.

(30) Philip Duke of Burgoyne had as yet in person given no proof against the English of his affection to King Charles. Now hee addresseth himselfe to an enterprife worthy of that expectation, the recovery of Calais. You would suspect that hee continued still a friend to the English, in making choice of a seruice, wherein hee was most likely to waste his time in vaine, and yet make shew of much forwardnesse; but hee was really, though the rather stirred therunto by the desire of priuate reuenge. The English, vpon his forsaking their alliance, had attempted to kinde the Gaunt, and other of the Flemish townes (Subjects to the Duke) to rise in rebellion: but the opinion that K. Henries fortunes in France were desperately slooping, made their wits too dank to take fire. The notice notwithstanding of this attempt came to the Duke, which sharpened him to revenge, whereof (as the former passages abundantly declare) hee was not ordinarily thrifty. He brings his Armie before Calais. Chiefe commanders there for King Henry were the L. Dudley who had charge of the Castell, and Sir John Ratcliffe of the Towne.
The Dukes purpose was to haue cloyed the harbour by sinking shippes laden with stones, and such like choaking materials; but vpon the ebbe-water the Calisians deliuered the haue from that perill.
The King of England aduertised that his precious Fort and Towne of Calais were thus emperilled, Humphrey Duke of Gloucester the Protector comes in person with a very great Fleet (some write fise hundredth saile) to the rescue, and in a great puisance, with full purpose to giue battell, glad perhaps that hee might now reuenge old grudges. It is able to moue choler, to consider how Writers torture vs with the diuersities of reports; but the generall agreement is, that the Duke of Burgundy did raile his siege before hee was fought with. Some* say the very rumor of the Protector's approach draue him away, and that the Protector came the next day after the Burgundians flight. Others excuse him (probably enough) in saying that the Flemings grew vnweildie to his commandements, and yet not needes home.

(31) The Protector was master of the Dukes Camp, and spent eleuen dayes in his Dominions, burning Peppering and Bell, and greatly dammified him about * Gravelin and Bolognois, then let him see the state of Calis, and * returns with great honour to his charge into England. But the English were thought to haue created store of worke for this busie Duke at home; where many great tumults rose, in * one of which, his owne person was endangered at Bruges, Lisle, Adam the Captaine of his guard being there presently slaine. Hence it came perhaps that a meane * was found by contracts made with Isabel the Dutchesse his third wife (a most witty woman a Portu-gesse) to hold a league with England, and yet no breach with France.

(32) These haue hitherto bene the actions of Men, let vs not neglect two great Ladies, because much concerning our historie depend on their cou-sels. Queene Katherine, the widow of King Henrie the fifth, and mother by him of this sixth Henrie, about this time departed out of the world. This most noble Lady, when her husband the King was dead, being not of iudgement (by reason of her tender yeeres to vnderstand what became her greatnes, or hauing found perhaps that greatnes was no part of happinesse,) secretly marieth one Owen ap The-dore or Teder, the most noble and most goodlie gentleman of all the Welsh nation, and ended with * admirable vertues, who drew his descent from holie Cadwalader, last King of the Brittaines. This husband had by her sundry children, two of which, Edmund and Gasper doe beare a part in the royall history, and King Henry the sixth (their halfe brother) created the first of them Earle of Richmond, the other of Pembroke. This Edmund is he, who by Margaret the daughter of Iohn Duke of Somerset, (grandchild to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster) had Henry the 7. the most famous and prudent King of England.

(33) In that year in which this excellent Queen died, the young Dutchesse Dowager of Bedford (widow to the late Regent of France) married also (below her degree) a vigorous English Knight, one * Sir Richard Woodville, of which match yet Serres needed not to haue spoken so contemptibly, calling him an English aduenturer, of small account; the thereby (saith he) giuing cause to laugh at her: which centure taketh perhaps of the French leuen and pre-iudice, because the Lady was sister to the Earle of S.
Paul, who would not make one in the peace of Arras, but held with the English.

(34) But let vs see the sequell. Out of this Ma-rimony also sprang Queene's; for her husband (afterward made Earle of Rivers) had sundry children by her, whereof Elizabeth being one, had the honour to marry Edward the fourth King of England, and hereby was both herselfe a Queene and a Pro-genitresse of those glorious Kinges and Queenes which followed: for from her and this match sprang another Elizabeth, the renowned wife of King Henry James the first King of Scots made with France, who gaue his daughter the Lady Margaret, to Lewis the gainst the English: hee meant also to haue attempt-wickedly murdered by certaine bloody Traitors in Perth, (suborned thereunto by Walter Earle of Athol, (his owne neere kinsman) in hope to attaine the Crowne; crowned indeed he was, but not (as his Withes & Sorcerers had ambiguously insinuated) with the Crowne of that Realm, but with a Crown of red-hot yron, which was clapt vpon his head, being one of the tortures wherewith he ended at once his wicked dayes and desires.

(35) Let vs now cast our eye to the doings of our new Regent the Duke of York, that we may be witness 3, how farre by his endeaours, the affaires of King Henry were advanced in France. The silence at this time is euerie where very great, yet had he opportunitie to haue atchieued somewhat. Two thousand French horsemen were mutined, and routed vp and downe in great disorder. Paris was fearefully punished with famine, and the attendants of famine, pestilentiall maladies. The Countries about lay open: the Courtiers were discontented and diuided: Nothing is yet done by our Regent, which some impute to *Edmund Duke of Somerset*s opposition, who out of enuy and disdain hindred his dispatch. Wee must in the meane time find out them that did somewhat. The Duke of Somerset himselfe accompanied with the Lords Talbot and Fauconbridge, with other Gallants, and a competent force of the English, besiege Harlew, which the Normans in the late rebellion tooke from them, and still maintained against them vnder French Captaines: King Charles sends some of his principall Commanders with foure thousand men to relieue the Towne; who did their best, but not able to effect any thing, Harlew was rendered to the Duke.

(36) In November Richard Earle of Warwicke came as Regent into France, being surrogated in that office to the Duke of York, who returned into England. Hee carried with him a thousand fresh Souldiers, and arrived at Harlew, from whence he repaired to Roan, the chiefe seat (Paris being now lost) of the English Dominions in North France; as Burdeaux was in the South; whether now the Earle of Huntingdon, with certaine troupes and companies of Souldiers, was sent as Seneschall. This new Regent busied himselfe in the generall affaires of his place. Vnder him the Duke of *Burgoyne*s forces were driuen from Craoy. Abbeile freed from the danger of a Bastile, with which the Duke had pent that Towne in; and the English for twentie dayes space together tooke their pleasure in spoiling the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. These and some other actions hauing bene worthily carried during this Regents gouernment, himselfe dyeth. The Duke of York againe succedes him. Our interest in France was retained, not so much by King Henries ministers and Armies, as by remissenesse of King Charles, whom also Lewis the Dauphin (afterward King) did greatly trouble by rebellious decessions, and absentments of himselfe. The feare of the English reconciled the sonne to the father the sooner. K. Charles was now fallen into dislike with his people, but to redeeme his credit, hee attempts the recouery of Pontoise (a towne neere to Paris) which the Lord Clifford had not long before surprisid by stratageme and money (an ordinary meanes as then for the expugnation of places) and comes in person to the enterprize. There attended vpon him for that seruice about ten or twelue thousand men. The L. Clifford is within, and makes a braue defence.

(37) The Duke of York lately landed in Normandie, as Regent, assembl'd his maine strengthes, being about seuen or eight thousand, offers the French King battell. Hee keeps himselfe within his trenches. The Duke (according to the ancient humor, and discipline of the English, who loue to set all vpon a push) desirous to fight, vnexpectedly passeth the riuier of Oyse, which ranne betwene the two Campes. King Charles dislodged so fearefully, that the French doe not ouer boldly excuse him of flying. The Duke hauing had the spoile of the French

Kings Campe, re-fortifies Pontoise, and assaults a Bastile, where Charles had left three thousand Souldiers to maintain the face of a siege. It was held better to pursue the King, who was gotten to Poisse. There the Duke of York againe very nobly prouokes him to a field. It would not be; King Charles saw the hazards were not equal, and therefore endures his brauado. What could the Duke doe more? hee is of necessity to returne to the maine of his charge in Normandie, and doth so. King Charles ran into such obloquie and contempt with his people by this dishonourable retreat, but chiefly with the Parisians; that hee had not attempted againe and preuailed against Pontoise, it might haue ieopardied his whole estate; for there was a faction which would haue made vie of his disgrace. Hee returns in great fury to the siege, and finally enters the town, not without much bloodshed. Serues faith, that fise hundred English left their dead bodies at the breach. The King was one of the first that entred, choosing rather to be thought temerarious then timorous. This exploit established his opinion among the people. A faction of warre filled both sides, and the estate of England vnder King Henry, whose softnesse and lenitie gaue way to sundry dangerous Court-factions, needed quiet Commissioners meet at Calais; nothing is concluded but the enlargement of Charles Duke of Orleans for the summe of three hundred thousand Crownes. Hee had bene Prisoner in England about twentie and fixe yeeres, euer since the Battell of Agincourt, where hee was taken. The Duke of Burgundie was a speciall Actor in his enlargement, with a purpose to secure his owne greatness by benefices: this high borne Prince for the murder of his father, being naturally the head and chiefe of that deadly fewde, which had most mortally raged betwene the houses of Burgundie and Orleans. Humphrey Duke of Gloucester prudently foreseeing the dangers like to ensue on Orleans his enlargement, stoutly opposed himselfe thereunto, and that vpon important reasons which hee required to haue registred, that they might remaine on Record for a testimony and discharge of his duty in that behalfe.

1. First, for that the French King wanted discretion and iudgement to order his affaires, which defects might bee supplied by the Duke, (being a man of experience and very subtile) if hee should bee set at liberty.

2. That the said Duke might procure a vnion of the factions (now hotely maintained in France among the Nobility) to the preiudice of the Crowne of England, and hazard of the losse of the Kings territories in France.

3. That the Dutchie of Normandie (hauing sustained a great charge in maintaining the warre) seeing the Duke of Orleans deliuered, and no royall Army on the English part to withstand the common enemy, was likely inough to reuolt.

4. That if the Duke should be deliuered, it might be probably coniectured, that he would sooner break his oath, which he should (being prisoner) make to the King of England, then the oath of his allegiance to the French King his Soueraigne Lord, of whom he holdeth his lands and dignity.

5. If the Articles concluded betwene his Maiesty and the French on the Dukes behalfe, should not be performed, what remedy might his Maiesty haue or expect?

6. That considering his cosen of Huntingdon was to leaue the Dutchie of Guyenne, and for that the alliance betwixt the said Duke, and the Earles of Arminack and Foix, and the Lord of la Brete, was to bee suspected as dangerous, it was very necessary that good prouision should be made for defence of that Country, being his Maiesties ancient inheritance.

7. That his Maiesty hath no alliance with any Christian Prince, but onely the King of Portugall; being but of tender yeeres and farr off: And therefore it was not safe for his Maiestie to deliuer him, that was likely to proue his Capitall enemy, and to seeke meanes to depriue him of those lands which his noble father had left him.

8. That if any of his Maiesties kinned, or other Lords on that side the Sea, should happen to be taken prisoners, the said Duke of Orleans might ransom 4. or 5. of them.

9. That it were fit to take aduise of the Lords, and other his Maiesties subiects in the Realme of France, and dutchy of Normandie, whether they thought it expedient that the said Duke should be deliuered or not. Otherwise the world might crie shame thereon, when men should call to minde the losse of his brethren of Clarence, and Bedford, and other noble Personages, in defending and keeping those Lands.

10. If he (the said Duke of Gloucester) should consent to the said Dukes deliuerance (the same being also quite contrary to the last will of his Maiesties Father) such inconueniences, as would ensue thereupon, should be imputed to him.

(38) Notwithstanding the weight of so many thousand Crownes ouer-weighed all these important and ponderous reasons; and the warre eates on still in the body of France, but not with so sharpe teeth, nor so full engorgement as before. Townes and people are taken on both sides. The Countie of Amiens was spoiled by the English Lords, Willoughby and Talbot; The Regent and the Duke of Somerset, march into Angion, where they charged their carriages with much spoile and returned. Then the Duke of Somerset seizes himselfe, and doth sundry exploits in and about Britaine. Deep in Normandie being besieged, was rescued by the Dolphin of France to our losse. The contemplation of these mutual violences touched all Christendome: for the Turke, common enemy thereof, encreased. Ambassadors are sent from all parts, to determine these bloody differences. William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, was chiefe for the English. A truce was hereupon taken for eighteen months, between King Henry and King Charles, and an hope of perpetuall amity, weakly grounded vpon a match, which the Earle of Suffolke contracted for King Henry, with Margaret the daughter of Renate, titulary King of Sicilie, Naples, and Ierusalem, Duke of Angion and Lorrain, Prince of the blood. To effect this, the Earle couenanted that the English should abandon the possession of Angion, and Main to her father. A strange purchase of a wife, who though shee brought youth, beauty and hope of a perpetuall peace with France, (the more profitable opportunity whereof, the English had more brauely then happily neglected) yet was shee otherwise without portion. The Earle notwithstanding (whose drift herein could not be without manifest ambition, to make himselfe one of the greatest of England, by this gratification of the French, with his Masters charge and dishonour) is not abashed to expect publike thanks for this high seruice, and an whole fiftene for the charge of her transportation. Sundry Lords of Councell and the King himselfe thought him worthy, and according to his deuse and ouerture, the whole affaire was carried. Suffolke made Marquise is sent ouer with many honorable persons, both men and women, to conduct the faire and goodly (but most vnfortunate and fatal) Bride into England. * Polydore giues vs no vnfitting Character of this Lady. Shee was prouident enough, very desirous of glory, abounding in discourse, counsell, gracious behauiour, and manly courage; but not free from womens humour, which (saith he) is usually vehement and apt to change. In England ye may easily suppose, that shee was most royally entertained; Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, among others, meeting her with a traine of five hundred horsemen in a livery, that worthy Poet John Lydgate Monke of Burie, deuising the speeches for such gratulatory triumphs as were made at her entrance into London. The King being married lawfully-enioyes her embracements, from which hee was often afterward violently separated by the miseries of a most cruell warre, wherein shee had her piteous portion. Suffolke in the meane time hauing the most assured fauour of the Queen pursues his ambitious purposes. Shee in the meane time was solemnly Crowned Queene of England at Westminster vpon the * thirtieth of May.

(39) Would to God it stood now with the quality of this argument, to turne our eyes from the view of those actions which ensued; for here the mournfull tragedies of our poore Country began. But we cannot but open those olde and most execrable fores, that, in their example, all true English blood may the rather be tender ouer their bowels, beholding such effects as the diuell and all the furies of hell were (by Gods seuerie permission) Actors in. Fabian giues vs the causes and contents of those effects, in these graue and few words.

(40) "It appeareth that God was not pleased with that marriage: For after this day, the fortune of the world began to fall from the King, so that he lost his friends in England, and his reuenues in France: For shortly after, all was ruled by the Queene and her Councell, to the great disprize of the King and his Realme, and to the great mauer (it is Fabians word) and obloquie of the Queene, who (as since hath bene well proued) had many a wrong, and false report made of her: All which miserie fell for BREAKING OF THE PROMISE, made by the King vnto the Earle of Armenacks daughter, as most writers agree: Which misery in this Story (shall some-deale appear by the losing of Normandie, (as all things elie, except Calais, which the English held in France) the diuision of the Lords within this Realme; the rebellion of the communitie against their Prince and Soueraigne; and finally the King deposed, and the Queene with the Princeaine to flee the land, and lost the rule thereof for euer. Thus hee: but all this farr short of the evils that were the brood and offspring of the following times. The Parliament in the meane time grants aides of money, that vpon expiration of the truce there might bee present abilities to maintain warre. The Duke of York is reuoked, and the Duke of Somerset (in an euill houre) is sent in his place, with such prouisions as were reputed competent.

(41) Humphrey the renowned Duke of Gloucester, Lord Protector, felt the first stroke of the euill Angell, which was sent to punish England, and to roote out her Nobles. This Duke was much hated of the Queene, and her faction, as the onely man who by his prudence, as also by the honor and authoritie of his birth and place, seemed to empach that soueraigne command, which they pretended to settle in the Kings owne person, but meant indeed (as the manner is vnder soft Princes) to reigne themselves in anothers name. Many great Lords were drawne on (at the time of a Parliament then * holden at Saint Edmunds Bury,) to concurre for his ruine, not perceiving, that thereby they pluckt vp the floodgate, at which the Duke of York entered, ouerwhelming all of them in a deluge of blood. Whether they had any true or iust feare of Gloucester himselfe, least perhaps he should take reuenge vpon some particular persons among them, is doubtful, though it be probable enough, that they had. Heare some things that forewent this Parliament. About five or six yeeres before, * the Dutchesse of Gloucester Eleanor, was conuicted for witchcraft and sorcery, and afterward endited of treason in the Guild-Hall in London, before the Earles of Huntingdon, Stafford, Suffolke, and Northumberland, and certaine Lords, as Fanhope, and Hungerford, with others, and Iudges of both benches; of which crimes shee was appealed by one Bolingbrook an Astronomer, and Thomas Southwella Chanoyn, which Southwell was charged to haue said Masses ouer certaine instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Necromancy against the life of the King. These being taken, accused her as accessorie ric, hee having desired the helpe of their Art, to know what would befall her. Some part hereof shee confessed, for which shee was put to publike and solemne penance in London vpon three seuerall daies, with wonderfull shame to her person, and after this was committed to perpetual prison vnder the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the Castle of Chester, but from thence removed to Kenelworth. Her pride, falsehood, auarice, and lechery were causes of her confusion, faith Stow; who hath set forth that businesse very diligently, though not seeming to attribute much credit to that accusation of treason. The Duke of Gloucester her vnhappy Lord and husband (whom shee by loue-cups and enchantments was laid to haue enuigiled, vjing therein one Margerie Gurdmain a witch of Ey in Suffolke, who was burnt in Smithfield) stung with this reproach, might reasonably be thought not vnwilling to doe somewhat. Howsoever that was, his destruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at Burie, was arrested of high treason by John Lord Beaumont high Constable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Sommerfet with others. Certaine of the Kings household were appointed to guard him. Not long after he was found dead. His body was shewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had died of a palfrey or an apoplemie. Of thirty and two of his seruants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlaine Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Turley, Esquires, and Richard Nedham Gentleman, were condemned of high treason, and had this vncxampled punishment. They were drawne from the Tower to Tiburn, hanged, let down quick, stript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a Charter of pardon shewed for their liues of the Marquesse of Suffolke. But the yeoman *of the Crowne had their liuelihood, the executioner their cloathes. Their pardons were thus obtained by the earnest diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a famous preacher, parson of S. Andrewes in Holborne. Thomas wilde Esquire, the Dukes seruants also, being condemned and pardoned among other, had for a preamble in his letters patents words importing, * that hee had bene one among many other traitours against the King, with Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, who went about, and practised to deliuer Eleanor, late wife to the Duke, from out of prison, for which purpose he had gathered a great power, and number of men, to come to the Parliament at Berie, there to haue contriued the Kings destruction.

(42) Such was the end of this great Prince, who, notwithstanding this open shewing of his body, and these pretended crimes, was by the people of England thought to be double murdered, by detraction, and deadly practise. He was not only a true louer of learned men, but himselfe also *learned, and (faith our Author) a father of his Country. His maine opinion concerning the government of King Henries French dominions, was as mainly opposed by the Cardinal of Winchester and others, who altogether periwaded Peace, to which the noble Duke (standing precisely vpon the honor and Maiesty of the English name,) was * an absolute enemy. From this troubled fountaine of diuided Councell many following blacke adventures did flow. The Duke thus brought to his end, goodmen (faith Polydore) fearful of their owne safeties, did of their owne accord forsake the Court, into whose rooms many succeeded, who for the more part looking how to rise in dignity made open an easie way for new factions. The Cardinal of Winchester (the other halfe-arch of the Kingdome) ouerlaid not the Duke about fiftene or sixtene daies. The whole frame of government was thus drawne to repose it selfe vpon the Queene, and such fauourites, as the King by her commendation the rather liked.

(43) The Marquesse * of Suffolke, prime man in grace, was created Duke, which made him a more conspicuous marke of enuie, then that any shadow of the King or Queene could shelter or protect. After the Cardinals death, the affaires in France (where Sommerfet was now Regent) were neither duellie looked vnto, nor the governours of the Countrey well admird. But the King and Realme of England lay, much more then France, open to the inevitable, deepe, and pernicious conspiracies of Richard Duke of Yorke. Hee (by the error of King Henry, and the euill starres of our Countrey) being of himselfe a great Prince, and growne stronger by affected popularitie, perceiving the King to be a Ruler, and not to Rule, began secretly to allure his friends of the Nobilitie, and priuily declared to them his title to the Crowne, as likewise he did to certaine Governours of Cities and townes, which attempt was so polittickly and closely carried, that his prouision was readie, before his purpose was opened. The very state of things invited this fatall conspiracie: a milder King then England was worthy of; a Councell out of fauour with the people; manifold losses and dishonours abroad; a turbulent and iealous condition of things at home. Of all which and much more, the Duke of Yorke, hauing King Henrie the fourth (the enemy of his house) for a perillous example, made his pretious vfe, cherishing the popular auersions, without seeking to redresse any euils, but representing them worse then they were, thereby to ripen that breach of loialty in the hearts of men, which his ambition wrought vpon. His displacement from the Regency of France, did not a little (perhaps) offend him at first, because the Duke of Sommerfet got it ouer his head; but it will not be long, before Sommerfets euill carriage of that trust, and the declining fortune of England, will giue him occasion to reioice at the foile of his dreaded enemy. Let vs nor be long in the rehearsal of the publike shame and damage of our nation.

(44) During the truce betweene England and France, one Sir Francis Surienan Arragonois (Knight * of the Garter) seruing vnder the Regent, vniawfullie surprized Fougere, a towne of Britaine vpon the confines of Normandy. Restitution is demanded. The Duke of Sommerfet (a proud man (faith Serres) who thinking to doe better then the rest, did absolutely ruine the English affaires) contrary to good discipline, cherishing his souldiers in their riots and disorders, neglected the iustice of nations in that point. The French make this their example, and surprize Port de Arch, and towne after towne, so many and so fast, that King Charles (who, that he might haue God on his side, and wrong on his enemies, contained himselfe with great modesty, till * he saw all quiet restitution desperate,) recouered Roan, Caen and all Normandie within a short space after.

(45) Thus Sommerfet, and the English, are compelled to quit Normandy, not only inglorious, but also in England it selfe vncommiserated. The next maine parcell of the English inheritance, beyond our Ocean, was Gascoigne. King Charles and his people desirous (against plaine right) to make all that theirs, whatsoever was comprehended within the French language, inuaded that Dutchie also, and within verie * few yeeres after (the fortune of warre, and disloyalty of the people eury where fauouring them) extorted the same out of the English-mens possession, after it had continued theirs about two hundred fourescore and nine yeeres, to the immortal dishonour and damage of our nation. The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, who thirsted for the Crowne of England, hath occasion ministred to impe more feasters into his aspiring wings. Ireland is in tumult. Thither the Duke passeth, and not only appeareth the disorder of that Nation, but * was much fauoured among them, as could neuer be separated from him, and his lineage. Thus diligently the Pioner makes his mines into the quiet and felicity of his Countrey, calling his cause the quarrell of right and iustice, as pretending that the Crowne of England appertained to his name and familie.

(46) But the odor of this vile successe in France, comming into England, filled mens hearts and senses with great perturbation. The Queene and Suffolke suffer obloquie for these effects in the general iudgement. The common wealth is not silent. A Parliament is called to be holden at Westminster, which from thence was assigned to be kept at Leicester. The place lies not; few appeare. It is brought backe to Westminster. There the whole body of publike councill meetes. Many * Articles are exhibited by the lower house against the Duke of Suffolke, wherein hee is charged with euill demeanor, misprision and treason: who thereupon is committed prisoner to the Tower: from thence, within foure or five weeks hee is discharged, which more augmented the general indignation then his commitment had ministred satisfaction. The perillous Duke of Yorke warms himselfe at these blazes, and vnderhand cherishesthem as opportunity wil permit, hauing his cunning factors and instruments fitt for such occasions secretly spread ouer the Realme, to instill the poysons of discontentment, and desire of change into the giddie multitude. When wee reade in our vulgar Chronicles, that about this time Adam Molins Bishoppe of Chichester, Keeper of the Kings Priuy Seale (through the procurement of Richard Duke of Yorke) was by shipmenaine at Portsmouth, and yet no cause of so foule and wicked a murder expressed, it cannot but offend any curious Reader, who would receiue satisfaction rather by the reas of actions then by the euents. His guiltinesse in the fact was so apparant, that K. Henry in his answer made a yeere or two after to the Dukes dissembling, and deceitfull letter, confidently mentioneth the same, where thus hee speaketh. Sooth it is that long time among the people hath bene vpon many strange language, and in speciall anone after your disordinate and vnlawfull laying of the Bishoppe of Chichester, diuers, and many of the vntre shipmen and other, said (in their manner) words against our state, making menace to our owne person by your sayings, that yee should be fetched with many thousand, and yee should take vpon you that which you neither ought, nor as wee doubt not will attempt, &c. What could led the Duke to commit this so impious a deed, may easily now be coniectured, being none other but the common hatred hee bare to all such wise or valiant persons, as might in any sort vphold the most iust and gracious Henry, and this sincerity in the Bishoppe could not be but a grieuous crime in the Dukes ambitious eyes, whose greatnesse was euen then too intollerable; for where was the Kings iustice when such a fact might hope of impunity? The Duke did effect it by his bloody complices as hee did many other most detestable and perfidious things, while hee was absent in Ireland. Thomas Thame notwithstanding calling himselfe blew-beard being a Fuller of Canterbury, and attempting to gather the people, mis-carrieth in his treason, and for that was hanged and quartered: this was a preambule to the following tumults. The Duke of Yorke whole and onely hopes were reposed in the general perturbations of this Country.

(47) The Duke of Suffolke (a principal pillar of K. Henries safety) being let at liberty, attends the King and Queene in their Parliament at Leicester. Behold the humour of the Commons which were sowed with the pestilent leauen of Yorke conspiracy. They cannot endure the sight of this Prince, because his readuancement seems done in despite of them. Calumniation & odious surmises are exhibited against him: hee must downe to make way for K. Henries most vnworthy ruine. The most vile part of this Parliamentary accusation was, that they should charge that for a crime vpon Suffolke which themselves had vniuersally in another former Parliament assented vnto and ratified. Which was the deliquy of Anion and Cain vpon the marriage, concluded (for the good of England, if others had not inuerted or interrupted the successe by their remercy) with Renate, father of Queene Margaret. Neither did the enuie onely of the secret Turkish overlaid this noble Gentleman, but the impotency of the Duke of Somerset's faction, whose rashnesse and vanity hauing lost all Normandy, would gladly find any others shoulder, vpon which to cast the imputation, either in part or whole. In that former Parliament assembled immediately vpon Suffolkes returne from that treaty with Renate out of France, this was the summe of the whole proceedings. Suffolke (as hee was very eloquent) made knowne to both houses, his counsels and seruices, and the effect of his Embassie, praying they might be approued, and enrolled for his discharge. Whereupon * the next morning, Burley Speaker of the lower house, and the body thereof repaired to the Kings presence, then sitting among the Lords, and there * humbly required, that the request of the Marquesse (afterward created Duke of Suffolke) might be granted: and the Lords made the like petition, kneeling on their knees. The King condescended to their desires, and so the whole matter was recorded for his acquittall.

(48) What can bee more euident? or who can enough admire the vanity of popular mutabilitie? The Duke the (principall marke, though the Bishop of Salisbury, the Lord Say, and others were also accused) vnable to stand the push of so general an opposition, must be banished. The King vnwillingly giues this sentence against the Duke, or rather against his owne life and safety: five yeeres are limited to his exile. Being vpon the sea, hee is taken by his enemies, who at Deuon read stroke off his head vpon the side of a Cocke-boat. This diuine murder (for it was none other, the Kings authority being not vfed therein) committed vpon so great a Prince, was the lesse pittied, for that hee was noised among the people to haue bene a priuy actor in the Noble Duke of Gloucesters death, who perished (faith a * learned Author) by the fraud and practise of a woman (belike) Queene Margaret. The Bishop of Salisbury before said more impiously, and irregularly lost his life in the following tumults, being murdered (after he had finished diuine seruice) by his owne Tenants, who dragged him from the Altar to an hill-top, and there (while hee was making his last prayers) cleft his sacred head: The Lord Say Treasurer of England fell likewise into the peoples fury, and had his head cut off by the commandment of that execrable rebell Iacke Cade, at the Standard in Cheape, as yee shall hereafter learne.

(49) This William Duke of Suffolke * was indeed a great and worthy person, for when his Father and three Brothers had valiantly powred forth their liues for their Country in the warre of France, hee serued in them sence and thirty yeeres, in (queneene of the which hee neuer returned home, hee was once taken prisoner, being then but a Knight, and paid for his ransom twenty thousand pounds sterling, hee was fiftene yeeres priuy Councellor, and thirty yeeres Knight of the Garter. Notwithstanding all which, the same Author truly addeth: That as for these causes hee was in highest grace with the King, so hee was the more disgraced or hated of the people, and for * certaine very light matters, and those not very apparant, hee was driven into banishment, and (as you haue already heard) was intercepted vpon the sea in his passage to France, and by his aduocaries killed. What honest heart doth not melt at the relation of these violent contempts of all religion, honour, reason and iustice? yet are they but the drops which doe forego those many bloody shewes, which the cloud of Yorke's faction raine vpon our miserable Nation. They who murdered this great triumphant Gentleman, were certaine persons who wasted vpon the Seas in a Barke called the Nicholas of the Tower, which belonged to John * Holland Duke of Excester, Constable of the Tower of London, whom Gods reuenging hand shall not leaue vnpunished.

(50) The Turkish hauing thus rid Suffolke out of the way, thought it now a fitt season to spring their practise. Hereupon the Commons of Kent (who haue feldome refrained in such turbulent times) while the Duke of York was as yet in Ireland, take Armes. One Iacke Cade is their Capitaine: hee had bene the seruant of a Suffex Knight, Sir Thomas Dagre; kils a woman with Child; abshireth the land; turns French; swearing seruice to them, and now returning, is the instrument to hang out Mortimer's name, like a flagge to draw a party, faining himselfe to be a Cousin to the Duke of York. A pestilent deuise, to found the affections of the multitude, and to proclaime the Title to the Crown, which the Duke (as heire of that family) afterward challenged, for who would not aske, what should moue him to vse the name of Mortimer? This Cade whom some (by contraries) call John Amend-all (that is, John Marre-all) hauing drawn great numbers to follow him, encampes at Blacke-Heath by Greenewich, and in his writings calls himselfe the Capitaine of Kent. His pretences (as of all like disloyal actions) were the common good and such other. The King at the report of these stirres is stirred. The Capitaine of Kent demands.

1 That Richard Duke of Yorke be called out of Ireland, and (with certaine others named for sales and colour) be principally used in Council.

2 That as the Duke of Gloucester was falsely proclaimed a Traitor, so the Authors of his death might be punished.

4 (For the third Article contained no demand, but only scandalous matter to aggravate hatred against the dead Duke of Suffolke, and his liuing adherents:) That all the extortions (so the Rebels phrased it) daily used among the common people, might be laid downe: that is to say, the greene waxe, which is falsly used to the perpetuall destruction of the Kings true Commons of Kent. Also the Kings Bench, which is too greivous to the Shire of Kent, without prouision of our Soueraigne Lord, and his true Councell. And also in taking wheat and other graines, beefe, mutton, and all other victuall, the which is importable to the said Commons, without the briefe prouision of our said Soueraigne Lord, and his true Councell, they may no longer beare it. And also vnto the Statute of Laborers, and the great extortions, the which is to say, the false Traitors, Sleg, Cromere, Uley, and Robert East.

(5) Thus traitorously to the Kings welfare, and scandalously to his most gentle government, writes this arrogant Capitaine of Rebels. The King vpon view of these braues, begins to feeble the indignity and danger. An Armie is raised, Cade retires to Senenoke in Kent. The King supposing hee had fled, sends after him * Sir Humfrey Stafford Knight, and other Gentlemen with some forces. Wee reade none of these things without a suspition, that the King was alwayes betrayed by such hypocrites about him, as would not haue him prosper. Marke the euent. At Senenoke Cade abides, probably not without encouragement from secret Traitors, and after long fight slew Sir Humfrey with many others. Hee armed himselfe in the dead Knights habillements with guile spurs. The King and Queene hearing of this mishap, leaue the Tower of London to the custodie of the Lord Scales, and of that renowned Esquire Matthew Gough; and London it selfe to the Lord Maiors fidelity, themselves departing to Kenilworth. The headlong crewes of London fauour the Rebel, and giue entrance. Robert Horne Alderman, like an honest free man, would haue had them resisted. This free necessary speech endangered his life; honourable in his memory for the hazard onely, what should hee haue bene if hee had gloriouslie lost it? but money buyes out his perill with the Tyrant, who fined him at * five hundred Markes. The time was very slippery and loose; for the Essex men also were encamped vpon Mile-end by London: All men are afraid of their owne estates; such secret well-wishings attended vpon the Arch-Rebels pretences. The King before, hee had left London was enforced (by such hollow friends as were about him) to commit the Lord Say Treasurer of England to the Tower, after that the valiant and loyal Sir Humfrey Stafford was slaine, and the newes of his vnlucky defeat were confirmed.

(52) Cade therefore being admitted into London vpon the second of Iuly with his forces, (where for a short while to delude the people with a shew of conscience, they abstained from robberies) strikes with his sword vpon London-stone, saying; Now is Mortimer Lord of this City. At night hee returns into Southwarke: One * Robert Poynings of Southwarke Esquire was his sword-bearer and Caruer. It is needlesse to be particular in this Rebels behaviour: The next day hee returns, and the Lord Say is beheaded in Chespeide (as is before said) at Cades commandement, and his body cut into quarters. The King being by the losse of so trusty and graue a seruant, not a little weakened.

(53) The next tragedie was Cromeres an Esquire, and high Sheriffe of Kent (the Lord Sayes sonne in law) who is drawn out of the Fleet (and to appease the Essex Rebels) sacrificed by beheading without any triall at Mile-End. The City stirres not for all this. Malpas and Gersie, two rich Citizens, at whose houses Cade had feuerallly dined, being spoiled and robbed by him (left perhappes it might appeare, that he who durst commit treasons, had not also the heart to commit felonies) teach what others are to expect. The Maior, Thomas Chalon and the wiser wealthy ones, ouerruled by faction till then, see their danger now, and secretly send to the Lord Scales for aide. Matthew Gough at night is come among them as sent by him. The Kentishmen, hearing their entrie was barred, runne furiously to armes. Cade endeavors to open his way by force; but in despite of all his power, the Citizens made good & defended London-bridge against him, though with the losse of many valiant and honest men, for the conflict endured all night till nine in the morning. Among such as were slaine on the Kings side, were John Sutton Alderman, Matthew Gough himselfe, and Robert Heyland Citizen. This Gough (an Esquire of Wales) was a man of excellent vertue, manhood, and zeale to his Country, and of great renown in the warre of France, where hee had serued with speciall commendations faithfully, for the space of about twenty yeeres. His deserts at this time deserued a Statue in the City, for whose safety hee spent his last blood. To giue a quick end to these miseries, impunity is proclaimed for all offenders, and sent to them in the Kings name by the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Lord Chancellour, vnder the great Seale of England: the rebels are scattered with this assurance of their safeties, and euery man retires in peace from following so pestilent an Impostor. A thousand Markes (when Cade afterward attempted new troubles) are promised to him, who kils or takes this counterfeite Mortimer. Alexander Edm, a Gentleman of Kent, had the happinesse to discouer and kill him at Hothfield in that County: his wretched carcase was brought to London, where his false head was set scintell vpon London-bridge, and his quarters were aduanced for terror in severall parts of Kent. There died also by the stroke of iustice twenty and sixe more, whereof eight were executed at Canterbury, and the rest elsewhere in Kent and Suffex. The multitude it selfe * came naked in their shirts to the King on Blacke-heath, humbly praying mercy which they obtained.

(54) The Kentish rebellion thus pacified, farre greater and farre more dangerous troubles ensued, as it * saith in humane bodies, which relapsing into sicknesses, are (taken so much the more terribly. These troubles had their fontaine and mediate Originall, from Richard Duke of Yorke, no degenerate sonne of that Richard, whom King Henry the fifth had created Earle of Cambridge, and enriched with much wealth, honoring him above others in regard of his blood and and parentage about * no bountie nor benefis could change a treacherous disposition for (as you haue heard before) he conspired to murder his benefactor King Henry the fifth, as the Duke of Yorke (his true progenie) labored to depose this King Henry his aduancer. The humors of the popular body, were, in the last commotion, not obscurely discovered. The Common weale had perhaps some few enormities through the abuse of Magistrates and men in place, but yet such, as the malady was infinitely lesse pernicious then the remedy. Vpon this intelligence the Duke comes suddenly out of Ireland, and to begin his usurped censure and dictature, apprehends * John Sutton Lord Dudley; Reginald Abbot of Saint Peters, at Glasbury, and another, whom he imprisons within his Castle of Ludlow. Intolerable beginnings of more intolerable sequelae. Edmund Duke of Somerset was the man, who (after Suffolks death) most supported the Kings side by * his vigilancie, care, dangers, and good Counsels, endeavouring by all means to cleare the Realme from factions, and to preferre the King and state in quiet.

(55) Yorke seeing this, doth find that Suffolke perished in vaine, if Somerset held like graces against whose person he had a particular pretence of quarrell, for that the City of Caen in Normandy, which was the Duke of Yorkes charge, was rendered vp to the French by him, when the English affaires grew desperate in those parts; Sir David Hall Knight, being at that time Capitaine there for his Lord and Master the Duke of Yorke, and not allowing it, although the renowned Talbot himselfe was present at the render, and became an hostage for performance of the Capitulations. Yorke hereupon consults with his speciall friends, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his son, (who was afterward that most seditious & great fighting Earle of Warwick,) Thomas Courtney Earle of Devonshire, Edmund Brooke Lord Cobham, and others, how Yorke might get the Crowne of England, and for that cause how to ruine or fret out the Duke of Somerset, who standing, they were to looke for strong opposition. In the end, they conclude to take armes, but yet to smother the mention of the Duke of Yorkes title, giuing out to the world for the reason of their doings, that they meant all honour and obedience to King Henry, and only to remoue certaine bad men from about his person, who afflicted the people, and made a pray of the Common-wealth: which, to gaine the more credit, and to blind the good King, the subtle Duke declares by Proclamation; * wherein, thus speaketh that Ambitious Hypocrite. God knoweth from whom no thing is hid, I am, haue bene, and euer will be his true liege man; &c. And to the very purpose it is so, I offer my selfe to sweare that on the blessed Sacrament, and receiue it, the which I hope shall be my saluation, at the day of doome. &c. In that it was the euill hap of the Duke of Somerset, that Normandy was lost during his Regencie, his enemies had the more commoditie to incommode him with the people, who forbore not at his returne to offer to him sundry dishonours and iniuries, till vpon paine of death they were restrained, for breach of which Proclamation, one had his head cut off in west Cheap London.

(56) The King (notwithstanding all his Cosens arts and dissimulations) seeing the hooke through the bait, and the snake through the grasse, by the aduise of his trusty friends, chiefly of Edmund Duke of Somerset, thinks not fit to relie vpon his enemies good nature, but hauing a strong power, and store of honorable men to conduct them, he marcheth toward Wales against the Duke. The King did here in wisely, but not so much as the cause required. Yorke hauing notice of the Kings approach turns aside, and with all speed marcheth toward London. That City, (the vaine hope of all Rebells,) would not harken; Thereupon he slides with his people into Kent, the nest of his hopes, and at Brent-Heath neere Dersford (a towne about twelue miles from London) encampeth, meaning to fight. The King is not slow, but leauing his march toward Wales, pitcheth vp his roiall pavilion vpon Blacke-Heath, with a purpose to reach his cosen of Yorke more duty. Behold the fortune of England. God puts an excellent opportunity into the Kings hands of tearing vp the danger of his house by the rootes, for the Duke was farre inferior in numbers. Such therefore as secretly fauoured him, fearing his overthrow, were willing to aduise a reconciliation. Messengers goe betwene the hosts. The Duke, in his wonted manner, pretends loialtie and particular iniuries; as that the Kings seruants, Sir John Talbot at Holt Castle, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheshire, and others in other places, were set to barken vpon him. That by * two of the Norrices, Bulkeley, Gruff, Bould and other Gentlemen he was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to haue any refreshment, affirming that he (the Duke of Yorke) was against the Kings intent and as a Traitor. The King stoups so much as to answer the letter, letting him to knowe: That the suspition vniuersally conceived of his behaviours moued those effects: neuertheless, in regard of the humble obedience which was now protested, he, for the easing of the Dukes heart, doth declare, repulse and admit him as a true, and faithful subject, and as his well-beloued Cousin. The Duke then aduanceth his practise one step further, and writes to the King, that Iustice might be done vpon all persons of what degree soeuer, which were guilty, or noied to be guilty of treason: aiming at the Duke of Somerset, whom he doubted not to ouerwhelme with sleights and calumnies, as hee and his had done the Duke of Suffolke.

(57) The King is contented (such weak or treacherous counsels herelied vpon) that Somerset (for his satisfaction) should be commanded Prisoner to his owne house, and Yorke (hauing first dislodged his armie) should come in person, and put himselfe into the Kings hand. When hee came, hee exhibits a great complaint against the pride and auarice of the Duke of Somerset, and cunningly accusing none but him, hee seeks the good-will of all others. A cunning drift any, considering that hereby he deriued vp on his enemy all the enuie of the people, and left him single to withstand the effects. Somerset (a Prince of great spirit and wit) not thinking it reasonable, as well in regard of his owne honour as the Commonwealthes interest, to endure such indignity, presents himselfe to the King against his accuser, and refusing not to be render-mouthed in the so apparent perill of the King and Realme, whose quier was vndermined, answers Yorke face to face, and in plaine termes accuseth him of highest treason, as hauing conspired to depose the King, and take vpon himselfe the Soueraignty: vehemently vrging: That the Duke of Yorke might be committed and arraigned, to the intent that by his deferred death, and the dismemberment of his bones, ciuill warre might be extinguished, praying finally that God would not suffer the enemy of the Kingdome to escape the hand of iustice.

(58) This had in likelihood bene done, but that the publike faith seemed to stand engaged for the Dukes indemnitie, hee hauing come in vpon the Kings word, and also for that the hearts of men were not well assured to the King, which by executing Yorke would perhaps haue bene more vnsted, because (not looking into the depth of the Kings perill) it would haue bene thought that hee had bene destroyed to gratifie Somerset, and not to secure the Realme. There was hope likewise to recouer Aquitaine, for that Burdeaux had offered to returne: Lastly, the Dukes sonne and heire, Edward Earle of March (afterward King) was reported to be ready with a great force of Welshmen to succour his father. Vpon these and other reasons, the Duke is no longer restrained, as vpon Somersets most weighty accusations hee had bene, and to assure the gentle and indulgent King, of his allegiance, he makes his submission, and solemnly TAKES HIS OATH to be true, faithful and obedient subject. This was done vpon

The Kings army being greater then the Dukes, peace is vnshapely made.

(59) Let vs view the forme and words of this Caution vpon which King Henric (measuring other mens hearts by his owne) aduentured to repose his life and Kingdome, which are these.

"I Richard, Duke of Yorke, confesse and beknown as thus I am and ought to be humble subiect, and liegeman to you my Soueraigne Lord, King Henric the sixt, and owe therefore, to beare you faith and truth, as to my Soueraigne liege Lord, and shall doe all duties to my loyes: and shall not at any time will or assent that any thing be attempted or done against your most noble person, but wherefoever I shall haue knowledge of any such thing imagined or purposed, I shall with all speed and diligence possible to me, make, that your highnesse shall haue knowledge thereof, and, ouer that, doe all that shall possible be to me to the withstanding, and let thereof to the uttermost of my life: I shall not any thing take vpon me against your roiall estate or obedience that is due thereto, nor suffer any other man to doe as farre forth as shall be in my power solet it. And also I shall come at your commandment, whensoever I shall be called by the same, in humble and obedient wise, but if I be letted by any sickness or impotencie of my person, or by such other cause as shall be thought by you my Soueraigne Lord reasonable. I shall neuer hereafter take vpon me to gather any rowt or to make any assemblie of your people without your commandment, or licence, or in my lawfull defence, in interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defence I shall report me at all times to your highnesse, and if the case require to my Peers, any thing attempt against any of your Subiects, of what estate, degree or condition that they be. But wherefoever I find my selfe wronged and agrieved, I shall sue humbly for remedie to your highnesse, and proceed after the course of your lawes, and none otherwise, sauing in mine owne lawfull defence in manner abovesaid, and otherwise haue to your highnesse as an humble and true subiect ought to haue him to his Soueraigne Lord. All these things abovesaid I promise you truly to obseue and keep by the holy Euangelists contained in the booke that I lay my hand here vpon, and by the holie Crosse I here touch, and by the blessed Sacrament of our Lords body, that I shall now with his merite receiue. And ouer I agree me, and will that if at any time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer shall, any thing attempt by way of feate, or otherwise against your roiall Maiestie and obedience, that I owe thereto, or any thing take vpon me otherwise then is aboue expressed, I from that time forth be vnabled, held, and taken as an vntrue and openly forsworne man, and vnable to all manner of worship, estate or degree, be it such as I now occupie, or any other that might in any wise grow to me hereafter. And this I haue here promised and sworne, proceedeth of mine owne desire and free volente, and by no contraining nor Coaction. In witness of all which things abovesaid, I Richard Duke of Yorke aboue write subscribe with mine owne hand and seale.

This Oath he also tooke at Westminster and Conuentione at sundrie times. Who now can consider the effects of this so publike and solemne Oath, and doth not tremble in curie part? Let vs haisten to their view, least God perhaps may quietly seeme to haue bene mockt to his face by a vaine ambitious man.

(60) To diuert these home-breeding rancors and practises, by employing the wits and bodices of men in other more honest things, the Earle of Candall (sonne to Captaide Budie who had vpon necessitie submitted his Seignouries to Charles the French King, but referred his person out of that obedience) and the Lord L'Esparre, came secretly from Burdeaux and pray an Armie, for that Burdeaux and the Gascoignes would returne to the English, if they might be supported. An Armie is decreed for their reduction. John Lord Talbot the first Earle of Shrewsburie of his name as General in that enterprize, lands in Gascoigne, where he doth sundry exploits, and the fame of his former cheualrie flying before with terror, makes many places the rather to yeeld. Burdeaux her selfe secretly opens a gate vnto him, which the French Garrison perceiving fled out at a Postern, but many being overtaken were slaine by the Lord L'Esparre and the English. New supplies and victuals arrive, whereof the Earle of Shrewsburies younger sonne, (Viscount Lile by his wife,) was a principall conductor. Burdeaux thus thoroughly man and fortified, the Earle is advertised that the French lay at siege before Castillon, a place of importance vpon the riuier of Dordogne. Thither the Earle marcheth, and with too great a confidence charging the enemy vpon vnequall termes, was there slaine, together with his sonne the Viscount Lile and others. Burdeaux receiued such as fled. The English fortunes and hopes which began to quicken, made this vnhappy Calastrophie in Iulie, to the infinite losse of our nation and griefe of the Gascoignes, who generally misliked the French, and inclined to the English, hauing fo honorable, and for so long a time governed those dominions. This was the end of that great Earle, after he had for the space of twentie and foure yeeres serued his Prince and Countrey in the French warres, with highest commendation; a most noble and most valiant man, by whose vertue the English name did chiefly become terrible in France. Burdeaux is seife, and all other places after this, were by siege brought againe vnder the French King, who persecuted those affaires in person. From that time forward the English neuer obtained there any hold or further footing, the felicity of this attempt breaking all combinations of the Gascoignes. This Dutchie of Aquitaine contained foure Archbishops, foure and twenty Bishops, fifteen Earldomes, two hundred and two Barons, and aboue a thousand Capitaineships and Bailiwickes. The losse of so goodly an inheritance which had continued English for almost three hundred yeeres, the world may easily coniecture how iustly it was greeued and lamented for. In this faine estate of the English, the Queene vpon the thirteenth day of October was deliuered of her first sonne who was named Edward, prouing the child of sorrow and infelicity.

(61) It were to be wished we might now rather number the following euils of England, then describe them; for what can we learne out of such vnnatural and sauage destructions, but matter of horreur and detestation? But such they must be handled, (the law and necessitie of our task exacting it,) the sooner to be quit of so vnpleasing objects, it will be best abruptly to thrust into the narration. The Duke of Yorke (wickedlie careless of an Oath so religiouslie and publickly taken,) to make his way to the Crowne more easie, hath now procured his chiefe and most fearefull enemy the Duke of Sommerfet to be suddenly arrested of high treason, (doubtfull whether by any authority but his owne) in the Queenes great Chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, vpon pretence that he had capital matter to charge him with. Yorke principall friends (vpon confidence of whom he dared to high things) were Richard Nevill Earle of Salisbury second sonne of Ralfe Nevill Earle of Westmerland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married. This Richard was Earle of Salisbury in right of Alice his wife, sole heiress to Thomas Montacute, the famous Earle, slaine at the siege of Orleans. The Dukes other maine hope was Richard Nevill (sonne of the former Richard Nevill,) who in right of his wife, the Lady Anne (sole sister, and heiress of the whole blood to Henry Beauchamp, Duke of Warwick) was by this King Henric the sixth created Earle of Warwick in a most vnhappy houre both for the King & kingdome, being a most valiant and a man of an vndaunted mind, but sitting faith.

(63) The King in the meane space, while the Duke of Sommerfet was thus endangered, lay sicke; and Yorke (as Regent) swayed and ouerlaid in Court; but when the king (perceiving malice and practise to be the chiefe bales of Yorkes accusations) had recouered his health, and resumed the gouernment, Sommerfet is set at liberty and made Capitaine of Calles; Yorke and his adherents repaire to open force: They leuy their armie about the Marches of Wales, with which they repaire toward London, the maine object of Pretendents. The King hearing of his enemies approach, is accompanied with Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, Humfrey Earle of Stafford, Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland, James Butler Earle of Wiltshire, and Ormond, Beauport Earle of Dorset, Jasper Thedder Earle of Pembroke the Kings halfe-brother, Thomas Courtney Earle of Devonshire, the Lords Clifford, Sudley, Berners, Rolfe and others, and with them enters into Saint Albans in warlike manner, hauing certaine thousands of common souldiers. Thither also the Duke of Yorke and his adherents came. This was toward the end of May: The Dukes request to the King was, that he would deliuer such persons to be deferedly punished as he would name. The King (to let them know who he was) returns this confident answer. That hee and the rest were Traitors, and that rather then they should haue any Lord from him who was with him at that time, hee himselfe would for their sake in the quarrell vpon that day lide and die.

(64) The Yorkists hereupon assaile the Kings people within the Towne, and Warwick breaking in through a Garden, a sharpe battell is begun. The losse fell lamentably vpon King Henries side; for besides the Duke of Sommerfet, there were slaine the Earles of Northumberland and Stafford, the L. Clifford, with sundry worthy Knights and Esquiers, of which forty and eight were buried in Saint Albans, there being slaine aboue fure thousand of K. Henries party, and of the Yorkists aboue fixe hundred. The King himselfe was shot into the neck with an arrow; & other of his chiefe friends were likewise fore wounded and taken. The Earle of Wiltshire, and Thomas Thorpe, Lord chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, with others (saue themselves by flight. The Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwick with the King, (whome they in shew did vse most reuerently, and as if they had meant nothing vnto him but good faith) vpon the morrow ride to London, where in Iulie immediately following, a Parliament is holden in King Henries name. The fore-runner whereof was a Comet, or blazing starre, which appeared in the moneth of Iune, the beams whereof extended themselves into the south. The first popular act of this assembly, was to restore the memory of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester to honour, declaring him to haue bene a true subiect to the King and Realme.

(65) The next prouisions which the Yorkists made, were for themselves, and their owne security, willing and commanding that the Duke of Yorke & his partakers should incur no blame by reason of the iourney at Saint Albans: the whole fault whereof was laid vpon the dead Duke of Sommerfet, the Lord Chiefe Baron, and one William Ioseph Esquier, who (say they) kept from the King a pacificatory letter which the Duke of Yorke had sent. It is a wonder and a shame to reade how officiously these violent Lords (meaning nothing lesse) behaued themselves to the King, of whose maiesty they will needs seeme to be the onely Champions and conservators. The Duke of Yorke in the same Parliament creates himselfe Protector of England, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earle of Warwick (his sonne) Capitaine of Calles: they spared as yet to touch King Henries life, because the people did wonderfully honour, esteeme, and reuerence him for his singular holinesse, and for that he had great friends left alive, and a sonne. In the meane space, that they might without trouble, and at their pleasure, vncrowne or kill him, they by little and little displaced the ancient Counsellors, and substituted their assured fauourites. Another Act of that absolute force and fraud, which they exercised in this dreadfull perturbation of all things, was the drawing of John Holland Duke of Excester out of Sanctuarie at Westminster, conuaying him to Pemfret Castle in the North.

(66) Henry Beauport Duke of Sommerfet, (sonne of the former) the Duke of Buckingham, (whose sonne and heiress the Earle of Stafford was slaine at S. Albans) and other the Kings friends, perceiving whereunto this faire flew tended, consult with the Queene at Greenwich concerning her husbands danger, and how to preuent it. Hereupon the Duke of Yorke is displaced from the Protectorship, a ridiculous title to be assumed, where the king was aged about fise and thirrie, and had no other fault or vnfitness, but that he was too good to lide among them. The Earle of Salisbury was also deprived of his Lord Chancellorship.

(67) The King hauing thus recouered his dignity and authoritie, but not sufficient meanes to suppress his dangers, the French take courage at our intestine diuisions, and landing at Sandwich with fiftene thousand men (part of their forces) they kill the Maior, Bailiffs, and other Officers of that Towne, with sundrie Gentlemen of the Countrey, spoile all they could lay hand vpon, and among all they rob two great vessels laden with merchandise, which lay there bound for London and departed. Another part of them, burnes Foway and certaine other townes in Denonshire. On the other side the Scots hostilie entred into Northumberland, but vpon notice that the Duke of Yorke approached with a power, they returned, hauing not as yet done any great harme.

(68) These indignities and losses might haue vnited the disioined affections of true English hearts, which was greatly desired by such as loued their Countrey: For which purpose the King, Queene, and their chiefe friends, being at Conuentione, the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwick are sent for by the Kings letters vnder his priuie Seale, to giue their attendance, whither they come, but they (either warned of some plot contriued against them, or fearing it, or faining to feare) suddenly leaue the Court, without leaue, the Duke departing to Wigmore in the Welsh marches, the Earle of Salisbury to his Castell of Middleham in the North-Countrey, and the Earle of Warwick to Calles, whose bodies though thus diuided, their minds continued most firmly factionated. But the King (a patterne of Christian goodnes) being tender ouer the generall estate of his Countrey, and wonderfully desirous to reconcile differences among his subiects, that they might the better withstand their imminent forein enemies, returns to London there to consult how to effect his holy wishes. The great Lords are persuaded to meete there; which they did; but yet not without store of followers, for the Duke brought with him foure hundred men, the Earle of Salisbury fise hundred, the Earle of Warwick fixe hundred: The Dukes of Excester and Sommerfet eight hundred, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Egremont and Clifford fiftene hundred. This was the fashion of that swording age.

(69) In March the king and Queene with a very roiall company alight at Westminster, to accomplish, if it were possible this charitable and necessary worke of atonement and reconciliation. Godfrey Bolein was at that time Lord Maior of London, (being the ancestor of two renowned and vertuous Queenes of England, Anne second wife to King Henric the eight, and Elizabeth their daughter, through whose great vigilance and prouidence, the City stood so well guarded, that the Kings peace was diuifull kept, notwithstanding the great Lords of both the factions (Yorkists and Lancastrians,) were with so great troupes of followers lodged within, and about the fame: for during the whole time of their abode he had * five thousand Citizens in Harneffe, himselfe riding daily about the City and suburbs, to see the publike quiet preferred: and for the night watch there were assigned to three Aldermen two thousand cosset-men.

(69) During this watch, a great Councell was holden by the King and Lords, whereat length by the diligent traualle, good exhortation, and prudent aduise of the Archbishops of Canterbury, and of other learned and godly Prelates, the parties offended were induced to a communication, and afterward to a final accord: the points whereof, considering they held so short a while, (for as * one faith truly, the dissimiled lone day hung but by a small thread) it were fruitfull to dwell in their rehearsal. The King himselfe (a singular testimonie of the opinion which all parties had of his integrity) was whole arbitrator of their differences. Certaine satisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of Yorke, with the Earles of Warwick and Salisbury, for the death of Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, and others slaine at S. Albans. And the same Duke of Sommerfet, the Earle of Northumberland, and Lord Clifford (slaine in that battell by the Yorkists) are declared for true liegemen to the King at the day of their deaths, as well as the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwick and Salisbury. So both parts stand in fide et recte in curia. Many other articles and awards were made, to foder and glue together their alienated harts and affections. The reioicement caused by this seeming peace (which on the behalf of the kings persō was vndoubtedly sincere and true) was wonderfully great among all good Englishmen, who flocked to the publike celebration thereof. For vpon our * Ladies day in Lent, a solemne procession was made within the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul in London, where the King (adorned with Crowne and robes of maiestie) went in person, before whom went hand in hand the Duke of Sommerfet, and the Earle of Salisbury, the Duke of Excester, and the Earle of Warwick, and so of either faction one and one, and behind the King himselfe, came the Queene and Duke of Yorke with great familiarity in all mens fights. O religion, O honour, O sinceritie, that your diuine vertue should not haue contained these spirits in the harmonie of sweet obedience; but if you could not, what alas should? England must be more severely scourged, then that so goodly a blessing of publike reconciliation should continue, whereby the proud tops of her nation (offensive to God and men) being taken off, the way might be opened to other names or races, which as yet were nothing thought on.

(70) There is no reason to doubt, but that the Duke of Yorke (a man of deeper retirement in himselfe) secretly continued his purpose for the Crowne, notwithstanding all these his vernished pretences, and did only therefore not as then put for it, because he presumed the time was incommodious. Against the Queene (true head and life of the contrary part) aswell in regard of her selfe, her husband, and young sonne, may in likelihood be thought to haue laid downe any thing, rather then the wakefulnesse and ialousie, which former perils and the enemies present strength might worthily keepe alieue in her. The thinnie almes therefore, which couered these glowing coles, were thus againe first vnranked and set to blaze.

(71) The King and manie of the Lords, still being at Westminster, there hapned (or perhaps * was plotted) a fray betweene one of the Kings seruants and a follower of the Earle of Warwick, who hurt the Kings seruant. Hereupon his fellowes of all sorts (as Cookes with their spits &c.) in great disorder affailed the Earle himselfe, as he was coming from the Councell, and had there slaine him, but that the euill fate of England and his owne, rescued him to doe and suffer greater mischiefs. The Earle hardly gets to his Barge, and reputing all things vnforeabout the King, gets ouer to his place at Calais. The Yorkists directly charge the Queene with this, as with a plot drawne for the Earles destruction. Not long after this, the young Duke of Sommerfet is sent Captaine to Calais. Warwick will resigne no roome, notwithstanding the Kings command, allcaging he was made by Parliament: Sommerfet is reiected with danger to his person. Warwick partly maintains himselfe, and such as stucke to him in that charge, with spoiles which he got at Sea; How lawfull it appears not; though Warwick is said to haue been Admirall by Patent, though now reuoked. The Ordinarie bookes haue, that he, with foureteene saile of men of warre, set vpon three Carricks of Genoe or Genoa, and two of Spaine, greater then the Carricks: three of which Merchant-fleete (which how they should be lawfull prize, we see not) he vanquished after two daies fight, with the losse of about an hundred men of his owne, and a thousand of theirs: The booty was worth, at meane rates ten thousand pounds; such also as followed the Duke of Sommerfet coming into his hands, he beheaded at Calais. These were strange darings in the Earle of Warwick, whom yet the vnskillfull, and drunken multitude so highly praise: but what are these in regard of them which will presentlie follow?

(72) The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, and Warwick with his father, the Earle of Salisbury (the Triumuir of England) consult of their affaires: Salisbury is reuolued with sword in hand to expollate the danger and iniury offered to his sonne at Westminster. The Queene (a Lady of incomparable magnanimity and foresight) confident in this, that now King Henry, or the Duke of Yorke must perish, and that one Kingdome was not wide enough for both their Families, betittres her selfe to maintain the possession of a Crowne, and to aduance to the same her owne flesh and blood Prince Edward, by ruining his house, whose whole building consisted of Lancastrian beneficence. She consults, she sends, she speaks, she giues, and strengthneth her selfe with friends on all sides, chiefly in Cheshire, causing her sonne to distribute silver swannes (his badge or deuise) to all the Gentlemen of that County, and to many other through England. Salisbury sets forward from his Castell at Middleham with foure or five thousand men. James Touchet, Lord Audeley encounters him vnadvisedly vpon Blare-heath neere Muckelstone. The fight was long and bloody, but in the end K. Henric euill fortune gaue the better of the day to the Earle of Salisbury, where, besides the valiant Lord Audeley himselfe, were slaine not fewer then two thousand and foure hundred, but the chiefe losse fel vpon the Cheshire men, who were the Princes Lieuterie.

(73) The Earle of Salisbury in this fort opened to himselfe a way to Ludlow, where the head of their combination, Richard Duke of Yorke, busied himself to gather forces: being met, they conclude, that seeing the matter was now become deadly, they would deale in cloudes no longer, but fight it out to the extremity. Men are drawne out of all parts with large hopes & promises of sharing in their fortunes, and the Earle of Warwick bringing with him from Calais (which he left with his friends) that valiant Captaine Andrew Trollop, and a band of stout and choise Souldiers, comes to the generall Rendeuou of the Yorkists, the Castell of Ludlow. The King in the meane space, (and not before it was need and time) hath assembled a great puissance of faithfull Subiects, and being * attended with the Dukes of Sommerfet and Excester, and other of his chiefe friends marcheth against his enemies. His first worke was, to offer them generall pardon. It is refused, and called by them a stasse of reede, or glasse Buckler. wonted hypocrites) is delivered to the King. There are in it among many other insinuations these also: Of Christian King, right high and Mighty Prince, and our most dread Soueraigne Lord, wee sent vnto your good grace by the Prior of the Cathedral Church of Worcester, and diuers other Doctors, and among other by M. William Limwood doctor of Diuinity, which ministered vnto us fearefully the blessed Sacrament of the body of Iesus, whereupon wee and euery of vs depofed of our said truth and duty.

(74) Thus these prophane and ambitious men play with God, who in the end will feuerly be a- uenged on them for their impietie: but the letter made no ouerture of any courie, vpon which they would yeeld to lay downe Armes, allcading, they would make their way to the king for redresse of abuses, & that they were enforced to stand together for their own defence, against such great Courtiers and Fawourites, as (say they) intended their destruction; meaning indeed such persons whose vigilancy and manhood might protect and guard him from their practise and violence. The King is now in fight, whom the Triumuirs Yorke, Warwick and Salisbury being strongly entrenched before, Ludlow, * meane to assaile. Andrew Trollop (who had in the Kings pay done great seruice vpon the French) was acquainted with all their counsell, and finding himselfe extremely deceived, (for hee thought and so by the Earle of Warwick was made to believe, that the preservation of the King was intended, and not destruction) abandons the Yorkists Campe at midnight, & with a choise number of trusty men presents himselfe and seruices to the King, who graciously receiued him and his. The truth of the Triumuirs plot, and bottome of their conspiracies was thus made clearly knowne: The Yorkists vpon notice of Trollops act, despairing of successe, at that present fle. The Duke of Yorke with the Earle of Rutland his younger son into Ireland, the Earle of March his eldest sonne and heire, Warwick and Salisbury, with much difficult escape to Calais, which place (as * one faith probably) if Henry had in time taken from his enemies, they had without question bene forthwith irrecoverably ruined.

(75) The multitude which ferued vnder Yorke found mercy, but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or generally ranfact. The town of Ludlow it selfe was spoiled to the bare walls, and Dutchesse of Yorke depriued of all her goods. What lesse could bee the effects against the friends of such aduerfaries, vpon so publike an act and aduantage? The point is followed more sharply vpon the great Offenders in the next Parliament which was holden at Conuentre: there Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March, Richard Earle of Warwick, Edmund Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Alice Countesse of Salisbury (in whose right her husband was Earle) two or three Lords, 9. Knights, and certaine other, were openlie of high Treason attained, and their whole estates confiscated.

(76) Calais, a most important piece, being in the meane space violently posselt by Warwick, the Duke of Sommerfet, the Lords Roffe and Audley, are sent with forces to take it; their successe was euill, for the Duke was glad to fle, his Souldiers were robbed by Warwick: men of their harnesse, the Lord Audley is taken into the Towne, and the Lord Roffe hardly escaped. Letters are hereupon written into forraigne parts, entreating * that no reliefe bee ministered to the Traitors who kept Calais against the King, and all men are at home forbidden to transport any victuall or refreshment thither. Euidēt it is, that the Councell of England rather wished that the Town and Castell had bene French againe, then as it was; neither therein erred they, for it could not be so mischievous to the maine of their cause, as now it was. The Duke of Sommerfet being in Guines, a neighbour Caste, dorth daily by his Souldiers skirmish with the Caliseans: Warwick meditates other things. Hee must speake with the Duke of Yorke, at whose commandement all Ireland (where hee abode) seemed to be readie; but is aduertised that the King had certaine shippes, which lay at Sandwich to transport supplies and succours to the Duke of Sommerfet. Hee meanes not to leaue such a perill behind him vnremoued; hauing therefore espied his time, hee wils his people to slippe ouer in the night to Sandwich, which they accordingly did,ooke the Lord Rivers, and his son Anthony wooduile prisoners, and brought away all the shippes, except one called Grace de Dieu: one Sir Baldwine Euford Knight, hauing (after this) assumed to doe seruice vpon the Earle of Warwick, and to take him, returns empty. Warwick failes now to Ireland. The King makes the Duke of Excester Admirall, and giues him commission to apprehend the Earle of Warwick. The Duke with a great nauie puts forth to Sea from Sandwich. Behold the ill carriage of things. At Dermouth many of his Souldiers, pretending want of money and victuals, forsake him. Meane while the Earle of Warwick passeth by the Duke, not daring to assaile him, nor he willing to assaile the Duke, for that hee was Admirall and of the Kings blood. Such was the act and cunning of the Yorkists to pretend reuerence vnto that, which most of all they thirsted to shed: Five hundred fresh souldiers attend at Sandwich to bee shipped ouer to the Duke of Sommerfet for safe conducting him into England. Warwicks men sodainly come vpon them, flew Montfort their Captaine, and many other, and disarmed the rest. Such was the distracted estate of our poore Country at this time, through the pride and restless ambition of one or two vnhappy men. But though nothing was more plaine then that the Duke of Yorke fought the crown of England; yet nothing is truer, then that they as yet pretended nothing lesse for the veneration of King Henric purty of life, would haue preuailed with the people greatly to their preiudice.

(77) The King failing thus to obtaine the person of Warwick, or his Towne of Calais, the Yorkists send ouer certaine Articles into Kent, in which (as if they were the onely Patriots and best Subiects of the world) they claime of certaine generall enormities concerning iniuries done to the Church, and the ill ministracion of iustice, abuse of purueyers and takers, the Kings povertie by the corruption of his officers, and the like plausible stuffe: where they speake of the King, they sequester him from all exception, as being of so noble, so vertuous, so righteous, and so blessed disposition: (these are their words and the truth) as any Prince earthly. Where they speake of their enemies, (that is, the Kings principall friends and faithfull subiects) they name the Earle of Salisbury, the Earle of Wiltshire, and the Lord Beaumont which must euer be an honour to their memories, and put the blame (if it were blame-worthy) of such attaindors which were enacted against the Yorkists at Conuentre, vpon these three Lords specially. Where they speake of themselves & their intentions, they profess almeerity and loyaltie to King Henry, and that they onlie meant to come vpon their guard to speake with him concerning the common wealch, and their owne safeties, and that now they would attempt the same againe, in the name of the Land, and not to suffer such mischiefs to raigne vpon rhem. The conclusion of their cunning and painted pretences hath these fained holy words: Requiring you (the people) on Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to assist vs, doing alway the duty of Liegemen in our persons to our said Soueraigne Lord, to his estate, prerogative and preheminece, and to the surety of his most noble person, whereunto wee haue euer bene, and will bee as true as any of his Subiects alieue: whereof we call God, our Lady Saint Marie, and all the Saints in heauen, to witnesse, and record. But of the thing it selfe (that is to Crowne the Duke of Yorke) they make not the least mention: what wanted in these men to the height and depth of humane malice? They preuaile with the multitudes; a shallow braind, but a great great and many headed beast. The Lord Fawconbridge is sent to found their affections, and to draw the purulent matter to an head: he finds great forwardness. The Earles of March, Warwicke and Salisbury aduertised of all things, land in Kent. But the people onely were not deluded; for Thomas Bourchier Archbischoppe of Canterbury, and other graue men, beleueed they meant foorth; which that they might the rather doe, the Earle of Warwicke made open oath vpon the Croffe of Canterbury, that they had enured borne true faith and allegiance to King Henry. A strange humor in the English, that could neither brooke bad nor benigne Princes. The King had before their comming quit the City of London, as not greatly trusting the affections which the people therof bare toward such as the Yorkish faction had made odious about him, and appointed the Renduou of his forces at Northampton where he abode. The enemy (shewing friend) aduanceth thither. It is a shame to reade that some of the great Prelates would simply bee drawne to countenance such an enterprise: but their intentions were different; they hoped to reconcile enmities, the Earles, to make Torke King. Meanwhile their complices labour to take the Tower of London, within which there were for King Henry the loyal Nobles. The Lord Scales, Hungerford, Peche, Louel, Delaware, and Candale a Galscoigne with sundry others.

(78) At Northampton things were carried thus: The King meaning there to abide his aduersaries, when it was not thought meete to admit the Earle of Warwicke to his presence, (which thing was colourably sued for to raise a ground of iustificacion for battell) they prepare on both parts. The Earles of March and Warwicke (with like or greater cunning, then they had desired admission to the Kings speech) let cry through the field, that no man should lay hand vpon the King, nor common people, but vpon the Lords, Knights and Equeirs.

(79) The hoasts ioyned. No broke they gaue but seemes to wound vs also. Let vs swiftly turne our eyes from so vnnaturall slaughters. The * L. Grey of Ruthen began the difcomfiture of the Kings side, for hee (let the world iudge with what commendation,) hauing the point, did quit his place and fled to the Earles. The Kings armie is defeated, and vterlic broken. Many were slaine and drowned, Polbydore and Grafton say ten thousand: The chiefe of the Nobles who there lost their liues, were the Duke of Buckingham, John Earle of Shrewsburie (* a most hopefull young Gentleman, and in all points like his heroicke Ancestors) John Vicount Beaumont, Thomas, Lord Egremond, and among sundry other prime men, * Sir William Lucie, who making haft to the fight, was vpon his first approach chopt downe with an axe. The Kings Ordinance could not play, there fell so great a raine.

(80) This wofull battell was fought vpon the ninth of Iuly. The King (as a man borne to all calamities and miseries, though hee not therefore the lesse, but the more happy through that excellent fortitude of mind, with which hee inuincibly sustained them) comes into his enemies hands; but the Queene and the Prince, and the remains of their scattered fortunes fle into the North, there to reinforce their powers, and to * subdue (as hee caused them to be proclaimed) the Kings Rebels and enemies. The Tower of London after this misfortune renders it selfe. The Lord Scales is wickedly murdered vpon the Thames by Wherrimen, belonging to the Earle of Warwicke, as hee intended to passe to * Sanctuary at Westminster. The Earles when they were possessed of the King, continued their admirable hypocrites (which God will terribly plague them for) thereby to leade the people on, and had to him these words.

(81) Most noble Prince, displease you not, though it hath pleased God of his grace to grant vs the victorie of our mortall enemies, who by their venomous malice have vntuly stirred and moued your Highnesse to exile vs out of the land, and would haue put vs to small shame, and confusion: wee come not to vngrieue or grieve your said Highnesse, but to please your noble person, desiring tenderly the high welfare and prosperitie thereof, and of all your Realme, and to be your true Liegemen while our liues shall endure. Our foules are amazed at these artes, and men blinsh to publish to the world things so vnworthy.

(82) The * Florentine Secretary was scarce borne at this time, but the Diuel was as great a Master then as afterward. The King and Earles in the meane time goe to London, where a Parliament was summoned in his name to be holden in October following. The Duke of Torke (aduerstified of his victorie) speedes from Dublin, the chiefe City of Ireland, to bee at that Parliament, where we shall at last see the true face of his purpose, his owne selfe taking away the maske which hitherto concealed it.

(83) Seotland, by reason of late affinity with the house of Beaufort, whose chiefe and toppe was the Duke of Sommerfet, (descended from John Duke of Lancaster by the Lady Katherine) was a speciall backe, and second to King Henry in all his tempestuous aduersities; but now that refuge was also hazarded: for King James the second, partly in fauour of King Henry, and partly as making vse of the troubles in England, laich siege to Roxburgh (Belinden the Scot calleth the same Castle * Marchmont) being in the custody of King Henries enemies, where while himselfe (whose * skill and delight in shooting of Ordinance was great) comming down the trenches to see the * Lion (a new great piece which had lately bene cast in Flanders) and the other Artillery discharged, one of them brake, and with a shiuer thereof slew the king, and dangerously wounded the Earle of Angus. This vnhappy accident hapned vpon a Sunday, the * third day of August. The Queen of Seotland neuertheless maintaineth the siege, and aswell obtaines that place, as the Castle of Warke, both which shee (in reuenge) threw to the earth. James the third, a child of seuen yeeres old succeeded to his father, aswell to the cherishment of the distressed English, as to the Crowne.

(84) The Parliament being begunne, about the * eight of October at Westminster in King Henries name, thither comes with flying speed, Richard Duke of Torke, who brake open the Kings lodging Chamber, and placed himselfe therein, (insuffering the King to prouide elsewhere. Then makes hee his claime to the Crown of England, and publisheth it in open Parliament together with his pedigree. The whole house (such among them excepted as were priuie to the Dukes intention) was * greatly dismayed both for that hee did set himselfe in the Kings seate, and for this his vnexpected challenge: But the Duke though at first hee greatly meant to haue deposed King Henry, and with speed to bee crowned himselfe at Alhallontide next, yet finding such amazement and silence, hee sends them his pedigree and his claime in writing, that they might the better consider, yeelding (as it seemes) to be ordered therein, according to their generall agreement during the treaty whereof hee would not visite King Henry, all eading himselfe was peerlesse in England. The maine points of his Title were as followeth. King Edward the third had issue, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Hatfield, Lionell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt D. of Lancaster, Edmund D. of Torke, Thomas D. of Gloucester, and William of Windsor. Edward Prince of Wales dyed, liuing his Father, and left issue Richard the second King of England, who died without issue: as did also William King Edward: second sonne.

(85) Lionell the third sonne had issue Philip his daughter and heire, married to Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, who had issue Roger Earle of March, who had issue Edmund Earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Eleanor, which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without issue. Anne (the heire of that house) married Richard Earle Chron, 11.

Earle of Cambridge, the sonne of Edmund Duke of Torke, fifth sonne to King Edward the third, which Earle of Cambridge had Richard commonly (saith the Booke), called Duke of Torke.

(86) John of Gaunt the fourth son and younger brother to Lionel, had issue Henry, who immediately after King Richards resignation, unwrightously (saith the Booke) entred vpon the same, for that Edmund Earle of March, sonne of Roger Earle of March, and of Philip daughter and heire of the before said Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder brother to John Duke of Lancaster was then aliue, and that aswell the said Henry, eldest son to John Duke of Lancaster, as his descendents haue hitherto holden the Crowne of England, &c. vniuersally, for that himselfe the said Richard Plantagenet Duke of Torke was the lawfull heire, being the sonne of Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, and of Anne before said.

(87) This was the effect of the Duke of Torke title, which for the points of the Pedegree was very true, though in barre thereof the friends of King Henry (without denying any part of the premises, being all of them more euident then that they could be honestly denied) had not a little to say for him: for they could among other things alledge, that Richard the second resigned vpon his Crowne and Regality at large; and that none else making claime but Henry Duke of Lancaster, hee was thereunto by the consent of all the three Estates admitted; that Richard Earle of Cambridge was for high Treason attainted and executed, and his issue made incapable of any inheritance, that this Richard his sonne now challenging the Crowne of England, being restored by the mere clemency and goodnesse of this King Henry the sixth, had voluntarily acknowledged him for his lawfull Soueraigne, and sworne the same, and that the said Richard was finally for treason attainted, and adiudged vniuersally: they could hereunto haue added sundry Acts of Parliament, made to establish the right of the Lancasterian line, the succession of three Kings, all Henries, that is to say, the fourth, fifth and sixth, the politticke aduersities of the first of those Kings, the noble victories of the second, and the holy life of the third; which three Kings liues contained of raigne about threescore yeeres, in which number this was the nine and thirtieth of King Henry the sixth, who was descended of the male line, and the Duke of Torke but of a female: of which female line none had euer been in possession of the Crown. Great and weighty points, (if any) and the rather to bee considered, for that King Henries person being (in very truth) Prisoner, no act of his to establish Torke title could bind in law or conscience, and the lesse, for that hee had a wife, and by her a sonne, who was at liberty, and ready with Armes to free his father, or hazard to destroy the whole English name. But they who on Torke behalf abstractiuelie disputed these highest questions, knew a rule of law, which saith, Tura sanguinis nullo iure ciuili dirimi possunt; and the Lancasterians were not without their speculatiue and remote considerations, to countenance the particulars of their cause. Thus we see that in Monarchies (though the noblest forme of Regiment) where lineall succession is the rule of inheritance, there sometimes fall out as great and as indeterminabile difficulties, as where Election designteth the Successor: whereof the French tragedies which our Nation made among them, and now these in England, are without all exception, the most fearefull instances. For France had heretofore her time of affliction, but now (O dearest England) it was thine.

(88) While this weighty controuersie was debated, a Crowne which hung for garnishment in the middle of the roofoe, where the K knights and Burgesses of the Parliament met to consult, and the crown which for like cause stood vpon the highest Tower of Douer Castell, * fell sodainly down, which was vulgarly construed * to portend that the raigne of K. Henry was at an end, and that the Crown should be transferred from one royall line to another. But the Queene, her sonne Prince Edward, and her fast friends in the North (the seare of their hopes) being nothing discouraged at their late ill fortunes, prepare all the forces they can recouer K. Henry and the Kingdome, which thing whiles they are pursuing, the conclusion of the Parliament concerning the crown, was, That Henry the sixth should raigne, and bee King during his life, the remainder to rest in Richard Duke of Torke, and the lawfull heires of his body in general taylor, King Henries heires to bee excluded. The Duke in the meane time is proclaimed heire apparant, and called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and Protector of England. The agreement was engrossed, sealed and sworn vnto. The Queene will haue nothing to doe in this bargain, being too dangerous and preiudicious to her selfe, her husband, and her sonne; and therefore when the King (at the Duke of Torke instigation) sent for her to reparaire vnto him, shee relying vpon the Dukes of Sommerfet and Excester, and other the Kings friends, utterly refuseth: Henry continueth king. The Armes therefore, which shee took for his deliuerance, haue the more iustice. The Duke of Torke missing the prey hee expected, leaues the king with the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Warwicke at London; himselfe with the Earles of Salisbury and Rutland, and certaine forces, * fetherth forward to Wakefield to pursue the Queene and her sonne, sending direction to the Earle of March that hee should follow with all his power. The Castell of Sandall (handeth pleasantly vpon a small hill, in view of the faire town of Wakefield; there the Duke of Torke (comming thither vpon Christmas Eue) repositeth himselfe, and expecteth the increafe of his numbers. The Queene aduertised, thinks it widome to fight before the Duke grow too strong; and thereupon marcheth forward, hauing an Army of eightene thousand men, led by the Dukes of Sommerfet and Excester, the Earles of * Deuonshire and * Wiltshire, the Lords Newill, Clifford, Rosse, and in effect all the Northerne Nobility. The host (or so much thereof as they thought necessary to shew) presents it selfe before Sandall, to prouoke and dare the Duke to battell. His blood impatient of these braues, & ignorant perhaps that the enemy had so great a multitude, will needes fight, though the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir Daud Hall (an ancient seruant of his, and a great souldier) gaue him aduise to stay, till his sonne (the Earle of March) approached with such Westmen and Marchers, as hee had in great numbers assembled. But God would forbear him no longer, but like a seuerer Master meanes to take a present account: at which hee found whether all the kingdomes of the earth are worth the least sinne, much lesse a wilfull periurie.

(89) The Queene therefore addeth stratageme, and wit to her force, to the intent hee might not escape her hands; whereupon the Earle of Wiltshire vpon one side of the hill, and the Lord Clifford vpon the other, lie in ambush to thrust between him and the Castell; the Dukes of Sommerfet and Excester, stand embattelled in the open field. Their pollicy had the wished successe; for the Duke being not fully five thousand strong, issieth out of the Castle downe the hill. The battels which stood in front, ioyned furiously, when sodainly the Duke of Torke sees himselfe inclosed, and although hee expressed great manhood, yet within one halfe houre, his whole Armie was discomfited, himselfe and diuers his deare friends beaten downe and slaine. There lay dead about him the Lord Harington, Sir Thomas Newill (sonne to the Earle of Salisbury, Sir Daud Hall, with sundry Knights and others about two thousand, & two hundred; among which were the heires of many Southern gentlemen of great account, whose * blood was shortly after reuenged. Let vs not linger vpon the particular accidents of this battell, but consider what it wrought for King Henries aduancement; yet these few things are not to bee vnremembered. the Duke of York being about twelue yeeres old, was also slaine by the Lord Clifford, (who ouertooke him flying) in part of reuenge for that the * Earles father had slaine his. A deed which worthily blemished the Author; but who can promise any thing temperate of himselfe in the heat of martiall furie? chiefly, where it was resolved, not to leaue anie branch of Yorke line standing, for so doth *one make the Lord Clifford to speake.

(90) That mercilesse proposition was common (as the euent will shew) to either faction. The Duke of Yorke head, crowned with paper, is presented to the Queene. Cruell ioy is seldome fortunate. Cesar wept ouer Pompeis head, but the Queene (ignorant how manifold causes of teares were reserved for her owne share) makes her selfe merrie with that gaskly and bloody spectacle. The Earle of Salisbury, after wounds received, being in this battell taken prisoner, is conueighed to Ponfract Castle, from whence the common people (who loued him not) *violently haled him, and cut off his head; which perhaps was not done without the good liking of others. The Dukes head, together with his, were fixed on poles, and set vpon a gate of Yorke, and with them (if Grafton say true) the heades of all the other prisoners which had bene conducted to Pomfret.

(91) This battell (called of Wakefield) was fought vpon the last day of December; of whose weathers complexion if their courages had participated, mischief might haue made her stop here, which now is in her swiftest course.

(92) For the Earle of March, sonne, and heire to this late valiant Duke of Yorke, hearing of this tragicall aduenture, giues not ouer: but, hauing gathered an armie of about twenty thousand to march against the Queene, he findes employment neerer hand: being certified, that Jasper Theder Earle of Pembrooke (halfe brother to King Henrie) and James Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltshire, had with them a great force of Welsh and Irish to take him. The youthfull and valiant Earle of March, whose amiable preface and carriage made him gracious with the people, (and the rather for that he had the generall good word of *women,) means to try his fortune against the laid Earles. He sodeinly therefore turnes backe from Shrewsbury, and at a place called Mortimers Crosse neere London, where the enemy abode, he sets vpon them; it was Candelmas day in the morning, at which time there appeared (as some write) three Sunnes, which sodeinly ioined in one. This luckie prognosticon, and ominous Meteor exceedingly fired the Earle of March, and was (some say) the reason, why he vied for his Badge, or roiall deuise, the Sunne in his full brightnesse. The Battels maintaine their fight with great furie; but, in the end, the Earle of March obtaines the victorie, killing of his enemies three thousand, and eight hundred men; the Earles slued themselves by flight. The sonne of honour and fortune did thus begin to shine through Clouds of blood and miserie, vpon Edward, whome shortly we are to behold King of England. There were taken * Sir Owen Theder (father to Jasper Earle of Pembrooke), who was beheaded by Edwards commandement, as also Sir Iohn Skudamor knight with his two sonnes, and other.

(93) The Queene on the other side (hauing ordered her affaires in the North, settled the estate thereof, and refreshed her people,) within a while after drawes neere with her Northern armie to S. Albans. There came before them an euill fame of their behaviour to London, whose wealth lookt pale knowing it selfe in danger; for the Northern armie, (in which were Scots, Welsh, and Irish as well as English;) made bold by the way with what they liked, making small distinction of sacred or prophane, after they were once past the riuer of Trent, Captaine Andrew Trollop being their Coronell. King Henry himselfe in person, with the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the Lord Bonville, & other, with a great puissance encamped at S. Albans, to giue the Queene battell, and stop her farther passage toward London. But the Lords of her faction being ready to attempt on her behalfe, assaile the Kings forces within the Town, and after some sharpe affronts, break through, and driue their aduersaries out with much bloodshed, till they fell vpon a squadron or battalion of the Kings, wherein there were about foure or fise thousand men, which made good their ground for a while with great courage, but in the end the Queenes side clearly wanne the day. There perished in this conflict about two thousand.

This hapned vpon Shroue-tuesday, the seuenteenth of February. The King, Queene and Prince meet ioifully, where he knights his sonne, (being eight yeeres old,) and thirtie others. The Lord Bonville and *Sir Thomas * Kiriell* of Kent being taken in the fight, were beheaded, but all the other great men escape. The common people of London doe notwithstanding stand wholly for the beautifull Earle of March, and stand the more confidentlie, because they had sure intelligence, that he had vanquished the Earle of Pembrooke in the Marches of Wales, and that the Earle of Warwicke, escaping from S. Albans, had met with the Earle of March neere Costwold, and that both with ioint forces were marching toward London. These newes made the King and Queene retire into the North, and leaue that Citie and the Southern Countreys to their Enemy, till they might recouer a fairer opportunitie or more sufficiencies. Edward vpon notice of the Kings departure, entred London, and giues period to Henries reigne, which is accounted to take end after he had successfully ruled this Land the space of thirtie eight yeeres, sixe moneths, and foure daies.

His Wife.

(94) Margaret the wife of King Henrie, was the daughter of Reyner King of Ierusalem, Sicilie, and Aragon, Duke of Andegavia, Lorraine, Barre, and Calabria, Earle of Prouince, Cenomania, and Gnize. Shee by proxie was espoused vnto King Henrie, at the Citie Touaine in the Church of Saint Martin; William de-la-Poole being Procurator to the king in the presence of the French king and his Queen, which king was vnkle to the Brides Father, and the Queene Aunt vnto her mother. Shee with great pompe was conueyed to South-hampton, and thence to the Abbey of Tichfield, where the yeere of grace 1445. and twentietwo of Aprill, shee was solemnly married to king Henry; and honorably attended by the greatest Estates of the Land, was crowned at Westminster the thirtieth of May following. Shee was exceedingly beautified in face, and of goodly feature, of a great wit and deepe pollicie, but of stomacke faire aboue her sexe, as in the managing of those troublesome times did too well appeare. Shee was his wife twentie sixe yeeres, and twentie nine daies: and (after her husbands depulsion from his regall throne) her forces being vanquished at the battell of Tewkesburie, in a poore religious house, whether shee had fled for the safetie of her life, was taken prisoner, and so carried Captiue to London, where shee remained in durance, till Duke Reiner her father did purchase her liberty with great summes of money, vnto whom shee returned, and lastly died in her natie Countrie.

His Issue.

(95) Edward the only Child of king Henrie and Queene Margaret his wife was borne at Westminster the thirteenth day of October, the yeere of Christ 1453. and the 31. of his fathers Raigne, and the next yeere following vpon the fiftenth of March, by authoritie of Parliament, was created Prince

Prince of Wales & Earle of Chester. For the title of Duke of Cornwall (as it is noted by warrant of record) is reputed vnto the Kings eldest sonne, the very day of his natiuitie, and by vertue of a speciall Act is presumed and taken to be of full and perfect age, so as he may sue that day for his liuerie of the said Dukedome, and ought by right to obtaine the same; hauing his roialties in the Scannary, wrackes at Sea, Customs &c: the first Duke thereof was Edward commonlie called the Blacke Prince, whome his Father, King Edward the third created in great Estate Duke of Cornwall by a wreath on his head, a ring on his finger and a siluer verge. He proued a Prince of great hope and forwardnes, being skilfull in martiall knowledge, matters of gouernment, and Lawes of the Realme. At the age of seuentene, the better to bandie against his Fathers Competitor, King Edward, (the Maul of the Lancastrians claime) affianced in France, Anne the second daughter of Richard the Make-king, Earle of Warwicke, whose other daughter was married to George Duke of Clarence. This Prince when the day was lost at Tewkesburie, fought to escape thence by flight, but being taken, was brought into the presence of king Edward, whose resolute answers enraged the Conqueror so much, as he dashed him (an vnprinclie party) on the mouth with his gauntlet, and Richard the crooke backe ranne him into the heart with his dagger. His body was buried without all solemnity among the poore and meane persons slaine, in the Monasticall Church of the blacke Friars in Tewkesburie. Anno Domini 1471.

CHAPTER XVII.

Edward Duke of York and Richard Earl of Warwick come unto London.

Edward, borne at Roan in Normandy, and bearing the title of March in England, having wonne the battell at Mortimers Crosse (though the Lords his Confederates had lost that of Saint Albans) from Ludlow halted towards London, & on his way was seconded by Richard Neull, the stout Earle of Warwick, to the great encrease of his number and power, which so terrified Queene Margaret, now ready to possesse the South, that with her husband and sonne, in a perplexed feare, she returned againe into the North; vpon which aduantage Edward now Duke of Yorke, presently played. For London vnresolved whether Prince to obey (the one very powerfull, and the other in possession) dayly consulted for their safest estate; when on the sudden Edward with Warwick entred their gates, whose warlike viages so daunted the aduersely affected, that they beganne with the first to make him way to the throne, & the Noblemen likewise made him offers of their seruice, to establish his claime, neither were the Clergy to learne the obseruance of time, or to sway with the man vpon whom the world smiled. All these set in Counsell to confer of the state, Duke Edward made knowne his title to the Crowne, and in well set termes declared, how the body of the whole Parliament formerly had thereunto consented, and Henry himselfe subscribed with his owne hand; whose title, though now carried through three descents; yet what right Lancaster had they all knew, and how insufficient this last man was for rule, France to their dishonour did witnesse, where all was lost through his neglect, whose simplicity euer minded more his priuate uate deuotions, then the potent managing of a Souldiers command.

(2) These things urged (and most of them true) their voices went current, that Edward was the vn doubted King, whereunto the Londons the sooner yielded, for that his dreaded Northerne Army was then encamped in Saint Johns field: neither was any reueration made (as before) of Henries naturall life, but hee is now absolutely neglected as vnworthy of his Crowne, how acceptable seuer he had reigned till then, whose following miseries were not so much lamented, as his constant patience was admired in vndergoing the same. Edward thus mounted, before his foot had well touched the first steppe, was vpon Sunday the second of March, among his Northerne Souldiers proclaimed King; William L. Fauconbridge Earle of Kent declaring his claime, and disabling K. Henry of Stile or Gouernement, whose weak head (as hee alleaged) had ouer long blemished the English Crowne.

(3) Vpon the next day, with all pompe hee was conueied to Westminster, and set vpon the Kings seat in the Hall, where holding the scepter of Saint Edward in his hand, the voice of the people was againe demanded, and againe granted; such was the hap of vnfortunate Henry, and condition of the multitude euer to dislike the present, and to affect the new: but no interim left to disswade or attempt, the next day his stile and title was againe proclaimed by the name of King Edward the fourth, being the fourth of March and "about the 20. yeere of his age."

(4) These sodain alterations made the richer sort somewhat fearefull, especially, those whose heart stood firm for K. Henry, (who was now in the North new mustering of men) and among those, London afforded many, as King Edwards zealous suspected, whereof one Walker a substantiall Citizen and Grocer was a sufficient prooffe, who for wordes spoken concerning his owne sonne, that hee would make him heire of the Crowne (meaning his houle hauing that Signe) was the eighth day of this Kings raigne apprehended, and beheaded in Smithfield. And albeit his words intended no treason, (the Grocer not once dreaming to touch King Edwards title) yet the time being when the Crowne lay at stake, the terture of the Law made them his death. This rough beginning moued many to doubt, that they had wronged themselves in wronging King Henry, which opinion was more confirmed in that hee retained "a great summe of money borrowed of the Staplers-Merchants, and disbursed in his affaires, whose restitution he vtterly denied with an austere commandement to surceale the demand. But hearing how Henry was beloued in the North, & what followers were gathered to recover him the Crowne, vpon the twelfth of March with a complete Armie hee sets forth of London, accompanied with his brethren, and many other Nobles: with whome marching towards Pomfret, he there appoints the Lord Fitzwater to keepe the passage of Ferribrig, omitting no directions of a worthy commander.

(5) King Henry for his part though nothing so warlike, yet thought it best policy to imploy such leaders as desired reuenge against the house of Yorke; such were the Duke of Sommerfet, the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whose fathers had been slaine in the first battell of S. Albans, which last, though in degree the least man, yet sought to raise his fame with the first, and therefore to leaue no attempt vnassayed, hee so sodainly charged vpon the Troupe appointed for Ferribrig, that the Lord Fitzwater vnarmed (only with a pollax in his hand) came hastily to the Brigg, thinking a fray had been among his owne Souldiers, where, with the Bastard of Salisbury, hee and many of his men were slaine by the enemy.

(6) The brute of which gust blowne into stout Warwicks eare, hee mounted his Courser, and posling to Edward, puffing, blowing, and almost out of breath, said, Sir I pray God haue mercy on their soules which in the beginning of your enterprize haue lost their liues: I see no succour in the world, but in God, to whom I remit the vengeance. And so alighting, forthwith slew his horse with his sword saying, Let him flie that flie will, I will tarry with him that will tarry with me: which hee confirmed by kissing the crosse of his sword, the vsuall complement of countenances made by martiall men. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge fearing lest this beginning would giue an edge to the sequell, got ouer the riuer at Casleford, three miles from the bridge, meaning to inclose the takers vpon their backs, which Clifford perceiuing, sought to auoide, and whether for halte, heate, or paine, put off the gorget he wore, when sodainly an arrow without an head, shot from the Bow of some laide in ambush, pierced through his throat, and stucke in his necke, which for a period vnto his life.

(7) The next day more fatal for Englands blood, was celebrated with speares in stead of palmes, vually borne on "that Saboth of Lent", in whose dawning the Lord Fauconbridge, who commanded the forward (the Duke of Norfolke being sicke) tooke the field on a plaine, betwixt the townes of Tipton and Saxton, where King Edward ioyning his whole forces (being forty eight thousand, and six hundred sixty persons, as King Henries were also threescore thousand) caused proclamation to bee made, that hee who feared to fight, might forthwith depart, but if any Souldier abiding, should seeke to flie or turn backe, hee should bee slaine by his next fellow, and the slayer to receive a great reward, besides the stipend of a double pay.

(8) Both Armies ready to ioyne, a small fleet of snow hapned to fall, which with the wind was carried into the face of the Lancastrian host, whereby their sight was much impeached, which aduantage Fauconbridge soone espying, forthwith commanded his Archers to shoot each man a flight, and then to stand without further proffer. The Northern men feeling the arrows, but not seeing the Archers, made haste to acquite them with the like, and shot their whole sheues of arrowes without intermission, but short of the marke by threescore yards at the least, which storme being past, and all their store spent, the worthy Fauconbridge aduanced forward, and within reach of his Archers sore galled the enemy, making a double aduantage of what they had done: for their owne quiers being full, when the others were empty, they gathered vp & shot theirs, against their owne shooters, yet left some of them sticking to gall the legges of their pursuers: by which onely stratagem, as was constantly auerred, the bartell and day was lost and wonne.

(9) The fight was bloody and continued tenne howres, for all being English, acquit themselves English-like, no taking of prisoners, nor looking for ransom, but all to retaine, and to get honour that day; wherein died the Lords Beaumont, Neuill, Willoughby, Wells, Seales, Gray, Dacres, Fitzburgh, Berkingham, and Clifford, (who died the day before) the two bastards of Essex, Knights, Esquiers & Gentlemen a great number, and in all (on both parts) thirty five thousand ninety and one; so that not onely the field lay stained with English blood, but the riuers ran red for a great distance, so markable is this battell of Englands ciuill wars.

(10) Henry, who neuer was victor wherefoeuer hee came, hearing this losse which seemed irreparable, with his Queene and sonne halted into Scotland, where, of James the young King hee was royally entertained, with comfort of assistance to recover his estate, in regard whereof hee surrendered the strong town Barwick into the Scots hand, and concluded a marriage betwixt Prince Edward his sonne, and Lady Margaret the sister of the said King. These things thus effected, milde Henry conceiued some new budding hopes, and Queen Margaret his wife, L 1111 (indeed indeed the better warrior) passed thence into France, where, of King Lewis and her father Reiner she obtained more men, then her coffers were able to relieve with pay; the bane of all courage in adventures of warre.

(11) Victorious Edward, after those his prosperous successes in the North, in triumph returned to London, and the eight & twentieth of June with great solemnity was Crowned at Westminster, where in St. Peters Church, the next day it was againe most solemnly feir on his head, and the third day so Crowned he came to Saint Pauls in London, and therein was censured with great applause of the People. In November following a Parliament began, wherein King Henrie, Queene Margaret, and Prince Edward their sonne, were disherited of their right to the Crowne; the Dukes of Excester and Sommerfet, and the Earle of Devonshire, with an hundred and forty more, were attainted also and disherited; so fortune dallieth in setting the dice of her favours, or frownes.

(12) Queene Margaret stored with men, but in want of money, with her French powers made into Scotland; whose coming was most welcome to the two Kings there, and thence, with great shew of enterprize, hoisted her sailes for England, but having touched the bay of Tynmouth (whether vpon better aduise, or feared with their owne shadowes,) shee with her French put backe to the Sea, where such a fore tempest tooke them, as had not Queene Margaret in a small Caruell got vnto Barwicke, shee had not liued to see the new King, nor scene the vnfortunate losse of her husband, her son, and Realme, nor the miserable calamities of her owne old age; her French by Bastard Ogle were beate into Holy land, many slaine, and foure hundred of them put to their ranlomes.

(13) This fainting French enterprize, though it dulled the edge of some spirits, yet did it nothing daunt the courage of the Queene, her better hopes being fixed vpon the Scots valour; so, (leaving Prince Edward for safetie in Barwicke,) with her husband and Scots shee entered Northumberland, tooke the Castle of Bamburgh, and so passed forward vnto the Bishopricke, their forces daily increasing through the confluence of such English, as fauoured King Henrie.

(14) King Edward hearing these stirres in the North, made his preparation both by Sea and Land, and with his brethren and Nobles came to Yorke, from whence he sent John Neuill Lord Montacute, with a power of men, as somewhat mistrusting the loialties of the Northumbrians, who passing forward, vpon Hegly-More was suddenly encountered by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, with whom was Sir Ralph Percy, a most valiant Knight; but Montacute, accompanied with such as would neither looke backe, nor stand gazing on, abode the encounter, and at the first push put backe two Lords, and finally slew the said Percy, who no waies would depart out of my field; but in dying fayd, I haue slaine the bird in the besse, meaning his oath made to King Henrie.

(15) Lord Montacute sunne thus mounting in the Horizon, cast forth the rayes of his rising fame, which as he well hoped would higher attend. And therefore learning by cipials, that Henries host lay incamped vpon a plaine called Liuels, neere vnto Hexham by the Water Dowill, he halted thither, and so valiantly assaulted their Camp, as after great slaughter, in chafe were taken Lord Henrie Duke of Sommerfet, the Lords Roos, Mollins, and Hungerford, all which were beheaded, and Sir Ralph Gray who first solemnly disgraded, his guilt spurs cut from his heeles, by the Master Cooke, his sword broken ouer his head, his Coate armour rent, another reuerfed put on by the King at Armes, was so led to his execution. King Henrie himselfe got away (as Stow saith) into Lancashire, where, with some few he liued full hardly in Caues, and vnknewne, more then a yeere, but (saith Grafton) hee fled into Scotland which is more like.

(16) Edward thus cleared of the Cloud threatening storme, thought best ere others did light, to provide for himselfe, and therefore hee raised Bulwarks, built new Fortresses in places of danger, put forth his cipials vpon the Marches of Scotland, and commanded that none should keepe Henrie or Margaret in secret, whose sight, hee feared, would draw the affections of many, which otherwise stood in case of obedience. But ouer-borne Henrie (whether past all feare, or informed by delitie) in disguised apparell past into England, where he was soone apprehended by one Cantelow; but Stow saith by Thomas Talbot in Cletherwood besides Bangerley Hippingstones in Lancashire, being betrayed in Waddington Hall as he sat at dinner, and thence brought to London with his legs bound to the stirrups, arrested by Warwicke, his guilt spurs taken off, and committed Prisoner to the Tower of London.

(17) The Lyon thus pent, his pawes cut of pared, and Queene Margaret in France with her father Reiner; King Edward now quiet set his minde vpon Government for the good of his Realme. In his Court of Kings Bench he vied to sit in person certaine daies together, to see how his lawes proceeded with Iustice; ordained penall Statutes against excessive pride in Apparell, especially against long picked shooes then vually worne, which grew to such an extreme, that the pikes in the Toes were turned vward, and with siluer chaines, or silke laces tied to the knee. But among many good prouisions, one proued very bad, as the sequel shewes; for concluding a league with King Henrie of Castile, and John King of Aragon, he granted a licence to transport certaine numbers of Cotswold Sheepe, which are since growne to such an exceeding increase, as the Clothes made of their woolles is a great hindrance to our Marchants, which aduerture in the Leuant Seas.

(18) His next care was to finde a fit Queene, both for the hope of issue to succeed, and for alliance and power to assist (if need were) against Henries claim. First therefore minding to send into Scotland, to desire in marriage the Ladie Margaret, (sister to king James the third) thereby to frustrate Henries further hope; was made to belieue that the said Ladie was, by reason of sicknesse, not capable of conception, which altogether declined his affection from that way. Next, as some say, a motion was made for Lady Elizabeth sister and heire apparant vnto Henrie king of Castile, as a match most conuenient, considering king Edward had thereunto a Claim, whose great Grandmother was one of the heires of Castile, being the daughter of Don Peter the king, besides which high match, and combination of Alliances, a hope was conceiued that the Dutchie of Guien and Aquitaine, might be recovered by the assistance of these Castilians, without great charge or trauell to the English. But the tender spring of the one, and the lusty growth of the other, would not be grafted into one stocke to beare fruit, shee little aboue fixe, and he about twenty three, farre vnfit to abtaine till shee could giue him content.

(19) A third Princeesse was assaid, against whom could be no exceptions, for birth, beaultie, yeeres, or alliance, which was Lady Bona, daughter of Lewis Duke of Sauoy, and sister to Charles the French Queene, at that time residing in the French Court. This double string was thought most fit for king Edwards bow; for the Duke more remote, might strengthen him abroad, and the French neerer home would be made a good neighbour, having the night-bird still singing in his care: especially to cast a rubbe in king Henries way, whose hopes lay most vpon Lewis, for that Reiner of Aniou, stilling himselfe king of Naples, Sicilland Ierusalem, had more honour by that verball stile, then rents or reuenues to maintaine his estate, or any subiection acknowledged by them; so as if king Lewis were Edwards, Aniou was not to be feared.

feared. This match being most approued in council, none was held more fit to sollicit the businesse, then Lord Richard Neuill the great Earle of Warwick, a man esteemed for power a Demy-King, and for magnificence and hospitality matchlesse: in whose house at London (as some haue verified) sixe oxen were spent every day, and most Tavernes in the City full of his meat.

(20) Warwicke in great state arrived at Tower, & his message knowne, was accordingly entertained in the French Court, where he wrought the Queen her selfe to be the chiefest Agent; who drew on her sister Bona, with recommending the state and stile of a magnificent Queene (a found very tunable in a Ladies eare,) and her husband Lewis, with assurance of a potent and wife Allie, a pleasing theme to soft natured Princes, as the French King was. And indeed to all these vnderooke all good contentments; so as on that tide all things were cleare, and Warwicke dismissed with Courly French complements; the Earle Damp-martin was to passe into England for the final confirmation.

(21) But whilest Warwicke had beene industriously wooing in France, King Edwards affection in England was working another way; for being on hunting in the Forrest of Wychemode beside Stony-Stratford, hee there found other game, that made game in his eye, which was the Ladie Elizabeth Gray attending the Dutchesse of Bedford her mother, who then sojourned at his Mannour of Grafton, whither hee repaired for his recreation. Shee had beene attendant vpon Queene Margaret the wife of King Henry the sixth, and had beene married vnto John Gray Esquier, knighted, and slaine at the battell of S. Albans vpon King Henries part, who now was a suiter vnto the King, for something taken away in the extremity of that time, to be restored towards the maintenance of her estate. But howsoeuer her suit pierced his eare, her sweetly composed feature strangely affected his heart; more formally shee was, and lowly in countenance, then either tall or exceedingly faire; yet both sufficient to meete in one person, of an excellent witte, a sober demeanour, a modest looke, a feminine smile, and her speech vttered in such a naturall eloquence as her answers euer set on edge King Edwards desires, which howsoeuer distastfull to the appetite of his wanton bed, (affirming with blushes, that as shee accounted her selfe most vnworthy of the name of his Queene, so shee held her selfe of more worth, & her chaste honour dearer then to be his Concubine) yet held they him in chafe till shee had taken him in the snares of her loue.

(22) Their many meetings and louers complements, made the old Dutchesse of Yorke (the Kings mother) much to suspect it would be a match; to hinder which, with a parents authority shee entred discourse, alleging it honourable, safe, and of much profite to linke with some great Prince in forraigne lands, both for the increase of possessions abroad, and (as the case stood) to be assisted at home: that Warwicke had gone so farre in his suite in France, as if in himselfe now were the stay, the feared their displeasures would not be staid. To marry his Subiect shee held it vnprincely, especially one without reuenues, alliance, or riches, no other thing mouing, but a wanton doteage on the person; and although that in Lady Elizabeth nothing was to be misliked, yet was there nothing so excellent, but the same was incorporated in farre greater Ladies, more meet as shee thought of a Queenslie estate. A virgin (quoth she) is most fitte for a sacred Prince his wife, whose head is annointed with holy Oyle, and whose Maiesty is outwardly more sublimethen the Leuiticall Priests: yet were they forbidden to make widowes their wiues, lest the holy callings should bee defiled with the staine of Bigamie.

(23) When his Mother had said, and expected his answer, the King who had taken counsell of his owne desires, and knew himselfe to bee out of his mothers rule, partly in earnest, and partly in pleasure, made her this reply: That marriage being a spiritual type, ought rather to be conioyned where God had framed the parties to content (as this of his was) then in regard of any temporall respect whatsoever. That his choice was pleasing to himselfe, and would be to his subiects he certainly knew, whose amity before all other Nations hee most preferred and desired; neither could hee giue them better occasion of loue then in this, that being their Soueraigne, hee disdained not to marry into their Tribes; and so likewise for his Issue, there could not any Prince be better beloued then he that was their naturall Prince, so borne of both parents. That if forraigne alliances were so needfull, hee had many of his kin, to contract them, and that with content of all parties; but for himselfe, to marry for possessions, or to please others with displeasing his own affections, hee saw it so widome, hauing already sufficient of the one; and the other offended, euen sweet pleasure would seeme sowre pills; especially, the choice that is made by another mans eye. That there are many comparable to her, said hee, I make no question, and am the more glad, let them haue them that like them, I will not repine, neither I hope will any abridgement of that which I allow vnto others: the Prouerbe is (Mother) that marriage goes by Desirings, but to be wiued against a mans own liking is an earthly Purgatory. And therefore my Cousen Warwicke I am sure, neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in choise of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye, then by mine owne: as though I were a Ward, that were bound to marry by the appointment of a Gardian: I would not bee a King with that condition, to forbear mine owne libertie, in choise of mine owne marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in forraigne land, it proues oftner the occasion of more trouble then profite; and wee haue already title by that meanes, to so much as sufficeth to get, and keep well in one mans dayes. That she is a widow, and hath already children, by Gods blessed Lady I am a Beghelour, yet haue some too, and so each of vs hath a prooffe, that neither of vs is like to bee barren. And therefore (Madam) I pray you bee content, I trust in God, shee shall bring a young Prince that shall play on your lappe to your great pleasure, and your selfe shall blesse the wombe that bare such a babe: and as for your obiection of Bigamie, let the Bishop hardly lay it in my way, when I come to take Orders; for I vnderstand it is forbidden a Priest, but I neuer wist, that it was forbidden a Prince.

(24) The Dutchesse seeing the King so set on his owne choice, that shee could not pull him backe,ooke it in such disdain, that vnder pretext of her duty to Godward, shee desired to frustrate the match, and rather gaue furtherance that Lady Elizabeth Percy should bee his Queene, whome not long before hee had with wanton dalliances enticed to his bed; for which act, vnder pretence of a contract with her, whose husband hee was before God, (as shee alleged) his mother openly obiected against this intended marriage, in the discharge (forsooth) of her owne conscience, which was the cause of such an obstacle, as either the Bishops durst not, or the Kings proceed to the solemnization of this wedding, till the same were clearely purged, and the truth openly testified: whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for; which Lady albeit shee was by the Kings mother, and others to auerre the same, yet when shee was solemnly sworne to speake truth, shee confessed that they were neuer assured indeede, howbeit shee affirmed his Grace spake so louing words vnto her, as shee verily hoped he would haue married her, and that if it had not bene for such kind words, shee would neuer haue shewed such kindnesse vnto him. This point cleared, and no impediment resting, the King Philip. Com. l. 3. cap. 4.

The marriage celebrated.

King tooke to wife this latter beloued Lady Elizabeth Grey, who had been formerly married vnto his enemy, and many times prayed full heartily for his losse, in which God loued her better then to grant her her boone, reseruing greater honour for her selfe and her posterity.

(25) She was honourably descended, especially by the furer side, whose mother was Jacquelin daughter to Peter of Luxemburg, Earle of S. Paul, and Dutcheffe to John Duke of Bedford Regent of France; after whose death the married Sir Richard Woodville knight, and among others bare vnto him this Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene, who being priuately married at the Manour of Grafton, was afterwards crowned Queen at Westminster with all due celebrations, vpon the fixe and twentieth of May, Anno, 1465. Her father then by this new made sonne in law, and Soueraigne Lord, was created Lord Rivers, and made high Constable of England, her brother Lord Anthony, married to the sole heire of the Lord Seales, and her sonne Thomas Grey borne to her first husband, was created Marquisse Dorset, and married to the heire of the Lord Bonville.

(26) But when Warwicke had knowledge the wanton King had got a new wife, and his courting of Lady Bona, to bee but a ball to make Edwards play; hee stormed not a little, whose credite hee tooke to be crackt in the French Court, and himselfe rather thought to haue dallyed in this motion, then to deale by commission from his King, for which cause hee conceived so inward an indignation, that his affection was withdrawn from King Edward, and thenceforth ranne vpon Henrie retained in prison, to which end he temporized with the present king, applauded the Queene, and bare countenance in Court with no discontented shew: The King as wary as Warwicke was, cast no eye of dislike, or of any suspition, gaue him countenance in Court, and in familiar conference heard him before others; yet left the stem of his greatnesse should outcrop his crown and his brethren the spreading branches shadow his designs, hee tooke the Chancellorsship from George Neill, the one of them, then Bishoppe of Excester, afterward Archbishoppe of Torke, and from the other John Neill Baron Montacute, the Earle-dome of Northumberland, bestowing the same (at the suite of the Northumbrians, set on by himselfe) vpon Henry Percy, whose father was slaine at Touton, and himselfe at that present fled into Scotland for safety. Whereupon Montacute was removed, and to auoid suspition was created Marquisse, a greater name, but farre lesse in power. And to haue a stake in store howeuer the dice chanced to turne, hee sought to ioine friendship with forraigne Princes, hauing offended France for the refusing of his Queenes sister: so as hee sought, and obtained the amity of Henry King of Castell, & of John King of Aragon, and tooke a truce with his neighbour the Scottish King for fifteen years following.

(27) But these confederates for the more part too farre to be called for by whistle, fortune beyond expectation set him another euen at his elbow, which was Philip Duke of Burgundy, Prince of Flanders, Brabant, and Zealand, whose only sonne legitimate, (Charles Earle of Charolais a widower, and without any sonne) hee fought to conioine to King Edwards faire sister, not so much for any loue hee bare to the house of Torke, himselfe being a Lancastrian by his mothers side, as to bandy against Lewis King of France, whom he had lately ouercome in a battell at Monleherm, and as then stood vpon his defence, as hee was sure King Edward did. This motion King Edward and his Councell well liked, only Warwicke with stood it, in fauour of the French: but the Lady Margaret lent ouer according to her estate, and Warwicke left fuming with a discontented mind, after some complements of mirth with his brethren the Archbishoppe and Montacute at his Towne of Warwicke, brast forth into warlike consultations for the deposing of Edward, and restoration of Henry, whose wrongs (as hee leaded) did crie for right at their hands. The Bishoppe lightly consented to side for King Henry, but the Marquisse would hardly bee drawne from King Edward, which Warwicke perceiving, laid his lime twiggcs yet another way.

(28) For being a man of a deepe reach and witte, hee well law that George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, bare not the best liking to the sway of the times: him therefore hee sought to allure to his fist, which once mand, Edward should loose the best Faulcon for his game; him therefore by Probbles hee meant first to proue and according to their digest, purposed to proceed. So falling in familiar conference with Clarence, beganne to complaine of some vnkindnes in the King, both in breach of some promises, and staine of his honour in the French Court. The Duke as discontented as Warwicke, interrupted his tale before it was told, why my Lord (quoth Clarence) doe you looke that a Leopard should haue no spots in his skinn, or a Cameleon no colours, but one, in faith you are decciued, and loofe but your labour to wash the natural Blackmore: for will you haue him kind that is by nature vnkind, and to be respected of him, that respects not his owne blood: or thinke you (a Cosen and Allie) to be raised by him, that seeth (if not seeketh) his owne brethren false. For the heire of the Lord Seales (you see) hee hath married to his wifes brother, the heire of the Lord Bonville and Harington to his, wifes sonne, and affianced the heire of the Lord Hungerford to the Lord Hastings, marriages indeede more meete for his two brethren and kinne, then for such new fondlings as hee hath bestowed them vpon. But by my George I sweare, if my brother of Gloester would ioine with mee, wee would make him know that wee are all three one mans sons, and of one and the same mother.

(29) Earle Warwicke hauing that which hee greedily sought after, seconded the resolution with his owne assistance, imparting now boldly what confederates he had made, and to ioine more faithfully in this his designe, hee proffered Clarence his eldest daughter Lady Isabel in marriage, faire and well qualified with the one halfe of his wifes inheritance, the being sole heire vnto Henry Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke her brother, and nothing inferior to any of those whom Edward had bestowed vpon others, which no sooner was spoken, but was as presently embraced, and the plotte conferred how to proceed, which was concluded; forthwith to saile vnto Calles (whereof the Earle was Captain, and where the virgine Lady lay) as well to confirme the contract betwixt them, as to be absent whē the commotion should beginne, as the safer from suspition and the surer to strike when the Ball came to hand, to stir which, the Archbishoppe and Montacute were appointed for the North.

(30) The occasion pickt to make Malecontents, was the abuse of Charity vnto an hospitall dedicated to Saint Leonard in the City of Torke, whose renewen flood most vpon come yearly receiued from Farmers in the Country, as an oblation of their first graine. This, the factious made their onely ground vnder a holy pretext (forsooth) that the poore were defrauded, and the Master and Priests onely fed & waxen fat. To redresse which one Robert Hulderner entred in action, and with fiftene thousand strong enterprised for Torke, in which City the Lord Marquisse Montacute was President for King Edward, who with a small number, but well chosen, issued off against the enemy, put them backe, and stroke off the head of their Captaine before the gates of Torke: but whether hee did it in policie to grow more in trust with the King, or else of duty of oblige, not moulded thoroughly to the commotion, is vnccertain. But certaine it is, the Rebels were nothing daunted at Hulderner death, but rather made resolute to to continue what they had begunne.

(31) To which end they choofe them two Chieftaines of greater account, and eminent calling, which were Henrie sonne and heire to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Henrie Neill, sonne and heire to the Lord Latimer, the one of them being Nephew, & the other Cosen-germane vnto the Earle of Warwicke, these but young, and not altogether experienced in Armes, choofe for their Tutor Sir John Conyers a Knight of such courage, skill and valiantnes, as in the North-parts few were his like: who meaning to strike at the head, determined to march forthwith to London proclaiming in his way, that Edward was neither a iust Prince vnto God, nor a profitable King vnto the Common-weale.

(32) King Edward hearing of these Northern proceedings, and that his brother and Warwicke were preparing against him, sent for the Lord Herbert whom he had created Earle of Pembroke, to be his Generall in the North (who partly to defuere the Kings liberality in advancing him to such honour, and partly in emulation he bare toward Warwicke, being the sole oblate (as he tooke it) why he obtained not the wardship of the Lord Bonville daughter and heire for his eldest sonne) did not a little reioice of that his imploiment. And therefore accompanied with Sir Richard Herbert his brother and eightene thousand well furnished Welshmen, marched towards the enemy, and after him was sent Humfrey Lord Stafford with fixe thousand Archers to second him in his warres. Their Lords meeting together, had notice by epials that the Northern made forwards towards Northampton, to intercept whom, the Lord Stafford lately made Earle of Devonshire was imploied and Sir Richard Herbert, who with two thousand horse laid themselves covertly by the side of a wood, and suddenly fell vpon the rereward, the rest hauing passed: but the Northern verie nimbly turned about; and bad the Welshmen sich welcome as few of them returned to tell of their entertainment.

(33) The King vnderstanding of this hard beginning, mustred his subiects on euerie side, intending to cope with the Northern himselfe. And Earle Warwicke as forward to forward his fortunes, gathered his friends, with purpose to encounter with Pembroke and his Welsh. But before any supplies came to either of both; it chanced the Armies to meete at vnawares, vpon a faire plaine called Danes more nere to the Towne Hedgecot, three miles from Banburie and presently fell to a bickering, wherein Sir Henrie Neill Knight, sonne of the Lord Latimer, vpon a lusty courage, venturing somewhat too farre was taken prisoner, and notwithstanding he yielded himselfe to his Takers, was cruelly slaine, which vn-martiall act rested not long vnrepaid with the losse of most of the Welsh the next day. For the field withdrawne the Lord Stafford repaired to Banburie and there tooke his lodging, where his affections were much enamoured vpon a faire damsell in the Inne. But the Earle of Pembroke comming to the same Towne, tooke into the same Inne, and commanded the Lord Stafford to provide him elsewhere, contrary to their agreements made before, whereat Stafford was displeased, and departing thence with his whole Band, left the Earle naked of men in the Towne, and disabled the field of the Archers, whereby the day was lost vpon the kings part, for which he shortly lost his owne head.

(34) The Northern enflamed for the death of young Neill, the next morning most valiantly fell vpon the Welshmen, and by the force of Archers, draue them from their ground of aduantage, which Pembroke wanting, supplied with his owne prowess, and Richard his brother with his Pollaxe twice made way through the battell of the Northern, without anie mortall or deadly wound: so that by their valours it was verily supposed the field had beene wonne, had not John Clappam an Equire and seruant to Warwicke displaid his Lords Colours with his white-beare, and from an eminent place cried a Warwicke, a Warwicke, whereat the Welsh were so terrified, as they turned and fled, leauing their Generall and his brother alone in the field, who valiantly fighting were incompassed and taken with the death of fiftethousand of their men. The Earle with his brother Sir Richard Herbert were brought to Banburie, where with ten other Gentlemen they lost their heads, Conyers and Clappam being their Iudges.

(35) This second victory thus got, and the Northern now fled, vnder the leading of Robbin of Riddisdale; halted to the Kings mannor of Grafton, where the Earle Rivers father to the Queene then lay, whom with his sonne John, they suddenly surprised, and in Northampton struck off their heads without any iudgement. The deaths of these Lords the King greatly lamented, and sought to reuenge: first therefore writing his Commissions for the apprehension of Lord Humfrey Stafford of Southwicke (who by diligent search was found at Brent-march and beheaded at Bridgewater, as he worthily deserued) next he prepared a mighty Armie, and with the same marched towards Warwicke, his company increasing euer as he went.

(36) King Edward let downe his tents at Wolney foure miles from Warwicke, where the Duke and the Earle of Warwicke host lay ready for Battell, but by the mediation of friends a peace was increased, and letters written from either parties, expressing the griefes and wrongs sustained, with proffer of redresse, in amending all, and in shew lo farr it proceeded, as the King conceiuing a certaine hope of peace, rested secure, not fearing any foule-play, which politique Warwicke (by his spiall perceiving) thought it not wildeome to loofe the aduantage, and thereupon in the dead of the night with a selected Company he entred the Kings Camp, killing them that kept the watch, tooke the king in his bed, and brought him his prisoner to his Castle of Warwicke, and thence by easie iourneys in the night had him conueyed to Midelham Castle in *Torke*shire not farre from Richmond, where vnder the custody of his brother George Neill Archibishop of Torke hee was retained.

(37) His vsage was Princely, and according to his estate; which he often acknowledged to the Archbishop with all kind thanks, and complements of wordes; whereby he wrought himselfe into such trust and fauour, as he had the Forreits to hunt in, and the parkes for his pleasure, whose pales are well knowne, vnusufficient wals to pen the Lyon in, appeared by this King, who being abroad and on hunting, Sir William Stanley, with Sir Thomas Burgh brought him fresh horse, and such a crew of followers that his keepers more feared their owne liues, then were forward to force him backe againe to prison, and so let the game goe without further chafe. King Edward thus cleaped, Warwicke like a wild man furiously raged, but seeing no remedy made vpon necessity, and gaue forth that himselfe so caused it, hauing power to make Kings and to vnmake them againe.

(38) The King forthwith repaired to Torke, where with great honour hee was ioyfully receiued, and abode certaine daies, which made him well hope of a further supply of friends and men, but fayling thereof, and fearing the Archbishops puruite with a small traine he posted to Lancaster, where he found the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine well accompanied for his Conuey: his spirits then reuiued, and traine daily increasing, with speedie iourneys hee came vnto London; where all his studies and consultations were, how to be reuenged vpon these disloyall Lords, his brother, and Earle Warwicke, and they againe fretting at the Archbishops follie sought to make stronger their factions against the King.

Sir Robert Wils put to death.

Warwicke and Clarence flee into France.

Phill. Comes lib. 3. cap. 4.

The Dutches of Clarence delivred of a son vpon shipboard.

The Duke of Burgundie bends himselfe against Earle Warwicke.

ditions, and no estate sure to enioy what was theirs, the Nobles anew began to sollicite the parties vnto a Peace, hauing first obtained libertie to post to and fro without their impeachments, and so effectually laid downe the state of the Land whose ruines now were so eminent by these intestine warres, that the Natiues lamented, the Forreine reioiced, and God they saw highly displeased, whose sword thus giuen into their hands, was to be feared would be the destruction of the English, as Nabucadnessars of Babel was of Iudea, and indeed so effectually wrought, that the Duke and Earle vpon perfect confidence came to London, accompanied with a small number in respect of their great danger: where falling into conference with the King, he tasked them with disloyaltie, and they him with ingratitude, so that their spleens were nothing appeased, but much more increased, and with high wordes departed, the King vnto Canterbury, and they againe to Warwicke.

(39) The stout Earle whose stomacke must haue vent, otherwise the Caske must needs breake, caused new stirres to be raised in Lincolnshire, vnder the leading of Sir Robert Wils, an expert fouldier, and sonne of the Lord Wils, who with thirte thousand Commons, disturbed the Countrey, and in euerie place proclaimed King Henrie; setting downe his battell not farre from Stamford, meaning to abide the encounter of his opposers; which when the King heard of, he sent for the Lord Wils his father, commanding him to write to his sonne to forsaue the warres, and so marching toward Stamford tooke Wils in his companie, with a good hope that the sonne would not beare armes against his own father in field, but howsoeuer he had writ, or the King conceiued, Sir Robert went on in his former delignes, which so sore moued Edward, that he beheaded Lord Wils with Sir Thomas Dimocke that had married his daughter, although he had giuen them promise of safety and life.

(40) Young Wils then hearing of his fathers death, sought the reuenge vpon this vntuful Prince, and not staying for Warwicke who was in preparing to come, set manfully vpon the King and his power, where betwixt them was performed a most bloody fight, till at last Sir Robert was taken, with Sir Thomas Deland and others, whereat the Lincolnshire men were so terrified, that casting off their Coates, they all ranne away, in regard whereof this battell to this day is called, the battell of Loftonfield, wherein were slaine ten thousand men at the least: after which victory the King commanded Wils with many other of note to be put to death, as the chiefe causes of these dangerous Commotions.

(41) This vntimely conflict and vnfortunate ouerthrow, made Clarence, and Warwicke, at their wits end, who vnprovidid to field against Edward, gaue way to necessity, and from Dartmouth in Devonshire embarked themselves and wifes for France, both to intigrate King Lewis no friend vnto Edward, and to secure themselves in Callis (whereof Warwicke was captaine) till fortune had changed the hand of her play. These crossing the Seas cast Anchor before the Towne of Callis, and gaue notice they were ready to land, but the Lord Walsclere a Gascoigne, whom Warwicke had substituted, is deputed, discharged diuers peeces of Ordinance against them, and sent word flatly they should not come there: meane while the Dutches of Clarence fell in trauell, and was there on Shippe-board delivred of a faire sonne, which Child the Earles deputed would scarcely suffer to be baptized in the Towne, nor without great entreaty permit two flagons of wine to be conveyed aboard to the Ladies lying in the hauen. For which his good seruice King Edward by his letters Patents made Walsclere chiefe Captaine of Callis, and discharged the Earle as a Traitor or Rebelle against him.

(42) Charles Duke of Burgundie, being then at S. Omer, owing Earle Warwicke an old grudge for gain-standing his marriage, thought now a fit time to requite the discourtesie; and therefore sent many thanks vnto Walsclere, with promise of a thousand Crownes pension by yeere, if he stood firme for his wifes brother King Edward, himselfe laying the Coast to impeach his marriage. But how Monsieur Walsclere stood affected, whatsoever shew he made, Comes the French Kings Historian doth tell, who sent Warwicke word the danger he stood in, of the said Duke, and of Duras the Kings Admirall, so as to land, would be his final confusion: His Counsell therefore was that he should make into France, vnto whose King he should be most welcome; and as for the town of Callis, he willed him to take no thought, but promised to make him a good reckoning thereof, when time should best serue. Whereupon the Earle waied anker for Normandy, and in his way tooke many rich Ships of the Duke of Burgundies subiects, which netted him not a little, but yet found no docke to rub out the smart.

(43) King Lewis hearing of the arriuage of Warwicke, and knowing his troubles to arise for his Ambassage to Rome, and faith vnto France, sent certaine Princes to conduct him to the Castle of Amboys, where a supply was made against necessities, and himselfe and traine most honorable intertained, whereat the Duke of Burgundie sore repined, and sent Lewis word that he disliked his doings with threats of reuenge, if he aided him against his wifes brother. This, notwithstanding the French King gaue all comforts to these fugitives, and prepared his assistance for their restorations, and the raising againe of godly King Henrie.

(44) Queene Margaret hauing fled England and sojourning in France with her Father Reiner (a King in name, but scarcely able to beare the State of an Earle) saw now the Iron hor, and ready to be stricke, therefore with her sonne Prince Edward, John Earle of Oxford, and Iasper Earle of Pembroke (who lately had escaped out of prison in England) came vnto Amboise, where by means of the French King a combination of Alliance was confirmed betwixt the Prince of Wales, young Edward, and Anne the second daughter to the Earle of Warwicke, then present with her mother and sister in France. That King Henrie should be againe restored, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earle tooke a solemn Oath neuer to desert whiles they had power, and in the nonage of the Prince they jointly were to be deputed his Protectors, and the Lands sole Gouvernors.

(45) Edward in England hearing what Queen Margaret, his brother Clarence, & stout Warwicke in the French Court had done, was stricke into a sodaine dumpe, being as doubtfull of friends, as fearefull of foes, and therefore such as were allied to the Lancastrians, or fauourits of the down-cast K. Henrie, he began somewhat roughly to deale with: many therefore that were guilty daily tooke Sanctuary, or yeelded themselves to his mercie, among whom John Marques Montacute brother to Warwicke was one, who with faile words of promises, was receiued into fauor, and vpon whose example many others came in, which notwithstanding meant to stand out if occasion should serue. But no buffer was Edward to keepe the Crowne on his head, then these Lords in France were resolute to strike it off: in midst of whose consultations behold how it happened.

(46) There came from England to Callis a damsell belonging (as shee said) to the Dutches of Clarence, who signified vnto Monsieur Walsclere that shee came from King Edward with a declaration of peace, which hee fearing to impart the conditions to other, had made her the instrument, the better to passe without any suspition, and he glad to heare for the Earles sake (whom hee entirely affected) gaue her his safe conduct vnto the Duke of Clarence then at Amboys, where hauing priuate access vnto him, shee told, that it was neither naturall nor honourable for him to take part against the house of York: that the house of Lancaster, was not onely by the whole Court of Parliament debarred to bee the indubitate Heire of the Kingdome, but that K. Henrie himselfe had discharged his Issue from claime, as it standeth (said she) vpon Record to be seene, contrary to which, as he might well perceiue this marriage of Prince Edward with the Earles daughter, did onely aime and intend to the vtter extinct of the house of York, whereof himselfe was one, and in neere possibility of the Crowne, Edwards Issue young, and not many, and the King very wanton, a sinne commonly punished with want of posterity, which if it so chanced, then hee, or his were the next. These reasons wayed, so ouer-wayed the Dukes further delignes, that hee promised thereafter a more brotherlike affection, as (saide hee) Edward should find, with which good newes hee returned into England, Warwicke vtterly ignorant what was said or done.

(47) All now in a readinesse for the return, ships, money and men supplied by the French King, the Admirall of France was sent to secure them from the Duke of Burgundies Fleet, which with an extraordinary number and power lay in the mouth of Seyne to fight with Warwicke when he should looke out of Harbortow: but see how the heauens fauoured, and frowned vpon the parties, for the night before they should hoise saile, such a stormy tempest tooke the Dukes Fleet, lying more remote from the Lee, that they were scattered asunder, some into Scotland, some into Denmarke, and many of them drowned. But the Seas calmed, and the wind seruing faire, the English set saile and landed at Dartmouth, whence they had shipped into France almost six moneths before.

(48) King Edward relying vpon Burgundie abroad, and thinking all friends who fawned at home, gaue himselfe daily to follow the hound and the hawke, and nightly to his court pleasures in dancing and dalliances with damfels, little minding their approach that meant to marre his mirth; for Warwicke now landed, proclaimed King Henrie, commanding all from sixteen to sixty, vpon a great penalty to take Armes against Edward Duke of York, the most vniuersall vnto Henries rightfull Crowne, and vncreditable it was, to see the consequence of them which came armed to him, who ere-while applauded & approued none but King Edward. Thus making towards London, his company daily increased, which the youthful King seemed little to regard, but verily supposing hee had now Warwicke in his trappes, wrote to Burgundie to secure the seas, lest he should escape againe into France, and to his Lords of England, to attend him in his wars; but very many neglected his command, and few or none made their repaire. Which when Edward perceiued hee was stricke into a great feare, and with his brother of Gloucester, the L. Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Scales the Queenes brother, hee hastid towards Nottingham there to determine what was to be done.

(49) In the mean while the bastard Faulconbridge in the west, and the Earle of Pembroke in Wales, curiously where proclaimed King Henrie; and to forward the matter, D. Godard preaching at Pauls Crosse declared by reading of Billes, and diuers other proofes, that King Henrie was the vndoubted and true heire vnto the English Crowne. Neither is the L. Montacute now the man that he was, who hauing mustered fixe thousand in the name of King Edward, and brought them forward almost to Nottingham, on the sodaine drew backe his forces, alleading that Edward was vngratefull, & regardlesse of his friends as himselfe said, himselfe was the example, who hauing serued him in many bloody battels, was rewarded with a verbal word Marquess, without any maintenance aral, no not so much as Pyes poor nest: & therefore hee had iust cause neuer to draw his sword in his quarrell any more, and them that did, hee asured them should receiue the like reward in the end.

(50) These with the like distastures, diuulged among the rude multitude, it was a world to see the face of this new World, for in euery street Bonfires were made, in euery Church bells rung, Diries were sung at euery meeting, and euery man cried K. Henrie, King Henrie, whose Echo likewise redoubled, & Warwicke, a Warwicke, and indeed all so applauded the passage now on foot, as King Edward hearing the rumor, thought it not safe any longer to stay, & therefore with thos trusty Lords and some others, hee fled from his host besides Nottingham, passing the Wathes towards Lynne with greater difficulties then was befitting a Prince to aduenture; and thus without any order taken for his Realme, in two hulkes of Holland, and one English shippe destitute of all necessary prouisions, set saile toward Burgundie and in the way was encountered by the Easterlings, Englands great Enemies, hauing much adoe to cleare himselfe from their surpris.

(51) In these times of misery the Queene (whose marriage was the onely cause of all these stirres) vpon the first of October had stolne out of the Tower, and taken Sanctuary at Westminster, where like a woman forsaken shee solitarily remained, and on the fourth of November following was deliuered of a sonne, which withoutall pompe more like a priuate mans child then a Prince, was there also baptized by the name of Edward, who after his fathers death, a while was King of England, as shall be said; other Sanctuaries were full of King Edwards friends, that praised deuotely for his prosperous health, and well hoped the world would againe turne, as shortly it did. One King thus fled, and the other in prison, the Kentish, whose conditions are mutable at the change of Princes, came to seeke prey in London, where they knew it was to bee had: Ratcliffe, S. Katherins, and Southwarke they robbed, and within the City did some hurt besides, yea and surely more had done, had not Earle Warwicke in good time come to the rescue which increased his name, that was great enough before.

(52) Earle Warwicke accompanied with his brother the Archbishoppe of York, the Prior of Saint Johns, the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Shrewsburie, Bastard Faulconbridge, Lord Stanley, and other Gentlemen, some for loue, some for feare, & some to gaze at this wauering world, vpon the six of October entered the Tower of London, wherein King Henrie had bene retained prisoner almost the space of nine yeeres, and there againe elected him for their lawfull King, and forthwith conuaid him robed in a long blew veluet gown through London vnto the Bishops pallace, where a pompous Court was kept vntill the thirteenth of the same moneth, vpon which day hee went in procession crowned to the Cathedral Church of S. Paul, the Earle of Warwicke bearing his traine, and the Earle of Oxford the sword, the people on euery side crying, God saue K. Henrie.

(53) Thus farre proceeded, and Henrie reestablished, a Parliament was begonne at Westminster the six & twentieth of November following, wherein King Edward was declared a Traitor to his country, an vsurper of the Crowne, and all his goods confiscated: the like iudgement passed against all his partakers; wherein also it was enacted, that all such persons as had taken Armes in his quarrell, should bee severely punished; among whom, John Typtot Earle of Worcester, and King Edwards Lieutenant in Ireland was attainted, who being found hid in the topp of a tree, in the Forrest of Waybridge, not farre from Huntingdon was brought to London, and vpon Tower-hill beheaded. Moreover, all Statutes made by King Edward were clearly reuoked, abrogated, and made frustrate: the Crowns of England and France entayled to King Henrie, and the Heyres-male lawfully begot of his body, and for the want want of such heires vnto George Duke of Clarence, and his heire males lawfully produced, and the said Duke to be the next heire to his father Richard Duke of Yorke, disabling his elder brother Edward, by the vertue of his Atteindor; and Iasper Earle of Pembroke, John Earle of Oxford with other attained by the vsurper Edward, to be reformed in bloud, dignities, and ancient possessions; and finally, Earle Warwick the good common-wealthes man, made Gouernour of the Realme in these turbulent times, vnto whom was associated George Duke of Clarence this great Earles sonne in Law, and Warwicks brother Montacute vpon his submission obtained his pardon, which was the easilier gotten for his seruice at Nottingham.

(54) Queene Margaret appointed to follow into England, if fortune did fauour these great Lords successe, now hearing of the faire Sun-shine, wherein her husband King Henry was set, amidst the stormie winter blasts which the season afforded, with Prince Edward her sonne, fell faire from France, towards that wished and temperate climat, where the spring of new Regality beganne to bud forth, but was met with such tempests and storming seas, as shee was forced to returne and deferre her iourney vntill another time, to her great griefe and fore discontent. In like perplexity was the Burgundian Duke, who neither durst giue Edward his outward assistance (the French and Warwick being so mighty opposites) nor leaue him in distresse, lest the sparkes of discontent should flie from the eyes of his faire wife, and therefore to know whether Fauelere the Gouernour of Calles stood resolute for him according to Couenants, he secretly sent Philip Comines the hony-mouth Historian, to drop some of his sweet eloquence into his gold-thirsting eare.

(55) Comines comming to Calles, and obseruing the sequence for which he was sent, saw every man wear the Earle of Warwicks badge, for no head could bee gallant that was not adorned with his ragged staffe, nor no dore frequented that was not painted with his white Crosse. Infomuch that Fauelere himselfe had a fewell in his hate, wherein was a white ragged staffe, embroidered with gold, and others his followers the like wrought in filke, gold, and siluer; and to stampe the print deeper, a iking report was brought to the towne, that Warwick had prepared foure thousand valiant men to warre vpon the frontiers of Burgundy. But Comine in conference so wrought with the Councell, and they againe with Earle Warwick as he was contented to leaue off the enterprise, Duke Charles promising to side with K. Henry.

(56) King Edward hearing what his brother of Burgundy had done, and being dayly solicited from his friends in England, thought it no policy long to delay, lest Henry should take growth to a bigger steame; and therefore repairing to his brother in the towne of Saint Paul, requiured his aide, as the onely man on whom hee relied, as well for the bond of alliance in the marriage of his sister, as also in regard of the orders which they both ware, the King that of his which was the golden Fleece; and the Duke the Garter and Robe of Saint George. In the Court of Burgundy at that time lay Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, colen-germane remoued vnto Duke Charles, a great enemy againt the house of Yorke, and now set himselfe to thwart King Edwards suite, allcading, that it was more honourable for the Duke of Burgundy to side with the Lancastrians, from whom he was defended by his Grandmother the daughter of John of Gaunt: as also in the vprightnes of King Henries title, held good in her brother, and his Grandfather, and in her Nephew his father without all exceptions.

(57) The Duke perplexed betweene these great supplicants did then, as many doe now, speake much and meane nothing lesse, or else say little, & meane to doe much. To Sommerfet for Henry hee outwardly promised all helpe and assistance, but neuer gaue the least, and to Edward no comfortable words of supply, and yet vnderhand he hired him shippes, furnished him with munition, and lent him fifty thousand Florences in money. And now the season seruing for warre, K. Edward with two thousand strong besides his Mariners made ouer for England, attempting to take land in Northfolke; but those coasts guarded, hee wasted more Northward, and entering Humber, landed at Rauesbur in Yorkshire, when laying aside all claim to the Crowne, and pretending nothing but his Dutchy of York, he shewed the rude multitude the letters, and seale of the Earle of Northumberland, which as he affirmed, & made them beleue was sent for his safe conduct to enioy the same, and in euery place where he came proclaimed King Henry himselfe, wearing an Estrich feather, which was Prince Edwards Liuerie, and passing to Yorke in no other shew then a Subject, his oath first taken to be true to King Henry, entred the City, which presently hee surprisid and assumed to himselfe.

(58) Earle Warwick now hearing that Edward was landed before he had marched very farre in the main, sent strait charge to his brother the Marquesse Montacute then residing at Ponfret (with a sufficient Army to secure those parts) that hee should not suffer his access vnto Yorke, lest he grew more potent, then was to bee wished; himselfe making ready with all possible speed, to repaire into those parts; but whether the Marquesse purposely winked, or else (and that rather) would not see at all, hee made no great hast to forslay his way to Yorke, neither fought to empeach the passage: when Edward from thence marched in a more hostile manner towards Nottingham, taking his way not farre from Ponfret, and as it were through the midst of his enemies; which encouraged many to fauour his designs, holding that Montacute was either a friend, or afraide to deale againt so powerfull an enemy.

(59) The White Rose thus bloomed, and the red falling his leafe, all tooke the time of this pleasant spring, and flocked to Edward as to their April Sun, who now more able, and therefore more bold made forward towards Leicester, where the Earles of Warwick and Oxford with a great power were, but because Clarence was absent, they let Edward hold on without any encounter, whose traines as hee passed was like to a riuer that in the running is euer encreased with new springs, which Warwick perceiving, thought it more then time to giue battell, well knowing that his brothers forbearance had giuen him that head. And to that end sent vnto Clarence then about London in leuying of men, but hee somewhat too backward, and Warwick too forward, tooke into the City Cowentry, meaning from thence to set on the enemy. But Edward whose star had now past the darke threatening cloud, pitched his tents neere vnto that City in a plaine field, and valiantly bad the Earle come to battell. But he then mistrusting (as in truth hee had cause) that the boldnesse of Edward was backed by a Clarence, kept close within the wals, with a purpose to see how the world would goe.

(60) Edward loth to looke time about one Cities siege, raised his Campe, and halted forward toward Warwick, vnto which Towne likewise his brother Clarence, with foure thousand strong was on march: these meeting vpon a plaine, three miles from the Towne, for their Battels in Aray, as if they meant to haue fought, but the King, his brother Gloucester, Lord Rivers, Hastings, and others, without any gard made towards Clarence, which when he beheld, himselfe accompanied with some of estate encountered his brother with a louing countenance and friendly cheare, so as no sparke of hatred was perceived betwixt them, but with all brotherly affections entred into amitie and peace, which afterwards proued the confusion of the Duke, Clarence thus got fought to draw Warwick into the same traine, to which end he sent certaine messengers vnto him; first to excuse his owne fact, as too vnnatural for him to vnteach his sword againt his owne brother, as also he sought to stay the effusion of English blood, which in these quarrels lay ready to be shed: His peace with Edward he promised to worke, and that with such honour as Warwick should know himselfe not only a fatherto Clarence, but likewise vnto Edward great England's King. Vnto all which motion Warwick gaue eare only with this replie, God tell your Duke (said he) that I had rather bee an Earle, and alwaies like my selfe, then a false and perieured Duke, and that ere my oath shall bee falsified (as his apparently is) I will lay downe my life as my enemies foote, which I doubt not but shall bee bought very deere.

(61) This stout resolution made Edward more warie, and therefore to obtaine London, the only key that opened the dore to the Crowne, he halted thitherward, whose Citizens hearing of the increase of his host, and saying that Henrie was but a milkesop to him, thought it most safety to saile with the fairest winde, and therefore set open their Gates, and with publike applaud cried, King Edward. Which when the Duke of Sommerfet with others left to attend the innocent King Henry, heard, they fled for their liues; and left him in the Bishops Palace at London, where his Competitor King Edward tooke him, and sent him againe prisoner to the Tower. With so many winds are the failes of their ships filled, which seeke the Port of their safety by the affections of the people: for euen the same day had Henrie bene carried through the Citie (as it were) in triumph, and had heard the shoutes of the Commons in euerie streete crying; God save King Henrie.

(62) But Earle Warwick hearing how things went in London, and now fully conceiuing that the hazard of Battell must determine either with, or againt him, being come to Saint Albans, fell into a deepe consideration what was to be done: His assistants were John Duke of Excester, the Earles of Oxford and Sommerfet, and Marquesse Montacute his brother, whom notwithstanding he did not greaitle trust, being alwaies too fauourable to the contrarie faction. Thefe in Counsell held it best pollicie to follow the Enemy, and before the bodie grew too great, to lop off the branches, lest they should shadow their Sun-shine too farre. In which resolution, they halted forward, and came vnto Barnet, with a full purpose to recouer London: but Edward well knowing the state of the City vnfurnished for siege, and readie to take stampe of any impresse, ment not to be pent within those weake wals; and therefore taking with him vnfortunate Henry, least any confederacy should be made in his absence, he marched with all possible hast, to encounter his opposites, before they came too farre, and vpon Gladmore neere vnto Barnet set downe his Tents close to the enemy, the eue of Christs resurrection, so careless is Mars of diuine celebrations, that the holiest feast is prophaned, when his sword is drawne.

(63) The next day being the Paschall whereon Christs rose from death, which with due reuerence is celebrated in all the Christian world, these English contenders for a terrestriall Crowne, with fressh hearts and hands as readie, made ready to digge each others graues: for at brake of day Warwick began to Marshall his Army, which he diuided into three battalions: The right wing was led by the Marquesse his brother, with the Earle of Oxford, consisting chiefly of horsemen, himselfe with the Duke of Excester led the left; and the maine battell was commanded by Edward Earle of Sommerfet, which was supplied for the most part with Archers. K. Edward likewise ordered his men. The forward was led by Richard Duke of Gloucester his brother, a good fouldier and sufficient for aduise, the middle by himselfe, and his brother Clarence, hauing King Henry in their companie; And the rearward was commanded by the Lord Hastings, euer most firme for the house of Yorke, referring a fresh supply, when occasion should serue.

(64) The Battels ioined; were manfully maintained by the prowess of Oxford, vpon that part of the Kings, againt which he fought, which with great violence he forced backe, so that many of them fled to London, bringing newes that with Warwick went the day: and surely in great forwardnes it was, had not fortune thwarted it by an vnexpected chance: for the day being foggy, and ouercast with mists, hindred their eies of any farre sight, so as the starre embroidered vpon the Earle of Oxford's mens Coates, were mistaken for the Sunne, which King Edwards men wore, in which error Warwick's Battell let flie at their owne fellows, who were in great forwardnes to haue wonne the day, and they not knowing the cause of the error cried, Treason, treason, we are all betraid. Whereupon the Earle of Oxford with eight hundred fled the field, leauing the chance to be cast for the Crowne; which when Warwick perceiued with words like a fouldier, he encouraged his men, and seeing the fresh supply of his enemy draw now vnto fight, he riuallie rushed into the midst of their Battell, wherein he aduentured so farre as he could not be rescued, but valiantly fighting was stricken downe, and among them slaine, hauing repaid his danger with many a wound. The Marquesse Montacute made forward to second his brother, (who till then had bene the Mars and Make-King of England) but was so ouerlaid by his Opposites, that they sent his soule likewise from his bodie whereby was ended that bloody daies taske.

(65) In this Battell vpon King Edwards part, died, the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Bourcher, the Lord Barnes, sonne and heire to the Lord Sey, and Sir John Lisle Knight: In the quarrell of Henrie died Richard Neuill Earle of Warwick, and John Neuill Marquesse Montacute his brother, and vpon both sides of common souldiers faith Hall ten thousand, Stow faith foure thousand, as Fabian farre lesse: all which were buried vpon the same Plaine; where afterwards a Chappell was built: the Duke of Excester being left for dead in the field, recouered, and tooke Sanctuary at Westminster. Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, and John Earle of Oxford escaped the field, and fled into Wales, where with Iasper Earle of Pembroke they still plotted to set vp King Henry, whom God and destinie would haue to be cast downe.

(66) The same King Edward vpon the same day as an absolute Conquerour, lead the vnfortunate Henry his Captiue to London, and entering the City in triumph wile, offered his roiall Stander in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, whither the slaine bodies of Warwick and Montacute in two Coffins were brought, and lay there bare faced, and vnburied the space of three daies, least a false Brute should be made that they were not dead. After which they were conueied to Bilsam Abbey, and interred in that Priorie among their Ancestors.

(67) Edwards affaires thus farre prospered at London, the windes that had crossed Queene Margaret before, came fauourably about to fill her Sailes for England, & indeed to accomplish the decree, which heauen had appointed: shee with her sonne Prince Edward and their French followers, landed vpon Easter eue at Weymouth, and the Countesse of Warwick at Portsmouth, who hearing the sorrowfull newes of her husbands death, tooke Sanctuary within the Abbey of Beaulieu. And Queene Margaret vnderstanding of the losse of Barnet field, withdrew aside to the Abbey of Cerne, vnto whom presently reformed Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, with Lord John his brother, John Courtney Earle of Denbshire, Iasper Earle of Pembroke, John Lord Wenlock, and John Langbrother Prior of Saint Johns.

assistance to erect Prince Edward her sonne, though it were done with the losse of their own liues, requiring her only to undertake the authority of the war, and themselves would vndergo the charge and burden thereof, by whose valor and power, they doubted not to daunt the pride of the usurping Edwards, who now held himselfe sure, and beganne to grow carelesse. To these their resolutions the warlike Queene most gladly consented, and gaue all encouragements vnto them: the which could, when falling in counsell how to proceed, her care (according to the naturall affection of a mother) was most vpon the safety and life of her sonne: and therefore aswell for their owne parts (if fortune should faile in this their first attempt) as for the feare which the Yorkist would possesse (who whiles Prince Edward his coriualli liued could not account the Diadem his Bride) shee thought it best to send him backe againe into France, till God had set the Crowne where it should stand: where hee might supply them with new forces, or at leastwise ouerawe Edward for tyrannizing too farre. But the Lords contrariwise alladged, that Prince Edward being the morning Sunne of the Lancastrians hopes, and the rayes very plendent to most English eyes, was to be present in field himselfe, whose fight would both heat the courage of his owne Souldiers, and attract the glance of his aduersaries hearts, either to fight faintly, or else, and that rather, to come to his side. Thus their counsell at that time preuailed, and thus resolu'd, every man departed to make ready his power, the Queene with her French repaireing to Bath.

(69) But Edward in London had not sate two daies in rest, before hee heard of Queene Margarets arri- uage, and the confluence of people out of Cornwall, Devonshire, and of the Westerne parts, which hourly flew to giue her assistance; wherefore committing to the Tower King Henry, and George Archbi- shoppe of York to a selecte company, he marched to meet them, intending to cut off many springs before they should ioine to the body of a riuer, whose streame without danger could not be passed: therefore from Windsor, Abington, Chichester, and Malmesbury hee proceeded; seeking and vrging his enemies to battell: but the Queene and her forces fearing to abide in Bath, removed to Bristol, Berkeley, and Gloucester, and lastly at Tewkesbury, Duke Sommerfet her Generall pitched down his Tents not staying the coming of the Earle of Pembroke: his battell he marshalled into three fights, whereof him- selfe and his brother John Lord Sommerfet lead the foreward; the middle Battalion was commanded by Edward the young Prince, vnder the conduct of the Lords Saint Iohn and Wenlocke, and the Rere- ward gouerned by John Courtney Earle of Devonshire, a mortall enemy against the house of York.

(70) King Edward who was come now within sight of his enemies, diuided likewise his Army into 3. Battalions, committing the Foreward vnto the guidance of his brother Richard D. of Gloucester a good Souldier, and of a deeper reach and policy: the Main hee vnderooke to gouerne himselfe, and the Rere- ward was commanded by the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine. The field thus marshalled, and the signe of battell being giuen, a most bloody fight be- ganne, the King had planted his Ordinance at most advantage, which Gloucester frankly bestowed among the Dukes men, and they lodged betwixt ditches, bushes and hedges, with their showers of arrowes galled Gloucesters followers, so as by his command his battell gaue backe, as though they would shrinke, which Sommerfet no sooner perceived, but that he came on, and ouercome with courage, came out of his strength, when by a certaine passage before hand provided, he came vnto the place where King Edward was embattelled, thinking verily that Wenlocke had followed at his backe, who as it seemed meant nothing lesse.

(71) The aduantage espied, Duke Richard made good his retreat, and with fresh supplies of two hun- dred speares so charged Sommerfet, as his battell was disordered, and put to fearefull flight, himselfe re- couering the Middle-ward, found there the L. Wenlocke idle, whilest others were thus working for their liues, whom he most opprobriously reuiled in the termes of a Traitor, & with his Battell-axe stroke his brains out of his head, when presently Gloucester, and after him the King entered the Trench, wherein all of the Queenes part went to wracke; for there were slaine in this battell on her side John L. Sommerfet, John Courtney Earle of Devonshire, the Lord Wenlocke in manner as wee haue said, Sir John Deluys, Sir Edward Hampden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir John Lewkenor, with three thousand others besides.

(72) Among them that fled, Prince Edward was one, whome Sir Richard Crofts apprehended be- fore hee got to Tewkesbury, but Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, John Longstrother, Prior of Saint Iohns, many Knights and Elquiers tooke Sanctuary in the Abbey, and other places of the Towne, notwithstanding they were taken forth and arraigned before Richard Duke of Gloucester, who that day late Con- stable of England, where they were condemned and had iudgement of death, which they immediatlie suffered vpon a Scaffold set vp in the Town. With these two Lords died twelue worthy Knights, be- sides others of inferior degrees.

(73) Then was Proclamation made for the ap- prehension of Prince Edward, promising to his taker an annuities of an hundred pounds during his life, & if the Prince were liuing, his life to be spared, vpon which promises Sir Richard Crofts presented young Edward vnto the King, whom with a stern counte- nance hee while beheld, and as sternely demanded, how he durst so presumptuously with Banner dis- played enter into his Realme; wherunto the Prince made this reply; to recouer (said hee) my fathers Kingdomes and his most rightfull inheritance posses- sed by his Father and Grandfather, and from him immediately belonging vnto me; how darrest thou then which art his Subiect display thy colour against him thy Liege-Lord? which answere moued King Edward so much, as with his Gantlet hee dashed the Prince on his mouth, whom Richard Duke of Gloucester with others of the Kings seruants most shamefully murdered, euen in his presence, and at his feete: whose body was buried without all solemnity a- mong other poore and meane persons, in the church of the Monastery of the Blacke-Fryers in Tewkes- bury.

(74) Queene Margaret in this fatall day of bat- tell fled towards Worcester, and by the way tooke in- to a poore religious house in that her present dis- tresse: but three dayes after shee was apprehended and brought vnto Worcester to King Edward, who committed her to sure and strait keeping, in which City she a while remained. But sodain news brought him, that the Northern men were in Armes, and meant to aduenture for her liberty, the Conquerour marched to Coventrie, and there made preparation further to proceed: which when these hope spirits perfectly vnderstood, their courages grew colder, & their weapons cast away, they came thronging to Edward to offer him subiection; yet the Lancastri- ans were not so minded, but rather intended once more to trie whether fortune would afford them her smile.

(75) A fitte instrument they had to forward the enterprise, namely Thomas Nevill bastard Faucon- bridge sonne of Lord Fauconbridge Earle of Kent, a great supporter of King Edwards Crowne: howbeit this Bastard being a man of a turbulent spirit, and forward for action, Earle Warwick had made him his Admirall to keepe the narrow seas, that none should haue way to strengthen King Edward, which his office he executed beyond his Commis- sion, and became a taker of all Merchants goods, being aided with 300. (76) His enterprise desperate, and his name growne fearefull at sea, hee meant to make it no lesse on the land; for putting in at Dover, many mil- gouerned and loofe persons daily drew to him, so as his power grew to bee seuentene thousand strong: with these through Kent he made his way towards London, meaning to doe much, the land so molested with intestine warres; and lodging his hoast on the Southside of London, commanded the Citizens to giue him access, that with King Henry (whom hee meant to release from the Tower) he might passe through their streets, to meet and encounter the usurping Edward. But the Londoners knowing the rudeness of these Rakehels kept their gates shut and garded the same with sufficient strengthes: whence some Lords of the royall bloud therein residing, sent vnto Edward of their present danger, who presently sent them fiftene hundred of his best Souldiers, after whom in person hee warily marched, leading with him his prisoner Queene Margaret, whose bounds hee well knew, gaue him the full scope of liberty.

(77) Fauconbridge in the meane while thirsting after spoile with his shippes secured the Thames at a- boue S. Kathermes, purposing with his land Forces to passe the Riuer at Kingston: but hearing that Ed- ward was on his March, and fearing to bee cut off from the benefite of his shippes, hee altered his mind; when to open his way into London, hee caused the Bridge to bee fiered, and three thousand of his men being fet out of Thames by his shippes, diuided them- selves into two Companies, the one assaying to en- ter at Algate, and the other at Bishopsgate, both which they likewise fet on fire, so that the Citie was in three places fiered and assaulted at once, but with such euill successe to the assailants, that seuen hundred were slaine, and the bold Bastard driuen to his shippes.

(78) Vpon the twentieth of May the Conque- rour Edward with his Capriue Queen Margaret en- tred London, and so into the Tower, the one in pomp commanding the place at his pleasure, the other in teares to remaine a most peniue prisoner, where her husband, the downcast King Henry was kept in hard durance. The place being thus charged with the presence of two Kings and their Queens: the Croke- backe of Gloucester intended to cleare by taking him a- way, that stood in his brothers way, whose succesor as is thought hee then meant to bee; and making his inward mind more deformed then were his outward lineaments, without regard of bloud-defiled hands, stabbed the most innocent Henry to the heart with his dagger, in which act at once beganne the ones happy rest, and the others foule guilt, which accom- panied his conscience to the day of his death.

(79) The body of this murdered King was vp- on the Affention Eue laide in an open Coffin, and from the Tower guarded with many bills and glaues, was so carryed through the streets vnto the Cathed- rall Church of Saint Paul, where it rested vnconce- red one day, and beganne to bleed againe afresh, a sorrowfull spectacle to most of the beholders, and thence was it carried to the Blacke-Fryers Church, where it likewise lay bare faced, and bled as before, all men being amazed at the sorrowfull sight, and lastly, it was put in a boat without Priest, Clerke, Torch or Taper, singing or saying, and was ferried vnto the Abbey of Chertsey in Surrey, and there with- out pompe entred. But afterwards King Henry the seuenth translated his body vnto his Castle of Windsor, where in a new Tombe at the entrance in- to the Chancell of the Chappell, and fourth dore of the Quier, it was princely bestowed, but since the Tombe is removed, and where the Corps is now laid is not vulgarly knowne.

(80) Thus liued and thus dyed this innocent and iust King, who had bene proclaimed in his Cradle, crowned in his Infancy, and againe at more age had the Emperiall Diadem of France set on his head, li-

uing vprightly, louing his Subiects, and raining thirty eight yeeres, was in that time toiled with va- riable successe, for twice hee was imprisoned, and de- priued of his Crowne, betrayed, smitten, and wound- ed, and in all things became a worthy example of fortunes vncertainty: hee was of stature very seem- ly, of body slender, of face beautiful, and by a natu- rall inclination abhorred all vice, farre from pride, giuent to prayer, well read in the Scriptures, vifing works of Charity, and so chaste, as no suspection of incontinency could be conceived in him: nay, so farre to the contrary, that when certain Ladies pre- sented themselves before him in a maske, with their haire loose, and their breasts vncovered (hee then a Bachelour, and able of marriage) hee immediatly rose vp, and departed the presence, saying, sic, sic, forsooth yee are to blame. Oath hee vied none, but in weighty matters, his affirmation was forsooth, and forsooth, very mercifull to the poore, and so pittifull to Malefactors, as he commanded the quar- ters of Traitors to be taken downe from the Gates, and buried, and so farre from reuenge, that hee wil- lingly pardoned the greatest offences against him; for a Russian intending his death, wounded him in the side with his sword, what time he lay prisoner in the Tower, and being referred to his kingly estate, he freely forgave the fact; and another like Rus- sian striking him on the face, hee punished with this onely reprehension, forsooth you are to blame to strike mee your Anointed King: for these and his other pa- tient vertues, King Henry the 7. assayed to haue him canonized a Saint: but Pope Julius the 2. deman- ding too great a summe, the King went no further in the suite: notwithstanding in the repute of the vul- gar hee was taken for no lesse, so as his red hat which hee had worn, healed the head-ach, when it was put on, as the fable beleueed.

(81) The monument of his zeale to true piety, and care for posterities, are his famous Colledges of Eaton and Cambridge, the Chappell of which last, shewes the magnificence that the whole should haue bene of, had their Founder reigned to haue finished them himselfe: for the performance whereof hee enfeofed certain Bishops with other noble per- sonages by his letters Patents with lands and posses- sions, to the yearly value of thirty foure hundred pounds very neere: but as his life ended, before that nature had thereunto set her owne seale, so these re- main vnperfected of the excellent beauties intended, which their zealous Founder meant to haue adorned them withall.

(82) And his sorrowfull Queene Margaret, who twentie sixe yeeres before this his death, with all pompe and royalty had bene crowned Queene of England, and had ruled all in all, now a poore Pri- soner in distresse and wants, weates out her time in teares and laments, and witheth for nothing more then the day of her death; which Duke Reimer her Father well vnderstanding, made suite to King Ed- ward to haue her released by ransom; and lastly, bought her liberty at so deare a rate, as hee first paw- ned, and afterward sold to Lewis the French King, the Kingdomes of Naples, and of both the Sicilies to pay and repay the price of her redemption, vnto which poore father, this sorrowfull daughter return- ed, and ended her aged dayes, where shee had be- gun the dayes of her life.

(83) Victorious Edward thus leading Mars chained to his Chariot, and now himselfe led by Fortune to the high chaire of Estate, sits an absolute Monarch sure, and without opposit, vnto whose rayes all eyes turne a submissiue aspect: onely bas- tard Fauconbridge departed, from London (as we haue said) and withdrew vnto Sandwich with his disquiet crew, made shew to doe much, and did somewhat more then besting, by rape, and robbing, where those rude Mariners came, which Edward hearing of, hastened to Canterbury in person himselfe, fully re- solued to weede vp by the rootes those new sprow- ted ted blades of rebellion, and made great preparation to accomplish the fame, which the Barthelemy hearing (though strong in his Sea-men) durst not bandy against, but sent his submission with proffer of seruice and loial obedience, and indeed fo temporized with the king, as besides his pardon obtained, the sword of knight hood was laid vpon his shoulder, & he was presently made the Kings Vice-Admirall for the Seas. In which his office he bore himselfe (either by his owne desert, or the Kings Conceit) as he not long enioied the fame, but was at Southampton beheaded, and other of King Henries old fauourites likewise fought after and daily endangered.

(84) In which times of feare, Iaffer Earle of Pembroke, with his Nephew young Henry Earle of Richmond, fled into Britaine, where, of that Duke they were most courtously entertained, with assurance made, that no wrong should be offered them, during their stay in his dominions. And so these two Earles the vnkle and nephew, there attended the day of their wished successe.

(85) But John Earle of Oxford, who had withdrawn himselfe from Barnefield first into Wales, and thence into France, was farre more vnpatient of those rough times, for hauing gotten store of prouision by strong hand at Sea, with leauentie seuen men only surprized Saint Michaels Mount in Cornewall, and made that peece good against the King, which he kept and reitualed, but whether by force or fauour King Edward much suspected, and therefore the more willingly came to a composition with his Subiect, who vpon the pardon of his life deliuered the Mount to the King: and as some say the rather, for that his minde was then troubled with many ominous signes. For certaine Boornes about this time burst out of the Earth, as Voe-mere at Market in the County of Bedford, whose name carried the quality of his nature. In Kent, at Canterburie, Lewisham, and Langley Parke, at Croyden in Surrey, and at Hungershill neere Dudley Castle one running verie foole: all of them predictions, as that credulous age beleueed, of great troubles to come: and therefore not trusting a new reconciled enemy, King Henrie sent the said Earle Prisoner vnto the Castle of Hames in Normandy, where he remained the space of twelue yeeres, during the raigne of the King, most securely guarded, and so straitly kept, as Lady Margaret his Countesse could not be suffered to haue access vnto him, in all that time. Neither was there allowed any thing out of his reuenues, or from the king, to maintaine her estate, but was forced to liue vpon the Charity of others, & by the workes that shee made with her Needles both of them very thore to supply her great wants. This vnmisericfull and almost inhumane vlage, was the more extremely followed, for that Oxford himselfe, his father and brother, had euer sided with the Lancastrians. And herselfe being sister vnto Richard Duke of Warwick, the Capitall obstacle against King Edwards proceedings, was held either dangerous, if her wealth ballanced her birth and estate, or else vnworthy of his fauour, whose good fortunes as was suggested, shee euer maligned.

(86) But much more miserable was the estate of Lord Henry Holland, Duke of Excester, and Earle of Huntingdon, who flourished so long, as King Henries pillar stood crowned on his base, and the Lancastrians (of whose house himselfe was) ouerwaied the times; he being the sonne of Lady Elizabeth the second daughter of John of Gaunt, and hauing married the sister of Edward the then reigning King, was notwithstanding driuen to such want, as he may serue an example to all, how vnertaine Adams sons are of any continuing greatnes. For (saith Philip Comines) I once saw the Duke of Excester runne on foote bare legged, after the Duke of Burgundies traine, begging his bread for Gods sake, but he uttered not his name, he being the neere of the house of Lancaster, and brother in law vnto King Edward, and being knowne what he was,

Burgundy gave him a small pension to maintaine his estate.

(87) But when King Henrie was againe restored, & the Title of the Crowne laid vpon the successe of Barnefield, this man Lord Henrie bare himselfe most brauely against King Edward, and in fight was stricke downe, and left for dead, where, in his bleeding woundes he lay most part of the day, but yet recouering, and got to Westminster, he theretooke Sanctuary to saue his life, for which, he became Suiter vnto the king, but his wife Lady Anne sister vnto King Edward, sued as earnestly for a diuorce, which with great instancy shee lastly obtained against him. How he released himselfe from the wrath of the king, is vnertaine, and how he came by his death no man can tell, for his body was found cast vpon the shoare of Kent, as though he had perished by shipwracke vpon the Sea.

(88) Now Edward to finish all factions, thought best to lop off both bough and branch, that gaue any shadow to the Lancastrians designs, to which end he rather picked, then found occasion of treason, in George Nevill Archbishop of Yorke, whose goods, lands, and Lordships, he seized vpon, got possession of his rich plate and Jewels, whereof one in his Miter was of such value, as the King caused it to be set in his Imperiall Crowne, and the Archbishop to be sent ouer Sea to the Castle of Hames, where he remained a Prisoner a long time after, with no such curious intertainment, as himselfe had vied to Edward when he was Prisoner.

(89) But the escape of Pembroke and Earle Richmond troubled the King not a little, the onely men now left to bandy against them, and therefore were most followed with a suspitious eye. In so much as Edward wrote vnto the Duke of Britaine their receiver, with promises of heapes of gold to haue them sent backe and deliuered vnto his hands: but the Duke that had giuen them his safetie before, answered the English Ambassadors, that it stood not with honour, so to betray these distressed Princes, fled to him for relief, yet he faithfully undertook, that they should be so followed, as King Edward should sleepe quiet from their molestations, which being no better, Edward notwithstanding made the best of it.

(90) All now in quiet, and Edward reigning without any Competitor, or malignant disturber, caused a high Court of Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, wherein he reestablished those Acts, which Henrie had abrogated, and abrogated those that were made against his fauourites; at which season the Duke of Burgundie sent his Ambassadors vnto Edward, crauing his aide against the French King, which was the more willingly heard and granted, as well for his fauours received of the Duke, in time of his necessitie, as for spleene against Lewis, who had aided Warwick to dispossesse him of his Crowne. And indeed this was a sparke, that was likely to set the hearts of the English on fire, to recouer France lost by Henrie the last King.

(91) All things in a readinesse King Edward repaired to Dover, and there embarked himselfe for Calles, with the greatest Army that euer from England set sailes into France: for he had in his Company fifteen hundred Noble-men, and men at Armes, all of them mounted, and most of them barbed, who with the Archers on horsebacke also made vp the number of fifteene thousand, besides a great number of footemen and others to pitch Tents, attend the Artillerie, and inclose their Campes. Before the Kings departure from England, he had sent Garter King at Armes vnto King Lewis with a letter of defiance: whose contents demanded no lesse, then the whole Realme of France, which if he refused, hee threatened to inuade his dominions with fire and sword.

(92) The letter received, and read in secret by Lewis himselfe, he priuately sent for, and conferred with with the Herald, telling him that it was not Edward, but Burgundy that raked abroad these dying finders, who as a man discomfited & vnfurnished for warre, would draw in the English, by his sle dealings, to their inestimable Charges, to supply his defects, that Burgundy being of the house of Lancaster hated most deadly the family of Yorke; and more for feare then loue married Edwards sister. As touching the Constable he told him, though Edward had married his Niece, yet hee would deceiue him, as he had done his owne Master of France, who had heaped manie and extraordinary benefites vpon him. And lastly with the gift of three hundred Crownes, and the promise of a thousand more, he intiguated the Herald to worke a peece. Garter very thankfull tooke the French gold, and counselled Lewis to send a Herald vnto his Master King Edward to demand a safe-conduct for conference: and so openly rewarded with thirtie Elles of Crimfon-veluet he departed.

(93) King Lewis nothing so pompous as other Princes are, nor attended with Heralds continually in his Court, was therefore inforced vnto this present shift: he caused a seruant of the Lord Hales to be arried like an herald in a trumpets banner, and sent him in halt into King Edwards Camp; where hauing audience, he shewed the great desire the King his Master had of peace, whose amity with England he had euer held, excusing his recit of Warwick with the necessity of time, whom he aided not against Edward, but against Burgundy, who as he instantly alleged, had now drawne the English to this excessive charges, that he might thereby conclude a better composition for himselfe, and to amend the broken state of his owne affaires; lastly he desired that the King of England would grant a safe-conduct vnto the Ambassadors of the French King his Master, who should more fully informe his Maestie, and giue his safe-conduct for a further conference in these affaires: and so wisely this counterfeited worded his message, that the King and Nobles liked well the ouerture, and thereupon granting a safe-conduct sent with him an English Herald, to receive the like and other assignements from the French King.

(94) But when the Duke of Burgundy vnderstood that a peece was traueled betwixt Edward & Lewis, he stormed not a little, and with no small hast from Lutzenburgh accompanied with fixteene horse only, came to his brother King Edward, and in a great rage reproued him of breach of promise, and vn-courteous requital of his former kindnes, that thus would enter amity with his great foe, and in outward semblance more ready to bite then to barke, burst into these reproofes.

"Hauce you (quoth hee) brother, passed the Seas, entered France, and without killing of a poore fle, or burning of a silly Sheepeote taken a shamefull truce? Oh S. George I did Edward your noble Ancestor euer make Armie into France, and returned without battell or Conquest? That victorious Prince King Henry the fifth (as neere of kinne vnto you as me) whose blood you haue either rightfullie or wrongfullie (God knoweth) extinguished and destroyed, with a small puissance conquered Normandy, kept it, and neuer would come to composition, till he had the whole kingdome of France offered him, and was made heire apparant vnto that Crowne. Contrariwise you without any thing done, proffer of battell, or gaine of honor haue now condicened vnto a peece as profitable for England as is a poore peacock: haue I (thinke you) for my particular vle drawne the English forces into France (which am able of my selfe to defend mine owne cause?) I tell you plainly no, but rather to aid you, to recouer your ancient Territories wrongfullie withholden: and that you shall well know I need not your aide, I will heare of no truce with the French, till three monthes after your arri- uage in England at the least; And thereupon "furiously arising, he threw downe the Chaire, wherein he had late and offered to depart.

(95) "Nay stay brother Charles (quoth K. Edward) sithe I with patience haue heard you speake what you would, you shall now perforce heare from me what you would not: First therefore for my thus entrance into France, no man knoweth the occasion better then your selfe: for, mauger your owne great power you speake of, you doe remember I know, how the French King tooke from you the faire Towne Amiens, and the strong Pile Saint Quintins, with diuers other peeces which you neither durst, nor were able either to recue or defend, since which time he hath gotten from you, your best some friends and secret Counsellors, so as your selfe stood in doubt (determining to besiege Nuffe) whether the losse would be greater in your absence (the French King waiting as a fox for his pray) or gaine more in Germany by your power and presence: and to keepe this wolfe from your fold, was the principall cause why you so earnestly praised me, and continually sollicit me to passe ouer the Seas, promising mountaines, but performing not a Mole-hill, bragging a supply both of horse and foote, but neuer sent me a hoofe, nor a lackie. Thinke you (brother) if wee had entred this enterprise in our owne quarrell, we would haue expected your aide? I assure you nothing lesse, for if we had intended any such Conquest, we would with Souldiers fire and sword, haue so infected the aire with the flames and staine of France, as should haue annoied your Countreys of Flaunders and Brabant, and giuen you leasure to sit still and tell of our euer atchieued great victories, nothing doubting but to haue gotten and kept with like manhood, and in as great glorie, as any of our Ancestors before vs had done. But the occasion of warre being yours, and you wilfully (I will not say cowardly) neglecting the same, I meane not to prosecute, for the French King neuer offended me nor my Subiects, except in fauouring Warwick against me, nay I may say against you, and now offereth such honorable ouertures of peece, which I by Gods grace meane not to forsake, but will obserue and keepe. God send you ioy thereof, quoth the Duke, and so abruptly departed from the King.

(96) The peece thus resolved vpon, betwixt the two kings of England and France, the place appointed for conference was neere vnto Amiens, and the parties assigned for the French, were the Barthelemy of Bourbon Admirall of France, the Lord S. Pierre, and the Bishop of Eureux. For the English, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. These meeting, presentlie fell to a conclusion of peece: the conditions whereof were: That the French King should forthwith pay to the King of England twenty two thousand Crownes. That the Dauphin should marrie Lady Elizabeth, King Edwards eldest daughter, and that shee should haue for her maintenance the Duchy of Guienne, or else fifty thousand Crownes yeerely to be paid in the Tower of London, for nine yeeres space. This peece was so acceptable to King Lewis, as he sent fixteene thousand Crownes to bee distributed amongst the English Souldiers, with plate and great presents to men of any sort: & indeed gaue them such entertainment in Amiens as was most bounteous, whereof if any desire further to know, let him read Comines vpon the same tect.

(97) To graft which peece with a louing beginning, the two Kings were desirous to see each others, for which end Commissioners were sent to assigne the place: and lastly agreed, that the Towne Picquigny about three leagues from Amiens, seated in a bottom, through which the Riuer Some ranne, was the fittest: ouer which a strong bridge was built, and in the midst thereof, a grate made ouer-thwart with barres, no wider asunder then a man might well thrust thrust in his Arme, couered with boords ouer head to auoid the raine, & the bridge so broad that twelue might stand in a rancke on both sides.

(98) The day approached, and the two Kings came to the place, hee of France came first to the Grate, accompanied with twelue personages, as was the appointment, wherof Iohn Duke of Bourbon and the Cardinall his brother were the chiefe: King Edward entring the bridge on the other end, with his brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Chancellor, himselfe apparelled all in cloth of gold, with a rich Jewell of precious stones, in forme of a Flower de Luce: aduanced forward, and within fise foote of the Grate, put off his cap, and bowed his knee within halfe a foote to the ground. King Lewis as readily doing his likely reuerence vnto Edward. Whereafter embracements through the Grate, the Chancellour of England who was Prelate and Bishop of Ely, made an eloquent and learned Oration, which done, he read the Articles of peace and demanded the Kings whether these were done with their full contents. Which granted by both: either of them laying their one hand vpon the Missall, and the other vpon the Holy-Crosse, tooke their solemne Oathes to obserue the same. And then falling into a more familiar and Courtly Complementall conference, King Lewis told K. Edward that he would one day inuite him to Paris, there to Court his faire French Ladies, with whom if hee committed any sinne, he merrily told him, that Cardinall Bourbon, should be his Confessor, whose penance would be the easier, for that Bourbon vied to buse faire Ladies himselfe, which no sooner was spoken, or howsoeuer meant, but Edward was as forward of thanks and acceptance, and indeed so ready, that King Lewis rounding Commines his bosome seruant in his care, told him flatly he liked not Edward forwardnes to Paris, too many English Princes hauing beene there before: and thus the conference ended, and king Edward busines in France, hee returned into England, and into the City of London was receiued little lesse then in triumph-wile.

(99) But though Edward fortunes thus outwardly flourished, yet inward feares nipped his still troubled mind, one branch hauing apper, whose growth hee much feared would shadow his Crowne, which was Henry Earle of Richmond, aliue and at liberty in the Duke of Brittaines Court. To bring therefore his purpose to passe, hee sent D. Stillington and others, Ambassadors vnto Frances Duke of Britaine, with store of gold and good words, as that hee meant to match his eldest daughter Lady Elizabeth vnto the young Earle of Richmond, whereby all cause of dissentions might at once be cut off: the Duke thinking no danger where the water went smooth, easily consented to shippe him theron; but ere the prey was embarked, hee had knowledge that the voyage should cost young Henry his life; wherefore in all haste hee sent his Treasurer Peter Landoy to prevent it, who secretly told Richmond what marriage Edward intended; whereat the distressed Earle amazed, was put to his shifts, and for want of better, tooke Sanctuary at S. Malos, where the English his conductors lay for a wind.

(100) The Earle thus escaped, the Ambassadors complained to the Duke, imputing the fault as far as they durst vnto him, who had not dealt like a good Marchant to take their money, and to retain the wares; his answer was, the deliuey was good, but therelies negligent Factors, that made not the commoditie to their best aduantage. And yet for the loue hee bare to their King, hee vndertooke that Richmond should be sure kept either in Sanctuary, or else in prison, whence as hee promised he should not escape: And so with a flea in their care, they returned, hauing cleared Edward of his money, and care for sure keeping of Henry, who though hee were fore displeased with Stillingtons simplicitie; yet the promises that the Duke of Britaine had made, much mitigated and eased his mind.

(101) And now the Realme quiet, no warre in hand, nor nonerowards (but such as no man looked should happen) hee framed himselfe so to the peoples affections, and held their hearts not in a constrained feare, but with as louing and ready obedience as any King attaining the Crowne by his sword euer had. Nor was euer any Prince more familiar with his Subiects then this King Edward was, who now hauing his tribute truly paid from France, and all things prospering as was desired, he set heart vpon pleasure, which hetherto had beene afflicted with continuall turmoile: yea and often laid from him the state of a Prince, and would accompany and conuerse with his meane subiects: a loadstone that doth naturally attract the English hearts; among many others we of London remember this to our grace. Vnto Windfore he sent for the Lord Maior of London, the Aldermen and others, vpon no other occasion, then to hunt in his company, and himselfe to be merry with them: As also at another time hee did the like in Walham, where hee gaue them most familiar intertainment, and sent to the Lady Mairelle and her sisters two harts, sixe Buckes, and a Tunne of wine, which wanne more loue then manifold their worthes.

(102) Somewhat he was giuen to Court and conuerse with faire Ladies, which fault was well noted and preuented by King Lewis, for his French dames: but in England hee had liberty with very large scope, for besides the Lady Lucy and others, by whom hee had issue, three concubines he kept, and those of three diuers, and feuerall dispositions, as himselfe would often confesse, one the merriest, another the wildest, and the third the holiest harlot in his realme, as one whom no man could get out of the Church vnlesse it were to his Bed, the merriest was Shores wife, of whom hereafter we shall speake, the other two were greater Personages, but in their humilitey are content to bee namelesse, and to forbeare the praise of those properties.

(103) This fault of the King did not greatly offend the people: for one mans pleasure could not extend to the displeasures of manie, it being done without violence, and in his latter daies lessened and well left. But a farre more greater sinne and reproach hee fell into, among his other Princely diffports: For being on progresse in Warwicke-shire, and hunting in Arrow Parke, belonging to Thomas Burdet Esquire, with the death of much Game hee flew a White Bucke greatly esteemed of the said Burdet, who vnderstanding thereof, withed his hornes in his Belly, that moued the King to kill the same Bucke, whereof hee was accused and condemned of treason, his wordes being drawne, to with the hornes in the Kings bellie: for which beheaded hee was at Tilborne, and buried in the Gray-Fryers Church at London.

(104) But a more lamentable tragedie happened vnto the land, by the death of George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, who being accused of high Treason, was committed to the Tower, where hee soone after ended his life. His attainer was, that the said Duke had caused diuerse of his seruants to enforme the people, that Thomas Burdet his seruant likewise, was wrongfully put to death: and further laboured (through their reports) to make the world beleue, that K. Edward wrought by Nigromantie, and vied to poison such subiects as he hated: And also that the said Duke vpon purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the Regall dignitie, most falsely and vntruly published that the King was a Bastard, and therefore not capable of raigne. Moreover that hee induced diuerse of the Kings naturall subiects to be sworn vpon the blessed Sacrament, vnto him and his heires, without any other reservations of their allegiance: for which intent (as there was alleaged) hee had gotten an exemplification vnder the great Seale of King Henry the sixt, that if the said king and his sonne Prince Edward died without issue male, the said Duke and his heires should inioy the Crowne: For these in a Parliament begun at Westminster the fiftenth of January he was attainted of high treason: but whether guiltie or guiltles, so men (saith Grafton) that haue made large inquisition, yea and of such auerue of no small authority in those daies, the certaintie thereof was hid, and could not truly be discleied, but by coniectures, which as often deceiue the imaginati- ons of fantasticall folke, as declare truth to them in their conclusions.

(105) I am not ignorant that some haue allenged the cause of this Noble mans death to arise from a foolish propheticke (wherof saith Comines) the Englishmen are neuer unfurnished, & this as the Cabalists, who vied to make an art of their letters, gaue forth forth sooth that a G. should raigne after an E. which must needs be George Duke of Clarence, though Gloucester more craftie lay in winde for the game. This indeed troubled the King not a little, but the Queene and her blood much more, and therefore of both King and Queene Duke George was mistrusted, and greatly maligne in all that hee did. Who now a widower (for Warwicke daughter was dead) sent vnto his sister Margaret the Dutchesse of Burgundie, to worke a marriage for him with her husbands daughter the Lady Marie. Against which the Queene most earnestly interposed herselfe, and sollicit the Ladie in the behalfe of Lord Anthony Earle Rivers her brother, whereby great discontent was ministred to the Duke, and new ieaalousies daily bred in the Kings breast.

(106) Iohn Serres the French Historian interlacing the life of King Lewis with the Acts of K. Edward and his brethren, saith confidently, that the English King so much affected the league and alliance with France, as that hee caused his brother Clarence to be put in prison, because hee intended to haue past the Seas to succour the Dowager of Burgundie Ladie Margaret his sister, vpon whole Territories King Lewis encroached, after the death of Duke Charles her husband slaine at the battell of Mancy.

(107) But howsoeuer Clarence had offended, certaine it is, that he was found guilty by the foresaid Parliament, and the eleuenth of March following, after hee had offered his Masse-penny in the Tower of London, was drowned in a But of Malmesbury, whose body was buried at Tenkesburie in Gloucestershire, by the bodie of his Dutchesse Ladie Isabell Countesse of Warwicke, who being with Child, died of poison a little before. And although the King had consented to his death, yet no sooner was it done, but that hee wished it againe vndone, and was so greued at the remembrance, as when anie made suite for the life of a condemned, hee would openly say: Oh unfortunate brother, for whose life no man would make suite. This good Duke (for so was hee called) left issue behind him, Edward Earle of Warwicke and Margaret afterwards Countesse of Salisbury, both of them infants, and followers of their fathers fortunes: hee a continuall Prisoner, at foure and twentie yeeres of age vnder Henry the seauenth, was beheaded vpon the Tower-hill; and shee at sixtie two, lost hers within the Tower, and time of King Henric the eight.

(108) But how dainty soeuer King Edward was of the breach of amitie, betwixt him and the French King, in regard wherof hee suffered Mary the yong Dutchesse of Burgundie the daughter of his owne sisters husband to be molested by intrusion of the French, and all in fauour of the contract commenced betweene the Daulphin & Lady Elizabeth his daughter, yet did Lewis for his part but dally and driue out time: For Ambassadors implored for the full accomplishing thereof, they of France came either without commission, or those recalled, the new were sent without instructions, while indeed Lewis was working for his sonne another way: First to match him with Mary Dutches of Burgundy, but that refused, with Margaret of Flaunders daughter to Duke Maximilian sonne to Fredericke the Emperor: and to hold the world from suspition, in the meane while Ladie Elizabeth the Infanta of England was in the French Court vually called Madame the Daulphin, and all things in France so foundly carried, as Edward suspected no leake in the Caske: for now growne fat and vnable for paines, hee both gloried in his nine famous victories at home achieved, and seemed sufficientie satisfied, that his yeerely tribute from France was so truly paid.

(109) At the same time James the third of that name King of Scotland, sent his Ambassadors vnto Edward to obtaine the Lady Cicely the Kings second daughter to be joined in marriage with his sonne James the yong Prince, which was well listened vnto, by Edward and his Counsell, and least the motion should goe backe, a great summe of money lent to the Scottish King with this condition, that at a certain time appointed, it should be at K. Edwards choise, whether his daughter should match with that Prince, or else to haue the said summe againe repaid, Against which alliance and league (as Lefly reporteth) Lewis of France much repined, and to annihilate the same sent D. Ireland, a certaine knight, and another religious man, to moue King James to make warre against England.

(110) These no Peace-makers for Christ, but firebrands of Belial, blew the smothered sparkes of dissention into a flame of bloody warre, which fell the more heauy vpon Scotland, for that K. James much wedded vnto his owne will, and altogether ruled by men of meane worth, whom himselfe had aduanced from nothing, had not only neglected by their intigations the loue of his Nobles, but also banished the Realme of Scotland, Alexander Duke of Albany his second brother; and had caused the veins of Iohn Earle of Marre his other brother, to be opened, whereby hee bled to death; these and other discontents alienated his Subiects hearts from him, which laid the land more open vnto the English Inuaders; and yet to draw them more deadly against him, relying vpon his owne valor, and the assistance of France, hee sent word vnto Edward, that hee should not aid his owne sister of Burgundie against K. Lewis, being the Scots Allies; also with threats of warre commanded him to deliuer to his Ambassadors, the Duke of Albanie (then residing in the English Court) and lastlie to make good and repay dammages done vpon the Scottish Borders.

(111) King Edward not a little enraged at these double dealings, even in the winter season mustered his men, prepared his artillery, and rigged his ships, that nothing should be vnready at the next Spring; which no sooner was come, but that hee ordained for his Lieutenant his brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, who with Henric Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, the Lord Louell, Greifstock and others, (the Duke of Albanie marching vnto Gloucesters banner) with twenty thousand strong repaired into the North: and first besieged the strong Towne Berwick, then entring the chiefe City Edenborough, vrged K. James to performe his couenants, concerning the marriage betwixt Prince James his sonne, with Lady Cicely before agreed vpon, threatening destruction if the match went not forward. The Scottish Nobility considering the eminent danger, put to death the wicked Counsellors of their King, ordained the Duke of Albanie the Vicegerent of Scotland, and promised to repay the money receiued according to Couenants; after which with the deliuey of the strong Towne Berwick, which had beene out of the English possession the space of one and twentie yeeres, a general peace was concluded betwixt the two Realmes. Whereupon not long after, Gartur King at armes was sent into Scotland, with an Instrument in writing vnto the Prouost and Burgeffes of Edenburgh.

burgh (who had undertaken to disburse the money) to lignifie King Edwards minde touching the marriage intended, and to demand the said summe by a day assigned, which accordingly was repaide.

(112) The marriage with Scotland thus broken off, for the Lady Cately by K. Edward himselfe, that with France for the Princeesse Elizabeth, both he and his Queene greatly desired, and daily sought after. But Lewis the French King, finding the daughter of Aufrich more fit for his sonne, dallied out Edward with shewes of firme faith, till he had effected the thing he went about: which mischiefe sounded so harshly in the English Kings eare, as in no wife hee would suffer that string to be touched, but euer beleued that the French meant him faire play, and although the yeeres of the parties themselves might beget some suspicion, hee being much elder then the Dauphin, and the truth thereof confirmed by the Duke of Aufriches Leger-Ambassadors residing in England, yet Edward would not so much as suppose a suspect against the French King, and therefore suffered Lewis to inchoach upon those parts of Picardie that ioyned to Calles, and to gaine time till it was past recall: for then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him that hee was present, and saw the Lady Margaret of Aufrich, daughter to Duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperour Frederick, received vnto France with great pompe & royaltie: and at Ambois contracted and espoused to the Dauphin.

(113) Edward mightily chafed to be thus worked by Lewis, made great preparation for France, but whether with anger, griefe, or melancholy, hee fell into a dangerous and deadly sicknesse, some say, of a superfluous surfeit, whereunto he was much giuen: Communes faith, of a Catarrhe, which weake estate turned his minde another way: for calling his Lords into his sickle presence, and raising his faint body vpon his Bed-Pillowes, these words vnto them hee lastly spake:

"(114) My Lords, my deare Kinsmen, & Allies, in what plight I lie, you see, and I feele; by which the lesse while I looke to liue with you, the more deeply am I moued to care in what case I leaue you; for such as I leaue you, such bee my children like to finde you. Which if they should (that God forbid) finde you at variance, might hap to fall themselves at warre, ere their discretion would serue to set you at peace. See see their youth, of which I reckon the only surety to rest in your concord. For it sufficeth not that all you loue them, if each of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulness would suffice: but child-hood must bee maintained by mens authoritie, and slippery youth underpropped with elder counsell, which neither they can haue, vnlesse you giue it, nor you giue it, if you agree not. For where each laboureth to breake that which the other maketh, and through hatred of each others person impugneth each others counsell, there must it needs be long, or any good conclusion goe forward: And while cyther party strueth to bee chiefe, flatterie shall haue more play then plaine and faithfull aduise, of which must needs issue the euill bringing vp of the Prince; whose minde in tender youth infected, shall readily fall to riot and mischief, and draw downe with him his noble Realme vnto ruine: but if grace turne him to wisdom: which if God send, then they that by euill meanes before pleased him best, shall after fall furthest out of fauour, so that euer at length euill drifts draw to nought, and good plaine wayes prosper. Great variance hath there long time beene betwene you, nor wayes for great causes. Sometime a thing right well intended, our misconstructions turneth vnto worse, or a small displeasure done vs, either our own affections or euill tongues agreeth. But this wot I well, ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as you haue of loue. That we

"be all men, that wee be Christian men, this shall I leaue for Preachers to tell you (and yet I wot nere whether any Preachers words ought more to moue you, then his, that is by and by, going to the place that they all preach of.) But this I shall desire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my blood, the other of my Allies; and each of you with other, either of kindred or affinitie, which spirituall kindred of affinitie, if the Sacraments of Christs Church beare that weight with vs, that would to God they did, should no lesse moue vs to charitie, then the respect of fleshly consanguinitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the worse for the selfe cause, that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where finde we so deadly debate, as among them, which by nature and law ought most to agree together. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition, and desire of vaine glory and foueraintie which among states where it once entrencheth, creepeth forth so farre, till with diuision and variance hee turneth all to mischief, first longing to be next the best, afterward equally with the best, and at last chiefe and aboue the best. Of which immoderate appetite of worship, and thereby of debate and dissention, what losse, what sorrow, what trouble, hath within these few yeeres growne in this Realme, I pray God as well forget as we remember. Which things, if I could as well haue foreseen, as I haue with my more paine then pleasure proved, by Gods blessed Lady (that was euer his oath) I would neuer haue won the crosse of mens knees, with the losse of so many heads. But sith things passed cannot be gaine-called, much ought we the more beware, by what occasion wee haue taken to great hurt afore, that wee eft soones fall not into the like againe. Now be those griefes passed, and all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthful peace vnder your Cosins, my children, if God send them life, and you loue. Of which two things the lesse losse were they, by which though God did his pleasure, yet should the Realme alway finde Kings, and peradventure as good Kings. But if you among your selues in a childes raigine fall at debate, many a good man shall perish, and happily he too, and yet too, ere this Land finde peace againe. Wherefore in these last words that euer I looke to speake with you, I exhort, and require you al, for the loue that you haue euer borne vnto me: for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you, for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all, from this time forward all griefes forgotten, each of you loue others, which I verily trust you will, if you any thing regard, either God, or your King, affinitie or kindred, this Realme, your owne country, or your owne surety.

(115) And therewithall the King no longer induring to sit vp, layd him downe on his right side, his face towards them, who with weeping eyes & words as fited the time, recomfited the sickle dying King, ioyning their hands, and outwardly forgiuing that, which inwardly they meant not to forget. The King ouer-joyed to see their willing reconcilments spake not many wordes after, but commending his soule vnto God, in their presence departed this life at his Pallace of Westminster, vpon the 9. day of April, and yeere of Christs appearance 1483. at the age offorty one, when he had worne the royal Diademe, two and twenty yeeres, one moneth and five daies: and was buried at Windsor, in the newe Chappell, whose foundation himselfe had layd.

(116) Of personage hee was the goodliest Gentleman (saith Commynes) that euer mine eyes beheld, faire of complexion, and of most princely presence; courageous of heart, politicke in counsell; in aduersitie nothing abashed; in prosperitie rather ioyous then proud: in peace iust and mercifull; in warre sharpe and fierce, and in field bold and venturous: yet no further then wisdom would, and is no lesse commended commended where he auoided, then is his manhood when he vanquished: eight or nine bartels he won, wherein to his greater renowne he fought on foote, and was euer victor ouer his enemies: much giuen hee was to the lusts of youth, and in his latter time, growne somewhat corpulent, which rather adorned his grauer yeeres, then any waies disliked the eyes of his beholders.

His Wife.

(117) Elizabeth the daughter of Richard Wooduill Earle Rivers by his wife Iaquelana Dutcheffe of Bedford, who was the daughter of Peter Earle of S. Paul, and he the sonne of Peter de Luxembourg, was first married vnto Sir John Grey saine at S. Albans, where he was knighted the day before his death by King Henry the first, vnto whom shee bare two sonnes and a daughter, after whose death shee was priuately remarried vnto K. Edward the fourth, the first day of May, at his mannor of Grafton in Northamptonshire Anno 1464. and in the next yeere following vpon the fixe and twentieth of May, was crowned Queen at Westminster with al due solemnities. Shee was his wife eighteene yeeres, eleuen moneths, and nine daies, no more fortunate in attaining to the height of all worldly dignity, then vnfortunate in the murder of her sonnes, and losse of her owne liberty: For in the beginning of K. Edwards raigne, shee was forced to take Sanctuary at Westminster, wherein her first sonne Prince Edward was borne; and at his death did he like in feare of the Protector, and lastly hauing all her lands and possessions seized vpon by K. Henrie the seauenth, liued in meane estate in the Monastery of Bermundsey in Southwarke, where not long after shee left the troubles of her life, and inioined a quiet portion or burying place by her last husband King Edward at Windsor.

(118) Elianor Butler, as we find it recorded vpon the Parliament Role, was contracted vnto King Edward: but how true considering the occasion, and time of the Act, we leaue for others to iudge, onely this is most certain that this Lady Elianor was the daughter of John Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, and the wife of Sir Thomas Butler Knight, sonne and heire to Ralph Butler Baron of Sudley, which Elianor died the thirtieth of Iune, the yeere of Christ Iesus 1466. and the eight of King Edward the fourth his raigne.

His Issue.

(119) Edward the eldest sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was borne in the Sanctuary at Westminster the fourth of November, and yeere of grace 1471. being the tenth of his fathers raigine, at that time expelled the Realme by the powerful Earle Warwick; but fortune changed, and the father restored, the sonne, the first of Iuly and yeere of Christ was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Chester; and had not the ambitious hand of his vnkle bene defiled in his innocent blood, he might haue worne the Diademe many yeeres, whereas he bare the Title of King not many daies.

(120) Richard the second sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Elizabeth his Queen, was borne at Shrewsbury, and in his infancy was created Duke of Yorke, he was affianced vnto Anne daughter and heire to John Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, by which he was intituled Duke of Norfolk, Earle-Marshall, Warren, and Nottingham, but inioyning neither Title, wife, or his owne life long, was with his brother murdered in the Tower of London, and in the prison of that Tower, which vpon that most sinful deed is euer since called the bloody Tower, their bodies as yet vnknowne where to haue buriall.

(121) George the third sonne of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was also borne in Shrewsbury, and being a yong Child was created Duke of Bedford, but liued not long after, and lieth buried at Windsor.

(122) Elizabeth the first daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Elizabeth his Queene, was borne at Westminster the eleuenth of February, and fifth of her fathers raigne, being the yeere of Saluation 1466. Shee was promised in marriage to Charles Dauphin of France, wooed and courted by her vnkle Crouchbacke, when he had murdered her brothers, and vnderpied the Crowne, but better destiny attending her, shee was referred to ioin the vnion and marriage with the only heire of Lancaster, which was Henrie of Richmond, afterward King of England, from whom is branched the roiall stemme that spreadeth his beauty in this North-West world, euen James our dread Soueraigne, and great Brittaines Monarch.

(123) Cecily, the second daughter of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was sought vnto, by James the third of that name, to be ioined in marriage with James his sonne Prince of Scotland, and Duke of Albany, which match was promised vpon conditions and choise of K. Edward, who lastly brake off from further proceeding, and the Lady married vnto John Viscount Wels, whom shee outliued, and was againe remarried, but by neither husband had any issue, and therefore lesse noted; her body lieth buried at Quarrena in the Isle of Wight.

(124) Anne the third daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was married vnto Lord Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, Earle Marshall, and high Treasurer of England: vnto whom shee bare two sonnes both dying without issue, and her selfe without more fruit of wombe, left her life, and lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolk.

(125) Bridget the fourth daughter of K. Edward the fourth by his wife Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Eltham in Kent, the tenth of November and yeere of Grace 1480. being the twentieth of her fathers Raigine. Shee tooke the habite of Religion, and became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford, in the same County, founded by K. Edward the third, where shee spent her life in contemplations vnto the day of her death.

(126) Marie the fifth daughter of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was promised in marriage vnto the King of Denmarke, but died (before it could be solemnized) in the Tower of Greenwich, the Sunday before Pentecost the twentieth two of her fathers raigne, and yeere of Grace 1482. and was buried at Windsor.

(127) Margaret the sixth daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, died an Infant without other mention in our Authors.

(128) Katherine the seventh daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, and the last of them both, was married vnto William Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, and Lord of Oxbampton, vnto whom shee bare Lord Henrie: after the death of his father Earle of Deuonshire, who by King Henrie the eight was created Marquess of Excester in Anno 1525.

His Concubines.

(129) Elizabeth Lucie is certainly known to haue been King Edwards Concubine, though nothing so certainly mentioned, whose Ladie, or of what Parentage shee was; that shee was concubed by him with child is before declared, but who that child was, is as obscurely laid downe; therefore in these things we must be silent, and leaue the doubts to be resolved by others. Three other concubines this king had, whereof Shores wife was not the least beloued, whose life

His naturall Issue.

(150) Arthur, surnamed Plantagenet, the naturall sonne of K. Edward the fourth, (whose mother as is supposed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lacie) was created Viscount Lisle by King Henrie the eight at Bridewell in London, the twentie sixth of Aprill, and yeere of Saluation 1533. which title was conferred vpon him in right of his wife Lady Elizabeth, sister and heire vnto John Gray Viscount Lisle, and the late wife and then widdow of Edmund Dudley: who bare vnto this Viscount three daughters, which were Bridget, Frances, and Elizabeth, all of them afterward married. This Arthur Lord Lisle was made Lieutenant of Calles by the said K. Henry, which Towne some of his seruants intended to haue betrayed to the French, for which their fact himselfe was sent to the Tower of London: but his truth appearing after much search, the King sent him a rich ring from his owne finger, with such comfortable wordes, as at the hearing thereof a sudden ioy ouercharged his heart, & was so immoderately receiued, that the same night it made an end of his life, whose body was honorably buried in the same Tower.

(151) Elizabeth the naturall daughter of K. Edward the fourth, was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight, the sonne of George, Lord Lumley, who died before his father: shee bare vnto the said Sir Thomas, Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did descend.

EDWARD

EDWARD THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE FIFTH MO-NARCH OF THIS LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

For the most part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

CHAPTER XVI II.

He father thus dying in the strength of his yeeres, and the sonne left to rule before he was ripe, the Synders of dissensions which the sicke King had lately raked vp, presently brake forth into a more raging flame; for the king and Queenes blood that should haue supported young Edwards estate, the one side being suspicious, and the other prouoked by the execrable desire of souerainty, left the tender king (a Prince of such towardnes as his age could containe) destitute and vnarmed, which if either kind or kindred had holden place, must needs haue bene the surest pillars of his defence. The raigne of this King (if we may so call the short time of his Souerainty) began the same day that his father died, though he was neuer Crowned, nor yet commanded the affaires of the Kingdome as an absolute Monarch, his young brothers fortunes being ballanced with his.

(2) For Richard Duke of Gloucester, by nature their vnckle, by office their Protector, to their Father beholden, to themselves by Oath and Allegiance bounden, all bands broken that holdeth man and man together, without any respect of God or the World, vnnaturally contriued to bereaue them, nor onlie of their dignity, but also their liues. But forso-much as the Dukes demeanour ministreth in effect all the whole matter whereof the raigne of this yong and sifit Edward must intreat, it is therefore conuenient, somewhat to shew you ere we goe further, what man this was, and from whom he defended that could find in his heart so much mischief to conceive.

(3) Know first then that Richard Duke of York, a noble man and a mighty, beganne not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cause was (either for right or fauour) so farre forth advanced that King Henries blood (albeit he had a goodly Prince) was vterly reiecte, the Crowne by the authoritie of that high Court intailed to the Duke of York, and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henrie. But the Duke not induring so long to tarrie, intending vnder pretext of diffention and debate arising in the Realme, to prevent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in King Henries life, was with many other Nobles slaine at Wakefield, leauing three sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great states of birth, so were they great and stately of stomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority, and impatient of partners.

Women commonly maligne kindred.

The description of Richard Duke of Gloucester.

(4) For Edward reuenging his fathers death de- priued king Henry, and attained the Crowne; The second, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enuie of his enemies, his brother against him. For were it by the Queen and Lords of her blood which highly maligned the Kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature hate them whom their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be King: at least-wise hainous treason was laid to his charge, and finally were he faulty, were he faultlesse, attained he was by Parliament, and iudged to death, as we haue saide.

(5) Richard the third sonne, of whom we now entreat was in witand courage equall with either of them, in body and prowesse farre vnder them both, little of stature, ill-limmed, and crook-backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, very hard fauoured of visage, and such as in States is called warly, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, and enuious, yea and from afore his birth cuer forward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutcheffe his mother had so much adoe in her trauaile, that shee could not be deliuered of him vncut, and that he came into the world with his feete forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the same runneth) also not vntoothered; Whether men of hard report about the truth, or else that nature changed her Courte in his beginning, which in the course of his life many things vnaturally committed.

Richard Crooke-backe a good foulardier.

(6) No euill Captaine was he in the warre, as to which his disposition was more inclined then for peace; sundry victories he had, and sometimes ouer-throwes, but neuer in default as for his owne person, either of hardines, or politike order; free was he of his diffence, and somewhat about his power libe- rall: with large gifts he gave him vnitedfast friend- ship, for which he was forced to pill and pole in other places, which gave him stedfast hatred. He was close and secret, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar, where euen now he hated; and not letting to kisse whom he thought to kill; despitefull and cruell he was, not for euill-will alwaies, but oftner for ambition, and either for the fury, or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was much what indifferent; where his aduantage grew, he spared no mans death, whose life withstood his purpose. He slew with his own hands, King Henrie the sixth, being Prisoner in the Tower, as men constantlie said, and that without commandement or knowledge of the King, who vndoubtedly if he had intended his death, would haue appointed that butcherly office to some other then his owne brother.

He was the cause of Clarence his death.

(7) Some wise men also iudge, that his drift co- uetly conuicied, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintly, then he that was hardly minded to his wealth; And they that thus iudge, thinke that long time in K. Edwards life, he forsook to be king, in case that his brother (whose life he looked that euill diert should forren) should happen to decease (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent he was glad of the Duke of Clarence death, whose life must needs haue hindered him to intending, (being his elder brother) whether the same Duke had kept him true to his Nephew the young king, or enterprized to be king himselfe. But of all this point, there is no certainty, and who so diuinieth vpon coniectures, may as well shoote too farre, as too short. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the same night, in which king Edward died, one Mistelebrake long ere morning, came in great haste to the house of one Pottier dwelling in Red Croffe street without Creepie-gate in London: and when he with hafty rapping, quickly was let in, he shewed vnto Pottier that K. Edward was de- parted. By my troth man quoth Pottier, then will my Master the Duke of Gloucester be king: what cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to say, whether being toward him knew any such thing intended, or otherwise had any inkling thereof, for it was not likely that he spake it of no ground.

(8) But now to return to the course of this Histo- ry; were it that the Duke of Gloucester had of old fore- minded this conclusion, & was now thereunto mo- ued, & put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the young Princes his Nephews (as opportunity & likelihood of speed, puteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certaintie it is, that he contriued their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignitie vpon himselfe, and forasmuch as he well wist, and holp to maintain a long continued grudge and hartburning betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings blood, either part enuying others au- thority; he now thought their diuisions should be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the pur- suite of his intent, and a sure ground for the founda- tion of all his building, if he might first, vnder the pretext of reuenging old displeasure, abate the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the destruction of the other, and then winne to his purpose as many as he could, and those that could not be wonne, might be lost before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were percei- ued he should soone haue made peace between both the parties with his owne blood.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this diffen- tion betweene his friends somewhat grieved him, yet in his good health he somewhat lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoeuer busines should fall betweene them, himselfe should alwaies be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickness, when he perceived his natural strength lo forseebeled, that he dispaired all recouerie; then considering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrus- ted then that that happened, yet well fore-seeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discre- tion of themselves, and good Counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for their owne commodity, and the rather by pleasant aduile to winne themselves fauour, then by profit- able aduertisements to doe his children good, hee called some of them before him as by vari- ance, and in speciall the Lord Marquesse Dorset, the Queenes sonne by her first husband, and William Lord Hastings a noble-man, then Lord Chamberlaine, against whom the Queene especially grudget, for the great fauor the King bare him: and also for that shee thought him secretly familiar with the King in wanton company. Her kindred also bare him sore, as well for that the King had made him Captain of Calis, which office the Lord Rivers, brother to the high-way towards Stony-Stratford, where the King lay, they had bestowed certain of their men, that should fend backe againe, and compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towards Stony-Stratford, till they had further order: forasmuch as the Dukes themselves intended for the shew of their diligence, to bee the first that should that day attend vpon the Kings Highnesse out of that Towne. Thus bare they folke in hand: but when the Lord Rivers vnderstood the gates closed, the wayes beset, neither his seruants, or himselfe suffered to goe out, considering well to greata thing without his knowledge, could not bee done for nought: and comparing this present manner, with his last nights cheare, in so few howres to haue so great a change, maruailously milked it. Howbeit litch hee could not get away, nor keepe himselfe close hee would not, lest hee should seeme to hide himselfe for some secret feare of his own fault, whereof hee saw no such cause in himselfe: hee determined vpon the fury of his owne conscience, to goe boldly vnto them, and to enquire what this matter might meane; whom as soone as they saw, they beganne to quarrell with, saying, that hee intended to set distance betweene the King and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power. And when hee beganne (as hee was a very well spoken man) in seemely wise to excuse himselfe, they tarried not the end of his answer, but shortly took him, & put him in ward: and that done, forthwith went to horiebacke, and tooke the way to Stony-Stratford, where they found the King with his Company, ready to leape on horiebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, because it was too strait for both companies.

(17) And as soone as they came in his presence, they alighted downe with all their company about them; to whom the Duke of Buckingham said, Go afore Gentlemen, and Ycemen keepe your rooms. In which goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble manner saluted his Grace, who receiued them in many ioyous and amiable manner, nothing knowing, nor mistrusting as yet what was done. But euen by and by in his presence, they picked a quarrell to the Lord Gray, the Kings other brother by his mother, saying, that he with the Lord Marquess his brother, and the Lord Rivers his vncle, had compassed to rule the King and the realm, and to set variance among the States, and to subdue and destroy the noble blood of the Realme: towards the accomplishing whereof, they said that the Lord Marquess had entred into the Tower of London, & thence taken out the Kings treasure, and had sent men to the sea. All which things these Dukes well knew were done for necessary and good purposes, by the whole Councell at London, sauing that somewhat they must say.

(18) Vnto which words the King answered, what my brother Marquess had done I cannot say: but in good sooth I dare well answer for mine vncle Rivers, & my brother here, that they are innocent of any such matter: yea my liege, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealings in these matters farre from the knowledge of your good Grace. And forthwith they arrested the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hawk Knights in the Kings presence, and brought the King and all his company backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsell. And there they sent away from the King whome it pleased them, and fer new seruants about him, such as better liked them: then him: At which dealing the king wept, and was nothing content; but it bootet not: and at dinner, the Duke of Gloucester sent a dish from his owne Table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good cheere for all should bee well. But the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Messenger to beare it to the Lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such aduersity was strange, but himselfe had bene all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better: but for all this comfortable courtesie of the Duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Country, into diuers places to prison, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

(19) In this wise the Duke of Gloucester tooke vpon himselfe the Order and Governance of the young King, whom with much honour and humble reuerence hee conuaid towards London. But anone the tidings of this matter came hastily to the Queene, a litle before the midnight following, and that in the forest wife, that the King her sonne was taken, her brother, her sonne, and other friends arrested, & sent no man with whither, to bee done with God wot what. With which tidings, the Queen in great fright & heauinesse, bewailed her childes raigne, her friends mischance, and her owne misfortune, damning the time that euer shee disswaded the gathering of power about the King, got her selfe in all hast possibill with her young sonne, and her daughters, out of the Palace of Westminster, in which shee then lay, into the Sanctuary, lodging her selfe, and company there in the Abbots place.

(20) Now came there one likewise, not long after night from the Lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbishoppe of York then Chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Westminster, & for that hee shewed his seruants, that he had tidings of great importance, that his M. gaue him in charge, not to forbear his rest, they letted not to awake him; nor hee to admit the Messenger vnto his bed side. Of whom hee heard that these Dukes were gone backe with the Kings Grace from Stony-Stratford vnto Northampton: notwithstanding Sir (quoth he) my Lord fendeth your Lordshippe word, that there is no feare: for hee assureth you that all shall bee well. I assure him (quoth the Archbishoppe) bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee so well as we haue seene it. And thereupon by and by after the messengers departure, hee caused in all hast all his seruants to be called vp, and so with his owne household about him, every man weaponed, hee tooke the Great Seale with him, and came yet before day vnto the Queene. About whom he found much heauinesse, rumble, hast and businesse, carriage and conuenance of her stuffe into Sanctuary, chests, coffers, packes and fardels, trusted all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, some lading, some going, some discharging, some comming for more, some breaking down the wals, to bring in the next way, and some drew to them to helpe to carry a wrong way. The Queene her selfe fate alone alow on the rushes, all delolate and dismayed, whom the Archbishop comforted in the best manner hee could, shewing her that hee trusted the matter was nothing so fore as shee tooke it for, and that hee was put in good hope and out of feare, by a message sent him from the L. Chamberlaine: Ah woe worth him (quoth the Queene) hee is one of them that laboureth to destroy mee and my blood.

(21) Madam (quoth hee) bee of good cheare, for I assure you, if they crowne any other King then your sonne, whom they haue now with them, we shal on the morrow crown his brother, whom you haue here with you: and here is the great Seale, which in like sort as that noble Prince your husband deliuered it vnto me, so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behoofe of your sonne, and therewith hee betooke her the Great Seale, and departed home againe, euen in the dawning of the day: by which time hee might in his Chamber window see all the Thames full of boates of the Duke of Gloucester seruants, watching that no man should goe to Sanctuary, nor none should passe vnsearched. Then was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as especially in the City, the people diuersly ueryly diuining vpon this dealing. And some Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, eyther for fauour of the Queene, or for feare of themselves, assembled inundry Companies, and went flooke-meale in harness: and many also, for that they accounted this demonstration attempted, not so specially against the other Lords, as against the King himselfe in the disturbance of his Coronation.

(22) But then, by and by the Lords assembled together, towards which meeting, the Archbishoppe of York fearing that it would bee ascribed (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightnesse, that hee so sodainly had yielded vp the great Seale to the Queene (to whom the custody thereof nothing appertained) without speciall commandement of the King, secretly sent for the Seale againe, & brought it with him after the accustomed manner. And at this meeting, the Lord Hastings, whose truth toward the King no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perswaded the Lords to beleue, that the Duke of Gloucester, was sure and fastly faithfull to his Prince, and that the Lord Rivers and Lord Richard, with the other knight, were for matters attempted by them against the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham put vnder arrest for their surety, not for the Kings icopardy; and that they were also in safeguard, & there no longer should remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but also by all the other Lords of the kings Councell indifferently examined, and by other discretions ordered, either iudged or appealed. But one thing hee aduised them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their private grudges into the common hurt, irking and prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings Coronation; towards which the Dukes were comming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter to lare out of ioynt, that it should neuer bee brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should happen (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all things equall, yet should the authority be on that side where the King is himselfe.

(23) With these perswasions of the Lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe beleueed, of part hee wist the contrary, these commotions were somewhat appeased, but especially by that, that the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham were so nere, and came so shortly on with the King, in none other manner, with none other voice, or any other semblance then to his Coronation; causing the fame to be blowne about, that these Lords and Knights which were taken, had contriued the destruction of the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, and of other the Noble blood of the Realme, to the end that themselves would alone demean and gouerne the King at their pleasure. And for the Colourable prooffe thereof, such of the Dukes seruants as rode with the Carts of their stuffe that were taken (amongst which stuffe no maruell though some were harness, which at the breaking vp of the household, must needs either be brought away, or cast away) they shewed vnto the people all the way as they went; saying, loe here be the barrels of harness, that these Traitors haue priuily conueied in their Carriages to destroy the Noble Lords withall. This deuise, albeit it made the matter to wisemen more vnlike, well perceiving that the intendres of such a purpose, would rather haue had their harness on their backs, then to be bound vp in barrels: yet much part of the common people were therewith verie well satisfied, and said it were almes to hang them.

(24) When the King approched nere to the City, Edmund Shaa Goldsmith then Maior, with William White and John Matthew Sheriffs, and all the other Aldermen in Carlet, with five hundred horse of the Citizens in violet, receiued him reuerently at Harnessey, and ryding from thence, accompanied him into the City, which hee entred the fourth day of May, the first and last yeere of his Raigne. The King was lodged in the Bishops Pallace, where was kept a great Councell, and there was iworne to the king, the Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of Buckingham, and all the Lords. But the Duke of Gloucester, bare him in open fight so reuerent to the Prince, with all semblance of lowlines, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, he was sodainly false in so great trust, that at the Councell next assembled, he was made the only man, choise & thought most meet to be Protector of the king and his realm, so that (were it destiny, or were it folly) the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to keepe. At which Councell also, the Archbishop of York Chancellor of England, which had deliuered vp the great Seale to the Queene, was thereof greatly reprovied, and the Seale taken from him, and deliuered to Doctor Rufell Bishop of Lincolne, a wife man, and of much experience, and vndoubtedly one of the best learned men that England had in his times: diuers Lords & Knights were appointed vnto diuers Roomes, the Lord Chamberlaine, and some others, keeping still their offices they had before.

(25) Now although that the Protector, so fore thirsted for the finishing of those designs which he had begun, and thought every day a yeere till they were attieued, yet durst hee no further attempt, so long as hee had but halfe his pray in his hand: well witting, that if he depoeled the one brother, all the Realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in Sanctuary, or should be conueied to his further liberty: wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords in Councell, hee proposed vnto them, that it was a heinous deed of the Queene, and proceeded of great malice towards the Kings Councillers, that shee should keepe in Sanctuary the Kings brother from him, whose speciall pleasure and comfort were to haue his brother with him: and that by her done, was to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and murmur of the people, as though they were not to be trusted with the Kings brother, who by assent of the Nobles of the land, were appointed as the Kings neerest friends, to the tuition of his owne royall person. The prosperity whereof standeth (quoth hee) not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand, but partly also in recreation, and moderate pleasure, which hee in his tender youth cannot take in the company of ancient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be neither farre vnder, nor farre about his age, and neuertheless of estate conuenient to accompany his noble Maiesty; wherefore with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if any man thinke this consideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that loueth the King) let him consider that sometimes without small things, greater cannot stand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the dishonour both of the Kings Highnesse, and of vs all that are about his Grace, to haue it runne in euery mans mouth, (as in this Realme onely, but also in other lands, not in euill words walke farre) that the Kings brother shall bee faine to keepe Sanctuary; for every man I deeme, will suppose, that there is occasion giuen, why it should so be: and such euill opinions once fastened in mens hearts, hardly can bee screwed out againe, and may grow to more griefe then any man here can diuine. Wherefore I thinke it were not the worst to send vnto the Queene for the redresse of this matter, some honourable trusty man, such as both tendreth the kings weale, and the honour of this Councell, and is also in fauour and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth to mee more meete, then our reuerend Father here present, my Lord Cardinal, who may in this matter doe most good of any man, if it please him to take the pains, which I doubt not of his goodnesse hee will not refuse, for the Kings sake and ours, and weale of the young Duke himselfe, the Kings most honourable brother, ther, and after my Soueraigne himselte, my most deere Nephew. Considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumor and obloquie now going, and the hurts auoided that thereof might insue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the Realme. And if the be percase so obdurate, and so precisely set vpon her owne will, that neither his wife and faithful ad-uertisement cannot moue her; nor any mans reason content her: then shall we by mine aduise, and by the Kings authority, fetch him out of that Prison; & bring him to his noble presence, in whose continuall company he shall be so well cherished, and so honorably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor, and her reproach perceiue, that it was only malice, frowardnes, or folly, that caused her to keepe him there: this is my minde in this matter for this time, except any of your Lordships any thing perceiue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods Grace, so wed

(26) When the Protector had said, all the Coun-cell affirmed that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his brother honorable, and the thing that should cease great murmur in the Realme, if the mother might be by good meanes induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishop of York, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most convenient, tooke vpon him to moue her, and therein to doe his vttermost endeauour: howbeit if she could by no meanes be entrea-ted with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and such other of the Clergy then present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted, to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so manie yeeres beene kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then five hundred yeeres agoe, by S. Peter in his owne person, in spirite accompanied with great multitude of Angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicated to God, (for the prooue whereof, they haue yet in the Abbey, S. Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer so vndeuous a King, that durst violate that sacred place, or so holy a Bishop, that durst presume to consecrate it; and therefore (quoth the Archbishop of York) God forbid that a ny man should for any thing earthly, enterprize to breake the immunity and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary, that hath beene the safegard of many a good mans life: and I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace we shall not need it. But for what need focuer, I would not we should doe it; I trust that shee shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained, but if it happen, that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it with my best, and you shall all well perceiue, that there shall be of my endeavour no lacke, if the mothers dread, and womanish feare be not the let.

(27) Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnes (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, shee wel knoweth, there is no need of any feare, either for her sonne or for her selfe. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warr with a woman. Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should all be soone in rest: Howbeit, there is none of her kin the lesse looued, for that they be of her kin, but for their owne euill deserving. And nay the lesse, if we loued neither her, nor her kin, yet were there no cause to thinke, that we should hate the Kings noble brother, to whose Grace we our selues be of kin: whose honor, if shee as much desired, as our dishonor, and as much regard tooke to his wealth, as to her owne will, shee would be so loth to suffer him from the King, as any of vs be. For, if shee haue wit, (as would God shee had as good will as shee hath shrewd wit) shee reckneeth her selfe no wifer, then shee thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull minde shee nothing doubteth, but verily beleueth and knoweth, that they would be as sorry for his harme, as her selfe, and yet would haue him from her, if shee bide there: and we all (I thinke) content, that both be with her, if shee come thence, and bide in such place, where they may be with their honour. Now then, if shee refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the Counsell of them, whose wisdom shee knoweth, whose truth shee well trusteth: it is easie to perceiue, that for-wardnes leaue her, and not feare. But goe to, suppose that shee feare, (as who may let her to feare her owne shadow) the more shee feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we to feare to leaue him in her hands. For, if shee cast such fond doubts, that shee feare his hurt; then will shee feare, that hee shall bee fetcht thence. For shee will founte thinke, that if men were let (which God forbid) vpon to great a mischiefe, the Sanctuary would little let them: which good men might (as I thinke) without sin, somewhat lesse regard then they doe. Then, if shee doubt, lest hee might bee fetched from her, is it not likely that shee shall send him somewhere out of the Realme? Verily, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but shee now as fore minded it, as we the let thereof. And if shee might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great matter, we let her alone) all the world would say, that wee were a wile fort of Counsellors about a King, that suffer his brother to be cast away vnder our noses. And therefore I assure you faithfully for my mind, I will rather maugre her mind, fetch him away, then leaue him there, till her frowardnes and fond feare con-uay him away. And yet will I breake no Sanctuary therefore: for verily, sith the priuiledges of that place, and other like haue bene of long continued, I am not he that wil goe about to breake them. And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say nay, but that it is a deed of pittie, that such men, as the sea, or their euill debtors haue brought in poverty, should haue some place of liberty, to keepe their bodies out of the danger of their cruell Creditors. And also, if the Crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as Traitors, I like well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theeues, of which these places bee full, and which neuer fall from the craft after they once fall thereunto; it is pittie the Sanctuary should serue them, & much more manquellers, whom God bad to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murder were willfull.

And where it is otherwise, there need wee not the Sanctuaries, that God appointed in the old Law: for if either necessity, his own defence, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the King of pitty may. Then looke we now how few sanctuary men there be, whom any fauourable necessity compelled to goe thither; and then see on the other side, what a fort there be commonly therein of them, whom willfull vnthriftinesse hath brought to naught: what rabble of theeues, murderers, and malicious hainous Traitors, and that in two places especially: the one at the elbow of the City, the other in the very bowels. I dare well aow it, weigh the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, and yee shall finde it much better to lacke both, then to haue both. And this I say, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long haue been, that I feare mee euer they will bee, while men bee afraide to set the hands to amend the, as though God & S.
Peter were the patrons of vngracious liuing. Now vn-thrifts riot, and runne in debt, vpon the boldnes of these places; yea, and rich men runne thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, and bid their Creditors goe whistle. Mens wiues runne thither with their husbands plate, and say, they dare not abide with their husbands for beating. Theeues bring thither their stoll goods, and lue thereon riotously: there they deuise new robberies, nightly they steale out, they rob and riue, kill and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onely a safegard for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more; howbeit much of this mischief, if Wifemen would set their hands to it, might bee amended, with great thanks of God, and no breach of the Priuiledge.

The residue, sith so long agoe, I wote neere what Pope, and what Prince more pitteous then poli-ticke hath granted it, and other men since, of a certaine religious feare, haue not broken it; let vs therefore take paine therewith, and let it a Gods name stand in force, as farre forth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this Nobleman, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a Sanctuary man. A Sanctuary serueth alwayes to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onelic, but also of lawful hurt; for against vn-lawfull harmes, neuer Pope nor King intended to priuiledge any one place, for that priuiledge hath euery place: knoweth any man any place, wherein it is lawful for one man to do another wrong? that no man vnlawfully take hurt, that liberty, the King, the Law, and very nature forbidder in euery place, and maketh to that regard, for euery man, e-uery place a Sanctuary: but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth hee the tuion of some speciall priuiledge, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries: from which necessity this noble Prince is free, whose loue to the King, nature and kindred proueth, whose innocency to all the world, his tender youth proueth, and so Sanctuary, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor none can hee haue. Men come not to Sanctuary, as they come to Baptisme, to require it by their Godfathers; hee must aske it himselfe, that must haue it, and reason, sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him faine need to require it: what will then hath yonder babe? which and if he had discretion to require it, if hee were, I dare say would now bee right angry with them that keepe him there: and I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of Priuiledge, to bee somewhat more homelic with them, that be there Sanctuarie men indeed: for if one goe to Sanctuary with another mans goods, why should not the King, leauing his body at liberty, satisfie the party of his goods, euil within the Sanctuarie? for neither King nor Pope can giue any place such a priuiledge, that it shall discharge a man of his debtes, being able to pay. And with that diuers of the Clergy that were present, whether they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreede plainly, that by the law of God, and of the Church, the goods of a Sanctuarie man, should bee deliuered in payment of his debtes, and solne goods to the owner, and onely liberty referred him, to get his liuing with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I thinke you say very truth; and what if a mans wife would take Sanctuary, because shee list to runne from her husband? I would weene if shee could alledge none other cause, hee may lawfully without any displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters Church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that faith hee will bide there, then if a child will take Sanctuary, because hee feareth to goe to schoole, his Master must let him alone. And as simple as the sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case then in that; for therein, though it be a childish feare, yet is there at the least wise some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary men, but I neuer heard earst of Sanctuary Children. And therefore, as for the Conclusion of my mind, which so may haue deferred to need it, if they thinke it for their suretie, let them keepe it; but hee can be no Sanctuary man that had neither wildeome to defire it, nor malice to deserue it; whose life or libetie, can by no lawfull proceesse stand in iopardie: and hee that taketh one out of the Sanctuarie to do him good; I say plainly that hee breaketh no Sanctuary.

(28) When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholly, & most part of the spiritual all, thinking no hurt earthly meant towards the young babe, condiscended in effect, that if hee were not deliuered, hee should bee fetched; howbeit they all thought it best, in the auoiding of all manner of rumor, that the Lord Cardinall should first assay to get him with her good will. And thereupon, all the Councill came vnto the Starre-Chamber at Westminster, and the Lord Cardinall leauing the Protector with the Councill in the Starre-Chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Queen with diuers other Lords with him, were it for the respect of his honour, or that hee should by presence of so many, perceiue that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this matter, to trust any one man alone, or else, that if hee finally were determined to keepe him, some of that Company had happily secret instructions incontinent, maugre her mind to take him, and to leaue her no repite to conuey him, which shee was likely to mind, after this matter broken to her, if the time would in any wise serue her.

(29) When the Queene and those Lords were come together in presence, the Lord Cardinall shewed her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole Councill, that her keeping of the Kings brother in that place, was the thing which highly founded, not onely to the great rumor of the people, and their obloquie, but also to the importable griefe and displeasure of the kings royall Maiessty, to whose Grace it were a singular comfort, to haue his naturall brother in Company, as it was both his dishonour, all theirs, and hers also, to suffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother stood in danger and perill of the other.
And hee shewed her, that the Councill therefore had sent him to require her the deliuey of the yong Duke, that hee might bee brought vnto the Kings presence at his liberty, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison, and there hee should bee demeaned, according to his estate: and hee in this doing should both doe great good to the Realme, pleasure to the Councill, and profite to her selfe, succour to her friends that were in distresse; and besides that (which hee wist well hee specially tendred) not onely great comfort and honour to the King, but also to the young Duke himselfe, whose great wealth it were to be together, as well for many greater causes, as also for both their disports and recreations; which thing the Lords esteemed not slight, though it seemed light; well pondering, that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any stranger, for the coniecture of both their ages and estates, so meete in that point for any of them, as eyther of them other.

(30) My Lord (quoth the Queene) I say not nay, but that it were very convenient, that this Gentleman whom yee require, were in company of the King his Brother, and in good faith, I thinke it were as great commodity to them both, for yet a while to bee in the custody of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but speciallie the younger, which besides his infancy, that also needeth good looking to, hath a while been so fore diseased, vexed with sicknesse, and is so newly rather a little amended, then well recovered, that I dare put no person earthly in trust with his keeping but my selfe onely, considering that there is (as Physicians say) and as wec also find, double the perill in the reciduation, that was in the first sicknesse, with which discafe, nature being forelaboured, forewearing and weakned, waxeth the lesse able to beare out and sustaine a new surfeit. And albeit there might be found other that would happily do their best vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, then I that so long haue kept him, or is more like tenderly to cherishe him then his owne mother that bare him.

(31) No man denieth good Madam (quoth the Cardinal) but that your Grace were of all others most necessary about your children, and so would all the Councell not only be content, but glad that you were, if it might stand with your pleasure, to bee in such place as might stand with their honor: but if you doe appoint your selfe to tarry here, then they thinke it were more conuenient that the Duke of Yorke were with the King, honourably at his liberty, to the comfort of them both, rather then here as a Sanctuary man, to both their dishonour and obloquie, fith there is not alwayes so great a necessity to haue the child with his mother, but that occasion may sometimes bee such, that it should bee more expedient to keepe him elsewhere, which well appeareth in this, that at such time as your dearest sonne then Prince, and now King, should for his honor, and good order of the Country, keepe his residence in Wales, fare out of your Company, your Grace was well contented therewith your selfe.

(32) Not very well contented (quoth the Queen) and yet the case is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now sicke: in which case I maruaile greatly, that my Lord Protector is so desirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the Child in his sicknesse miscarrie by nature, yet might hee runne into slander and suspicion of fraud. And where they call it a thing so foreagaist my Childes honour, and theirs also, that hee abideth in this place: it is all their honour there to suffer him abide, where no man doubteth hee shall be best kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth, and inopard my selfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in surety with mee, then I there in inopardy with them.

(33) Why Madame (quoth another Lord) know you any thing why they should bee in inopardy? Nay verily (quoth she) nor why they should bee in prison, as now they bee. But it is I trow no great maruaile though I feare, lest those that haue not letted to put them in durance without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause: The Cardinal made a countenance to the other Lord, that hee should harpe no more vpon that string, and then said hee to the Queen, that he nothing doubted, but that those Lords of her honourable kinne, which as yet remained vnder arrest, should vpon the matter examined doe well enough, and as towards her noble person, neither was, neither could be any inopardy.

(34) Whereby should I trust that (quoth the Queene?) in that I am guiltlesse? as though they were guilty: in that I am with their enemies better loued then they? when they hate them for my sake, in that I am so neere a kin to the King? and how fare they be off, if that would helpe, as God grant it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpose not as yet, to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my sonne, I minde that he shall be where I am, till I see further: for I assure you, for that I see some men so greedy, without any substantiall cause to haue him, makes me much more fearefull to deliuer him. Truly Madame (quoth he) the more vnwilling that you be to deliuer him, the more vnwilling other men be to suffer you to keepe him, least your causelesse feare might cause you farther to conuey him: and many there be that thinke he can haue no priuiledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor mallice to deferre it, and therefore, they reckon no priuiledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if you finally refuse to deliuer him, I verily thinke they will so much dreadhath my Lord his vncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, lest your grace should hope to send him away.

(35) Ah fir (quoth the Queene) hath the Protector so tender zeale that he feareth nothing, but least he should escape him? I thinke he that I would send him hence, which is not in plight to send out, and in what place could I account him sure, if he be not sure in the Sanctuary? which there were neuer Tyrant yet so diuclish, that durst presume to breake. And I trust God is as strong now to withstand his aduersaries, as euer he was. But my sonne can deserue no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forsooth he hath found out a goodly glosse, by which that place that may defend a thiefe, may not saue an innocēt: but he is in no inopardy, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. Thinke the Protector, (I pray God hee may proue a Protector) thinke hee, that I perceiue not whereunto his painted Process draweth? It is not honorable that the Duke abide here: It were comfortable for them both, that he were with his brother, because the King lacketh a play fellow forsooth. I pray God send them both better playfellows then him, that maketh so high a matter, vpon so trifling pretext, as though there could none be found to play with the King, but his brother, (that hath no list to play for sicknes) come out of Sanctuary, out of his safeguard to play with him. As though Princes, as yong as they be, could not play but with their Peeres, or Children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the most part they agree much worse then with strangers. But the Child cannot require the priuiledge: who tolde him so? he shall heare him aske it, if he will. Howbeit, this is a gay matter, suppose hee could not aske it, suppose hee would not aske it, suppose hee would aske to goe out, if I say he shall not: if I take the priuiledge but for my selfe, I say he that taketh him out against my will, breake the Sanctuary. Serueth this liberty for my person only, or for my goods also? you may not take hence my horse from me: and may you take my child from me? He also is my ward: for as my learned Councell sheweth me, fith he hath nothing by discent holden by Knights seruice, the law maketh his mother his Gardian. Then may no man I suppose, take my ward from me out of Sanctuary, without the breach of Sanctuary. And if my priuiledge could not serue him, nor he aske it for himselfe, yet fith the law committeth to me the custodie of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a child a Gardian only for his goods and lands, discharging him of the cure and safe-keeping of his body, for which only both lands and goods serue. And if examples be sufficient, to obtaine priuiledge for my child, I need not farre to seeke them, for in this place in which now we be (and which is now in question, whether my child may take benefit of it) mine other sonne now King, was borne kept in his Cradle, and preferred to a more prosperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuary. For when my Lord my husband was banished, and thrust out of his Kingdome, I fled hither, being great with Child: and here I bare the Prince: and when my Lord my husband returned safe againe, and had the victory, then went I hence, to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the Prince vnto his father, when hee first tooke him in his armes. And I pray God that my sonnes Pallace may be as great a safeguard vnto him now reigning, as this place was sometime to the Kings enemie. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, since mans law serueth the Gardian to keepe the Infant. The law of nature wils the mother to keepe her her child, Gods law priuiledgeth the Sanctuary, and the Sanctuary my sonne, fith I feare to put him in the Protector hands, who hath his brother already, and were (if both failed) inheritor to the Crowne: and the cause of my feare, hath no man to doe to examine. But yet I feare no further then the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth euerie man, the custody of them by whose death hee may inherit lesse land then a Kingdome. I can no more: but whosoever he be that breake this holy Sanctuary, I pray God shortly send him need of a Sanctuary when hee may not come to it, for taken out of Sanctuary I would not that my mortall enemy were.

(36) The Lord Cardinall perceiving that the Queene waxed euer the longer the further off, & also that shee beganne to kindle and chafe, and speake more biting words against the Protector, and such as he neuer beleued, and was also loath to heare, hee said to her for a finall conclusion, that he no longer would dispute the matter, but if shee were content to deliuer the Duke to him, and to the other Lords present, he durst lay his body and soule both in pledge, not only for his surety, but also for his estate; And if he would giue a resolute answer to the contrary, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and shift who so would with this businesse afterward, for he neuer intended more to moue her in that matter, in which shee thought that hee and all others also saue herselfe, lacked either witte or truth; wit, if they were so dull that they could perceiue nothing what the Protector intended: truth, if they should procure her sonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they should perceiue towards the Child any euill intended.

(37) The Queene with these wordes stood a good while in a deepe study. And for as much as her seemed the Cardinal ready to depart, and the Protector himselfe readie at hand, so as shee verily thought she could not keepe him there, but that he should incontinent be taken thence, and to conuey him elsewhere, neither had shee time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all things vnready, this message came on her so suddainly, nothing lesse looked for, then to haue him fetched out of Sanctuary, which the thought to be now befer in such places about, that he could not be conueyed out vntraken, and partly (as shee thought) it might fortune her feare to be false, so well shee wist it was either needlesse or bootlesse: Wherefore, if shee must needs goe to him, shee deemed it best to deliuer him, & besides the Cardinals faith, shee nothing doubted, neither some other Lords, whom shee saw there present, which as shee feared lest they might be deceived, so was shee well assured they would not be corrupted: and thought it would make the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumspectly to see to his surety, if with her owne hands shee betooke him to them of trust. And lastly taking the young Duke by the hand said vnto the Lords.

(38) My Lords, and all my Lords: I neither am so vnwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistrust your truths: of which thing I purpose to make you such a prooue, as if either of both lacked in you, might both turne mee to great sorrow, the Realme to much harme, & you all to great reproch. For loe, here is (quoth she) this Gentleman, whom I doubt not, but I could heere keepe safe if I would, whatsoeuer any man say: and I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wist where any of it lay in their owne bodies, they would let it out. We haue also experience, that the desire of a kingdome knoweth no kindred: the brother hath bene the brothers bane: and may the Nephewes be sure of their Vncle? Each of these children is the others defence, whilst they are asunder, and each of their liues lieth in the others body: keepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing for them both more perillous then to be in one place. beleued could not be auoyded, hee bent himselfe, determining, fith the common mischief could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie.

(40) Then was it agreed, that the Protector should haue the Dukes aide to make him King, and that the Protector's only lawfull sonne should marry the Dukes daughter; and that the Protector should grant him the quiet possession of the Earldome of Hereford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in King Edwards time. Besides these requests of the Duke, the Protector of his owne accord, promised him a great quantitie of the Kings treasure, and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwixt themselves, they went about to prepare for the Coronation of the yong king as they would haue it feeine. And that they might turne both the eyes & minds of men fro perceiving of their drifts otherwise, the Lords were sent for from all parts of the Realme, and came flocking vnto the solemnitie. But the Protector and Duke after they had sent the Lord Cardinal Arch-bishop of Torke, then L. Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lords Stanley & Hastings, then Lord Chamber-laine, with many other Noblemen, to conferre and deuise about the Coronation in one place, as fast they were in another place contriuing the contrary, to make the Protector king: to which counsell, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they very secret; yet began here and there, some muttering among the people, as though all should not long be wel, though they neither knew what they feared, nor wherefore: were it that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret inflinck of nature miglite them, as the Sea without winde swellth of himselfe sometime before a tempest; or were it that some one man happily somewhat perceiving, filled many men with suspition, though hee shewed few men what hee knew. Howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to mule on the matter, though the counsell were close. For by little and little, all men withdrew from the Tower, and repaired to Crosbies in Bishopgate streete, where the Protector kept his house in great state. So that the Protector had the resort, and the King left in a manner desolate. And whilst some for their businesse made suite to such as were in office for the King, some were secretly by their friends warned, that it might happily doe them no good, to be too much attendant about the king without the Protector's appointment, who then began to remove many of the Princes old seruants, and in their stead to place about him new.

(41) Thus many things meeting together, partly by purpose, & partly by chance, caused at length not only the common people that moue with the winde, but wisemen also, and some Lords likewise, to make and muse at the matter; insomuch, that the Lord Stanley, who was after Earle of Darby, said to the Lord Hastings, that he much misliked these two feuerall counsellors. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little woe we, whereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while * one man is there, which is neuer thence, neuer can things be moued that should found amisse against me, but it shall be in mine eares ere it be well out of their mouths: this ment he by Catesby, which was of his neere counsell, and whom hee very familiarly vsed, and in his most weighty matters put no man in so speciall trust, nor no man so much behol-den vnto him as Catesby was. A man indeed well learned in the Lawes of this Land, and by speciall fauour of the Lord Chamberlaine, in good authoritie, and bare much rule in Leicestershire, where the Lord Hastings power chiefly lay. But surely great pitie it was, that he had not had either more truth, or lesse wit. For his dissimulation only kept all that mischief vp: in whom if the Lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the Lord Stanley and hee had departed with diuers other Lords, and had broken all the dance, for many ill signes that he saw, which he now construes all to the best. So surely thought he that there could be no harme towards him intended, in that counsell where Catesby was. And of truth, the Protector and Duke of Buckingham, made very good semblance vnto the Lord Hastings, whom vndoubtedly the Protector loued well, and loth was to haue lost him, but for feare, least his life should haue quailed their purpose; for which cause hee moued Catesby to proue with some words, cast out a farre off, whether hee could thinke it possible to winne the L. Chamberlaine to their part. But Catesby whether hee assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them, as hee found him so fast, and heard him speake to terrible words, that hee durst no further breake. True it is, that the Lord Chamberlaine, of very trust shewed vnto Catesby, the distrust that others began to haue in the matter: & therefore Catesby fearing as hee affirmed, least their motion might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto only all the matter leaned, hee counselled and procured the Protector hastily to rid him. And much the rather, for that hee trusted by his death, to obtaine much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bare in his Country: the only desire whereof, was the allectiue that induced him to be partner, and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

(42) Soone after this, vpon Friday the thirteenth day of June, many Lords assembled in the Tower, and there fate in counsell, deuising the honorable solemnitie of the Kings Coronation; of which the time appointed was so neere, that the Pageants and subtilties were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed, that afterward was cast away. These Lords sitting together communing of this matter, the Protector came in amongst them about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteously, and excusing himselfe, that he had beene from them so long, saying merrily, I haue bin a sleeper this day. And after a little talke with them, hee said to the Bishop of Ely, My Lord, you haue verie good Strawburies at your Garden in Helborne, I pray you let vs haue a messe of them: Gladly my Lord, said the Bishop, would God I had some better thing as ready to pleasure you as that: and therewith in all haste hee sent his seruant for a messe of Strawburies. Whereupon the Protector setting the Lords fast in conference, prayed them to spare him for a little while, and departed thence. But soone after, betwixt ten and eleuen, hee returned into the counsell Chamber amongst them, with a wonderfull fowre and angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lippes, fate him downe in his place, all the Lords much dismayed, fore maruelling of this his suddaine change, and what thing should him aile: Hee sitting thus a while, began thus to speake, what are they worthy to haue, that compassie and imagine the destruction of mee, being so neere of blood vnto the King, and Protector of his royall person and his Realme? At which question, all the Lords fate fore astonied, musing much by whom this question should be meant, of which e- uery man knew himselfe cleare.

(43) Then the Lord Chamberlaine, as hee that for the loue betwixt them, thought he might be- bouldest with him, answered & said, That they were worthy to be punished as haynous traitors whatsoe- uer they were: and the same all the other Lords af- firmed. That is (quoth the Protector) yonder force- resse my brothers wife, meaning the Queene, and o- thers with her: at these words many of the Lords that fauoured her, were greatly abashed: but the L. Hastings was in his minde better content, that it was moued by her, then by any other whom hee loued better: howbeit, his heart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as hee was of the taking of her kindred, & of their put- ting to death, which were by his assent before deu- lished to be beheaded at Pomfret the selfe same day, in which hee was not aware, how it was by other deu- lished, that himselfe should be beheaded the same day at London. Then said the Protector, yee shall all see in what wife that Sorceresse, and that other witch of her counsell, Shores wife, with their affinity, haue by their forcerie and witchcraft waited my body. And therewith hee plucked vpp his doublet sleue to the elbow vpon his left arme, where hee shewed a wearish withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other.

(44) And thereupon euery mans mind fore mis- gauge them, well perceiving that this matter was but a quarrell. For they well knew, that the Queene was too wife to go about any such folly; & if she would, yee would seee of all others, not make Shores wife of counsell, whom of all women shee most hated; as that Concubine whom the King her husband had most loued. And also no man there present, but knew well enough, that his arme was euer such since his birth. Neuertheless the Lord Chamberlaine, (which from the death of King Edward kept Shores wife, on whom hee somewhat doated in the Kings life, thinking as it is said, that hee forbore her for reuerence towards the King, or else of a certain kind of fidelity to his friend) answered and said: Cer- tainly my Lord, if they haue so heinously done, they be worthy of hainous punishment. What (quoth the Protector) thou ferrest mee I ween with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make good on thy bodie Traitor. And therewith as in a great anger, hee clapped his fist vpon the board a great rap: at which token giuen, one without the Chamber cried, treason, where- with a dore clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse, as many as the Chamber might hold, and anone the Protector said to the Lord Hastings, I ar- riest thee Traitor: What mee my Lord quoth hee? yea thee Traitor quoth the Protector; and another felllic at the Lord Stanley, who shrunke at the stroke vnder the Table, or else his head had beene cleft to the teeth: for as swiftly as hee shrunke, yet came the blood about his eares. Then were they all quickly bestowed in diuers Chambers, excepting only the Lord Chamberlaine, whom the Protector bad speede and shriue him apace, for by S. Paul said hee, I will not to dinner till I see thy head off. It booted him not to aske why, but heauiely tooke a Priest at aduerture, and made a short shrift, for a longer would not be suffered: The Protector made so much haste to dinner, which hee might not goe to, till this was done for sauing of his oath. So was hee brought forth vnto the greene, before the Chap- pell within the Tower, and his head laid down vpon a long logge of timber, and theree stricke off, and afterward his body with the head, was entered at Windfor, beside the body of K. Edward.

(45) A maruillous case it is to heare, either of the warnings that hee should haue voided, or the to- kens of that hee could not auoid: for the self night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a trusty secret Messenger vnto him at Midnight in all the haste, re- quiring him to rise, and ride away with him, for he was utterly disposed no longer to abide, hee had so fearefull a dreame: in which hee thought, that a Bore with his tuskes, so razed them both by the heades, that the blood ranne about both their shoulders. And forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Bore for his cognizance, this dreame made so fearefull an im- pression in his heart, that hee was throughly deter- mined no longer to tarry, but had his horse ready, if the Lord Hastings would goe with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they would be out of danger before it was day. Ah good Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings to the Messenger) leaue me my Lord thy Master so much to such trifles, and hath faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantaileth, or doe rise in the nights rest, by reason of the dayes thoughts? Tell him it is plaine Witch- craft, to beleue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh hee not, that we might be as likely to make them true, by our going, if we were caught and brought back (as friends saile liers) for then had the Bore a cause likely to rafe vs with his tuskes, as men that fled for some fallhood: wherefore, either there is no perill, nor none there is indeed, or if any be, it is rather in going then abiding. And if wee must needs fall in perill, one way or other, yet had I rather, that men should see, it were by other mens fallhood, then thinke it our fault or faint-heart. And therefore goe to thy Master man, and commend me to him; and pray him to be merry and haue no feare; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man that hee wortheth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send Grace Sir (said the Messenger) and went his way.

(46) Certaine it is also, that in riding towards the Tower the same morning in which hee was be- headed, his horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to the fallings; which thing, albeit each man knoweth daily hapneth, to them to whom no such mischance is toward, yet hath it beene of an olde rite and custome obserued, as a token of offen- times, notably foregoing some great misfortune: Now this that followeth was no warning, but an enuious scorne. The same morning before hee was vp, came a Knight vnto him, as it were of curre- sle, to accompany him to the Counsell; but of truth sent by the Protector, to haue him thither- wards, with whom hee was of secret confederacy in that purpose, a meane man at that time, but now of great authority. This Knight, when it hapned the Lord Chamberlain by the way to stay his horse, and commune a while with a Priest whom hee met in Towerstreet, brake his tale, and said merrily to him; what my Lord, I pray you come on, wherto talke you so long with a Priest, you haue no need of a Priest yet, and therewith laughed vpon him, as though hee would say, yee shall haue soone. But so little wist the other what hee meant, and so little mistrusted his present perill, as hee neuer was mer- rier, nor neuer so full of good hope in his life, which selfe thing is often scene a signe of change; but I shall rather let any thing passe me, then the vaine surety of mans mind so neere his death. Vpon the very Tower-wharfe, so neere the place where his head was strooke off soone after, there met he with one Hastings, a Purfuant of his owne name. And of their meeting in that place, hee was put in re- membrance of another time, in which it had happe- ned them before, to meet in the like manner to- gether in the same place. At which other time the L. Chamberlaine had beene accus'd vnto King Edward by the Lord Rivers the Queenes brother, in such wise as hee was for the while, (but it lasted not long) farre fallen into the Kings indignation, and stood in great feare of himselfe. And forasmuch as hee now mette this Purfuant in the same place, that ieopardy so well passed, it gaue him great plea- sure to talke with him thereof; with whom hee had before talked thereof in the same place, while hee was therein. And therefore hee said, ah Hastings, art thou remembered that I met thee once here with a heauy heart? yea my Lord (quoth hee) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they got no good, nor you no great harme. Thou wouldst say so (quoth hee) if thou knewst so much as I know, which few know else as yet, and more shall shortly. That ment hee by the Lords of the Queenes kindred, which were taken before, and should that same day be beheaded at Pomfret: which hee well wist, but was nothing aware, that the axe hung ouer his owne head; In faith man (quoth hee) I was neuer so for- ry, nor neuer stood in so great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here. ger (as thou maist hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life fo merry, nor neuer in so great surety. Oh good God, the blindnes of our mortall nature, when he most feared he was in good fortune, when he reckened himselfe sure, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man, a good Knight and a gentle, of great authority with his Prince, of liuing somewhat dissolute, plaine and open to his enemies, and secret to his friends, easie to be beguiled, as he that of good heart & courage forestudied no perils, a louing man, a passing well beloued: very faithful, and trusty enough, trusting indeed too much. Now flew the fame of this Lords death swiftly through the Citie, and from thence further, like a winde in euery mans eare.

(47) But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to see some colour vpon the matter, sent in all haste for many substantiall men, out of the Citie into the Tower, at whose coming thither, himselfe with the Duke of Buckingham, stood harness'd in olde rusty briganders, such as no more, man should weene, that they would vouchsafe to haue put on their backs, except that some suddain necessity, had constrained them thereto. And then the Protector shewed them, that the Lord Chamberlaine, and others of his conspiracy, had contriued to haue suddainly destroyed him and the Duke there the same day in Counsell. And what they intended further, was not yet well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge, before ten of the clocke, the same forenoone, which suddain feare droue them to put on for their defence, such harness as came next to hand: and so had God holpen them, that the mischief returned vpon them that would haue done it: and this he requiured them to report.

(48) Euerie man answered him faire, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which ofruth no man beleued; yet for the further appeasing of the peoples minde, he sent immediately after dinner, in all haste, an Herald of Armes, with a Proclamation to be made through the Citie in the Kings name, containing that the Lord Hastings with diuers others of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same day, to haue slaine the Lord Protector, and Duke of Buckingham, sitting in the Counsell, and after to haue taken vpon them, to rule the King and the Realme, at their owne pleasures; thereby to pill and spoile, whom they listed vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that Proclamation, deuised to the slander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an euill Counsellor to the Kings father, entitling him to many things, highly redounding to his great dishonour, and to the vniuersall hurt of his Realme, by his euill company, sinister procuring, & vngracious example aswell in many other things, as in the vicious liuing, and inordinate abusion of his body, both with many others, and especially with Shores wife, who was one also of his most secret Counsell, in this hainous treason, with whom he lay nightly, and namely, the night last past, before his death, so that it was the lesse maruell, if vngracious liuing brought him to an vnhappy ending, which he was now put vnto, by the most dread commandement of the Kings highnesse, and of his honorable and faithfull Counsell, both for his demerits, being so openly taken in his falsely conceiued treason, as also least the delaying of his execution, might haue encouraged other mischieuous persons partners of his conspiracy, to gather and assemble themselves together in making some great commotion for his deliuerance, whose hope being now by his well-deferred death politickely repressed, all the Realme should by Gods grace, rest in good quiet and peace.

(49) Now was this Proclamation made within two houres, after that he was beheaded, and was so curiously indited, and so faire written in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, as euery child might perceiue, that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death, and the proclaiming, could scant haue sufficed vnto the bare writing alone; had it bene but in paper, and scribled forth in haste aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was Schoole-master of Pauls, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnes of the time, with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him; Here is a gay goodly cast, foule cast away for half: and a Merchant answered him; that it was written by Prochiec. Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetousnesse, the Protector sent the Sheriffs of London, into the house of Shores wife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled her of all that shee had, about the value of three thousand marks, carrying her through London vnto the Tower, and there left her Prisoner, where (for fashion sake) he laid to her charge, that shee went about to bewitch him, and that shee was of Counsell with the Lord Chamberlaine to destroy him: in conclusion, when no colour could falten vpon these matters, then laid hee hainously vnto her charge, the thing that her selfe could not deny, that all the world wist was true, and that neither shee euery man laughed at, to heare it then so suddainly, so highly taken, that shee was nought of her body. And for that cause (as a good continent Prince, cleare and faultlesse himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious world for the amendment of mens manners) after shee had laine Prisoner in Ludgate, he caused the Bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the Crosse in procession vpon a Sunday, with a taper in her hand. In which shee went in countenance and pace demure so womanly, and albeit shee were out of all array save her kirtle only, yet went shee so faire and lowely, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comly rud in her cheekes (of which before shee had most mist) that her great shame, wan her much praise, among those that were more amorous of her body, then curious of her soule. And many good folke also that hated her liuing, and glad to see sinne so corrected, yet pitied the more her penance, then reioiced therein, when they considered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any vertuous affection.

(50) This woman was borne in London, worshipfully friended, honestly brought vp, and very well married, sauing somewhat too fowly; her husband an honest Citizen, young, and goodly, and of good substance. But for as much as they were coupled ere shee were well ripe, shee not very feruently loued, for whom shee neuer longed; which was happily the thing that the more made her incline vnto the Kings appetite, when he requiured her. Howbeit the respect of his royalty, the hope of gay apparel, ease, pleasure and other wanton wealth, was able soone to pierce a soft tender heart. But when the King had abused her, anone her husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his good, not presuming to rouch a Kings concubine) left her vp to him altogether. When the King died, the Lord Chamberlaine tooke her, which in the Kings daies, albeit he was fore enamoured vpon her, yet he forbore her, either for reuerence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulness: proper shee was, and faire; nothing in her body that you could haue changed, vnlesse you would haue wished her somewhat higher. Thus they say that knew her in her youth. Albeit some that now see her (for as yet shee liueth) deeme her neuer to haue bene well visaged, whose iudgement seemeth to me somewhat like, as though we could gesse the beauty of one long before departed, by her scalpe taken out of the Charnell house: for now shee is olde, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but riuelled skinnie, and hard bone; and yet being cun such, who so well aduise her visage, might gesse and deuise, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face.

face. Yet delighted not men, so much in her beauty, as in her pleasant behauiour, for a proper wit shee had, and could both reade well and write, merry in company, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure, and not without disport: in whom King Edward tooke speciall pleasure, whose fauour to say the truth (for sinne it were to belie the Duell) she neuer abused to any mans hurt, but to many a mans comfort and reliefe, when the King took displeasure, shee would mitigate and appeale his mind; where men were out of fauour, shee would bring them in his grace, for many that highly offended shee obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures shee gave them remission. And finally, in many weighty suites shee stood many men in great debt, either for none, or very small rewards, and those rather gay then rich, either for that shee was content with the deed it selfe well done, or for that shee delighted to be used vnto, and to shew what shee was able to do with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy, bee not alwaies couetous. I doubt not some shall thinke this woman too flight a thing to be written of, and yet among the remembrances of great matters: which they shall specially thinke, that happily hath euened her onely by that they now see her. But to my seeming, the chance is so much the more worthy to be remembered, in how much shee is now in the more beggerly condition, vnfriended, and worne out of acquaintance, after good substance, after so great fauour with a Prince, after so great suit, and seeking to, of all those, that in those dayes had businesse to speede, as many other men were in their times, which bee now famous onely by the infamy of their ill deedes: her doings were not much lesse, albeit they bee much lesse remembered, because they were not so euill: for men vfe, if they recieue an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who so doth vs a good turne, we write it in the dust; which is notworst proued by her: for at this day shee beggeth of many, at this day liuing, that at this day had begged if shee had not bene.

(51) Now it was so deuised by the Protector and his Counsell, that the selfe same day in which the Lord Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe same howre was then (not without his assent) beheaded at Ponffrait, the fore-remembered Lords and Knights, that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony-Stratford; which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whose seruice the Protector specially vfed in that counsell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene long secret with him, hauing experience of the world, and a shrewd witte, short and rude in speech, rough and boisterous of behauiour, bolde in mischief, as farre from pity, as from all feare of God. This Knight bringing them out of prison to the Scaffold, and shewing to the people present, that they were Traitors, not suffering them to speake, or declare their innocency, lest their wordes might haue inclined men to pity them, and to hate the Protector and his part; caused them hastily without Iudgement, processe or manner of order to bee beheaded, and without all guilt, but onely that they were good men, too true to the King, and too nigh to the Queene.

(52) Now when the Lord Chamberlaine, and those other Lords and Knights were thus beheaded and ridde out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men mused what the matter meant, while the Lords of the Realme were about him out of their owne strengthes, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whom to trust, before they should haue space to disparte, and digest the matter, and make parties, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the Crown, ere men could haue time to deuise how to resist. But now was all the study, by what means the matter being of it selfe so hainous, might be first broken to the people in such wise as it might bee well taken: To this counsell they tooke diuers, such as they thought meet to bee trusted, likely to bee induced to that part, and able to stand them in stead, eyther by power or policy: Among whom they made of counsell Edmond Shaa Knight, then Maior of London, who vpon truist of his owne aduancement, whereof he was of a proud heart, highly desirous, should frame the Citie to their appetite. Of Spiritual men they tooke such as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people, for opinion of their learning; and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they Iohn Shaa Clerke brother to the Maior; and Fryer Pinker Provinciall of the Augustine Friars, both of them Doctors in Diuinity, both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, and of more fame then learning; for they were before greatly esteemed of the common people; but after that neuer. Of these two, the one made a Sermon in prayse of the Protector before the Coronation; the other after, both so full of tedious flattery, as no mans eare could abide them.

(53) Pinker in his Sermon so lost his voice, that he was forced to laue off, and came downe in the middest. Doctor Shaa by his sermon lost his honesty, and soone after his life, for very shame of the world, into which he durst neuer after come abroad. But the Fryer forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt, and many thinke, that Pinker was not of counsell in the matter before the Coronation, but after the common manner, fell to flattery after: namely, sith his sermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at S. Maries Hospitall in the Easter weeke following. But certaine it is, that Doctor Shaa was of counsell in the beginning, so farre forth as they determined that he should first break the matter in a Sermon at Pauls Crosse, in which hee should by the authority of his preaching, incline the people to the Protector's ghostly purpose. But now was all the labour and study, in the deuise of some conuenient pretext; for which the people should bee content to depose the Prince, and accept the Protector for King. In which diuers things they deuised: but the chiefe thing and the weightiest of all, the inuention rested in this, that they should alludge bastardy, either in K. Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both. So that hee should seeme disabled to inherit the Crowne, by the Duke of Torke, and the Prince by him. To lay bastardie in King Edward, founded openly to the rebuke of the Protector's owne mother, who was mother to them both: for in that point could bee none other colour, but to pretend that his owne mother was an adulteresse, which notwithstanding to further the purpose hee letted not: but yet, hee would that point should bee lesse, and more fauourably handled, not fully plaine and directly, but that the matter should be touched aslopp, and craftily, as though men spared in that point to speake all the truth for feare of his displeasure. But the other point, concerning the bastardie that they deuised to surmise in K. Edwards children, that would hee should bee openly declared, and enforced to the vttermost. The colour and pretext whereof, was a contract pretended to be made by King Edward vnto the Lady Lucy, whereof we haue spoken in the raigne of the said King: which inuention how simple soeuer, yet it liked them, to whom it sufficed to haue somewhat to say, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger proof then themselves list to make.

(54) Now then it was by the Protector and his Counsell concluded, that Doctor Shaa should signifie in his sermon aforesaid, that neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begot, nor were the very Children of the Duke of Torke, but begot vnlawfully by other persons, by adulterie of the Dutches their mother. And also that that dame Elizabeth Lucy was verily the wife of K. Edward, and so the Prince and all his other children begot by the Queene, were all of them bastards. And according to this deuile Doctor Shas vpon Sunday the nineteenth of Iune at Pauls Crosse in a frequent assembly, took for the theme of his sermō this saying, Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas: Bastard slips shall neuer take deepe roote. Whereupon, when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and feerely infundeth in right generation after the lawes of Matrimonic, then declared he, that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents, were for the more part vnhappy, which were begot in bale, but specially in adultery. Of which though some by the ignorance of the world, and the truth hid from knowledge inherite for the time other mens lands, yet God alwaies so prouideth, that it continueth not in their blood long, but the truth coming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the bastards slip pulled vp ere it can take any deepe roote. And when he had laid for the prooffe and confirmation of this sentence certain examples taken out of the old testament, and other ancient histories, then he began to descend into the praise of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, calling him the father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the Crowne, to whom it was after the death of King Henry the sixth, entailed by authority of Parliament. Then shewed he, that the verie right heire of his body lawfully begotten, was only the Lord Protector. For he declared then that King Edward was neuer lawfully married vnto the Queene, but was before God, husband vnto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the houshold, were reckoned very certainly for the children of the Noble Duke, as those that by their features, resembled other knowne men, more then him from whose vertuous conditions, he said also, that King Edward was farre off. But the Lord Protector he said, the very Noble Prince, the speciall pattern of Knighthood prowesse, as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, representing the very face of the noble Duke his father: This is he (quoth he) the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the very vndoubted Image, and plaine expresse likenesse of that noble Duke.

Shas himselfe assertions.

The Preachers intention pre-erected.

(55) Now it was before deuiled, that in the speaking of these words, the Protector should haue come in among the people to the sermon ward, to the end that those words meeting with his presence, might haue bene taken among the hearers, as though the holy Ghost had put them in the Preachers mouth, and should haue moued the people euen then to crye, King Richard, King Richard, that it might haue bene after said, that he was specially chosen by God, and in manner by miracle. But this deuile quailed, either by the Protectors negligence, or by the Preachers ouer much diligence, for while the Protector found by the way tarrying, left he should preuent those wordes, and the Doctor fearing lest he should come ere his sermon could come to these wordes, halted his matter thereto, who was come to them and past them, and had entred into other matter ere the Protector came. Whom when he beheld coming, he suddainly left the matter with which he was in hand, and without anie deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repeat those wordes againe: This is the verie Noble Prince, the speciall pattern of Knighthood prowesse, which as well in all Princely behauiour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, representeth the very face of the Noble Duke of Yorke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the sure vndoubted Image, the plaine expresse likenesse of the noble Duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he liueth. While these wordes were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people, into the place where the Doctors commonly stand in an vpper story, where he stood to heare the sermon. But the people were so farre from crying King Richard, that they stood as if they had bene turned into stones, for wonder of this shameful sermon. After which once ended, the Preacher got him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept himselfe out of sight like an Owle. And when he once asked one, that had bene his old friend, what the people talked of him, albeit that his own conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in euery mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so stricke him to the heart, that within few daies after, he withered and consumed away.

(56) On the Tuesday following this sermon, there came into the Guild-hall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuers Lords & Knights, more perchance then knew the message which they brought. And there in the East end of the Hall, where the Maior keepeth the hussings, the Maior, and Aldermen being assembled about him, and all the commons of the City gathered before him: after silence commanded in the Protectors name vpon great paine, the Duke stood vp, and as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature marvellously well spoken) he said vnto the people with a cleare and loud voice in this manner. Friends, for the zeale and hartie fauour that we beare you, we be come to breake vnto you, a matter of great weight, and no lesse weighty, then pleasing to God, and profitable to all the Realme: nor to no part of the Realme more profitable then to you the Citizens of this noble City. For why, the thing that we wot well you haue long time lacked, and so longed for, that you would haue giuen great good for, that you would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing we be come hither to bring you, without your labour, paine, cost, aduenture or leoparchie. What thing is that? Certes, the fury of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wiues, and your daughters, the safeguard of your goods: of all which things in times past you stood euermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that could account himselfe Lord of his owne goods, among so many snares and traps as were set therefore, among so much pillaging and polling, among so many taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, and often times no need: or if any were, it rather grew of riot, and vnreasonable wast, then any necessary or honorable charge: So that there was daily pillaging from good men and honest, great substance of goods to be lashed out among vnthrifits, so farre forth that fiftene sufficed not, nor any viall manner of known taxes; but vnder an easie name of beneuolence and good will, the Commissioners so much of euerie man tooke, as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence, had signified that euery man should pay not what himselfe of his owne good will list to grant, but what the King of his good will list to take. Who neuer asked little, but euery thing was haunted about the measure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ranlomes; small trespasses into misprision; misprision into treason. Whereof I thinke no man looketh that we should remember you of examples by name, as though Burdels were forgotten, who was for a worde in haste spoken, cruelly beheaded, by the misconstituting of the Lawes of this Realme for the Princes pleasure: with no lesse honour to Markham, chief Justice, that left his office rather then hee would assent to that iudgement, then to the dishonesty of those, that eyther for feare or flattery gaue that iudgement. this year wardship is left to others.

Citie, who is of you either so negligent that hee knoweth not, or so forgetful that hee remembereth not, or so hard hearted that hee pitieth not that worshipfull mans losse? What speake we of losse? His vnter spoile and vnderferued destruction, only for that it happened those to fauour him whom the Prince fauoured nor. Wee need not (I suppose) to rehearse of these any more by name, sith there be (I doubt not) many heere present, that either in themselves, or in their high friends, haue knowne afwell their goods, as their persons greatly endangered, either by fained quarrels, or small matters agriued with heinous names, And also there was no crime so great, of which there could lacke a pretext. For sith the King preuenting the time of his inheritance, attained the Crowne by battell, it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason, to haue bene of kindred or aliance, neer familiaritie, or longer acquaintance, with any of those that were at any time the Kings enemies, which was at one time or other more then halfe the Realme. Thus were your goods neuer in suretie, and yet they brought your bodies in leoparchie, beside the common aduenture of open warre, which albeits, that it is euer the will and occasion of much mischief, yet it is neuer so mischieuous, as where any people fall at distance among themselves, nor in no earthly nation so deadly & so pestilent, as when it happeneth among vs: and among vs neuer so long continued disention, nor so many battells in that season, nor so cruell and so deadly fought as was in that Kings dayes that dead is. God forgieue it his foule. In whose time, and by whose occasion, what about the getting of the Garland, keeping it, loosing it, and winning againe, it hath cost more English blood, then hath twice the winning of France: In which inward warre among our selues, hath bene so great effusion of the ancient noble blood of this Realme, that scarcely the halfe remaineth, to the great infecting of this noble Land, beside many a good Towne ranfacked, and spoiled by them that haue bene going to the field, or coming from thence. And peace long after not much furer then warre. So that no time there was, in which rich men for their money, and great men for their Lands, or fow or other for fow feare or some displeasure, were not out of perill; for whom trusted he, that mistrusted his owne brother? or who could perfectly loue him, if his owne brother could not? what manner of folke hee most fauoured, we shall for his honour spare to speake of; howbeit, this wot you well all, that who so was best, bare away least rule; and more suite was in those dayes vnto Shores wife, a vile and abominable strumper, then to all the Lords in England, except vnto those that made her their Protector: which simple woman was well named, and honest, till the King for his wanton lust, and sinnefull affection, bereft her from her husband, a right honest substantiall yong man among you. And in that point, which in good faith I am sorry to speake of, fauouring that it is in vaine to keepe in counsell that thing which euery man knoweth; the Kings greedy appetite was insatiable, and euery where ouer all the Realme intollerable, for no woman there was any where, yong or olde, rich or poore, whom hee let his eie vpon, in whom hee liked any thing, either person, or fauour, speech, pace, or countenance, but without all feare of God, or any respect of his owne honour, murmur, or grudge of the world, he would importunately pursue his appetite, and haue her, to the great destruction of many a good woman, and great dolour to their husbands and other their friends, which being honest people of themselves, so much regard the cleanness of their house, the chastitie of their wiues, and their daughters, that they had rather loose all they had besides, then to haue such a vil-lany done against them: And albeit, that with this and his other importable dealings, the Realme was in euery part annoyed; yet specially, you heere the Citizens of this noble Citie, as well for that amongst you is most plenty of all such things, as minister matters to such iniuries, as for that you were neere at hand, seeing that neere heereabout was commonly his most abiding. And yet you bee the people whom he had a singular cause well and kindly to entreat, as any part of the Realme, not onely, for that the Prince by this noble Citie, as his speciall Chamber, and the speciall well renowned Citie of his Realme, much honourable fame rectiue amongst all other nations: but also for that yee, not without your great cost, andundry perils and leoparchies in all his warres, bare out your speciall fauour to his part, which your kind mindes botne vnto the house of Yorke, sith he hath nothing worthily acquitted, there is one of that house, that now by Gods grace, better shall: which thing to shew you is the whole summe and effect of this our present errand. It shall nor, I wot well, need that I rehearse you againe, that yee haue already heard of him that can better tell it, and of whom I am sure you will better beleue it, and reason is it so to be. I am not so proud to looke therefore, that you should recken my words of as great authority, as the Preachers of the word of God; namely, a man so learned and so wise, that no man better wotteth what he should say, and thereto so good and vertuous, as he would not say the thing which hee wist hee should not say in the Pulpit; namely, into the which no honest man commeth to lye: which honourable Preacher, you well remember, substantially declared at Pauls Crosse, on Sunday last past, the right and title that the most excellent Prince, Richard Duke of Gloucester, now Protector of this Realme, hath vnto the Crowne and Kingdome of the same. For as the Worshipfull Doctor substantially made knowne vnto you, the children of King Edward the fourth were neuer lawfully begotten, forasmuch as the King (leaving his very wife Dame Elizabeth Lucy) was neuer lawfully married vnto the Queen their mother, whose blood, suuing that he set his voluptuous pleasure before his honour, was full vnincited to be matched with his; and the mingling of those bloods together hath bin the effusion of great part of the noble blood of this Realme. Whereby it may well seeme, the marriage was not well made, of which there is so much mischief growne. For lack of which lawful coupling, as also other things, which the said worshipfull Doctor signified, then fully explained; and which things shall not be spoken for mee, as the thing wherein euery man forbearth to say what hee knoweth, in auoyding displeasure of my noble Lord Protector; bearing, as nature requirith, a filiall reuerence to the Duke, chesse his mother: For these causes I say, before remembred, that is, for lacke of other liue lawfully committing of that late noble Prince Richard Duke of Yorke, to whose royall blood, the crowne of England and France, is by the high authoritie of Parliament entailed, the right and title of the same, is by the iust court of inheritance, according to the common law of this Land, deuolued and come vnto the most excellent Prince the Lord Protector, as to the very lawfully begotten sonne, of the fore-remembered noble Duke of Yorke. Which thing well considered, and the great knighthood prowesse pondered, with manifold vertues, which in his noble person singularly abound, the nobles and commons also of this Realme, and specially of the North part, not willing any bastard blood to haue the rule of the Land, nor the abuses before the same vfed, any longer to continue, haue condiscended, and fully determined, to make humble petition to the most puissant Prince the Lord Protector, that it may like his Grace at our London the kings especiall Chamber.

The end of the Dukes errand.

The great modesty that the Duke pretendeth.

An author like the lubber.

The marriage of King Edward impudently a great mischief.

The Protector must be the only true heire to his father, and so to the Crowne.

"humble request, to take vpon him the guiding and gouernance of this Realme, to the wealth and encrease of the same, according to his very right and iust title. Which thing I know well, hee will be loth to take vpon him, as he wholewisedome well perceiue, the labour and study both of minde and body, that shall come therewith, to whomsoever will occupy the roome, as I dare say he will, if hee take it. Which roome, I warne you well, is no childes office: and that the great wiseman well perceiued, when hee sayd, Pro regno cuius Rex puer est: Vnde in that Realme that hath a child to their King. Wherefore so much the more cause wee haue to thanke God, that this noble Personage, which so righteously is intituled thereunto, is of so fad age, and so great wisdomedome, ioyned with so great experience: which albeit hee will be loth (as I haue sayd) to take it vpon him, yet shall hee to our petition in that behalfe, the more graciously incline, if you the Worshippful Citizens of this the chiefe Citie of this Realme, ioyned with vs the Nobles in this our sayd request. Which for your owne weale we doubt not but you will, and naythelesse, I heartily pray you to doe, whereby yee shall doe great profit to all the Realme beside, in choosing them to good a King, and vnto your selues speciall commoditie, to whom his Maiestie shall euer after beare so much the more tender fauour, in how much hee shall perceiue you the more prone and benciuolently minded towards his election. Wherein deere friends, what minde you haue, wee require you plainely to shew vs.

(57) When the Duke had sayd, & looked that the people who he hoped the Maior had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cryed, King Richard, King Richard; all was hush and mute, and not a word answered thereunto: wherewith the Duke was maruailously abashed, & taking the Maior neerer to him, with other that were about him priuie to that matter, said vnto him softly, What meaneth this, that the people bee so silent? Sir (quoth the Maior) perchance they perceiue you not well, that shall we mend (quoth hee) if that will helpe. And by and by somewhat lower, hee rehearsed them the same matter againe, in other order and other words, so well and ornately, so euidently and plaine, with voice, gesture, & countenance so comely, that euery man much maruailled that heard him, and thought they neuer had in their hearing, so euill a tale well told. But were it for wonder or feare, or that each man lookt that other speake first; not a word was there answered of all the people that stood before, but was as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning among themselves, by which they might seeme to commune what was best to doe. When the Lord Maior saw this, hee with the other partners of that counsell drew about the Duke, and sayd, That the people had not bene accustomed there to bee spoken vnto, but by the Recorder, who is the mouth of the Citie, and happely to him they will answer. With that the Recorder called Fitz-William, a sad man and an honest, who was so newly come into that office, that hee neuer had spoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to beginne; notwithstanding, thereunto commanded by the Maior, he made rehearsal to the commons, of that the Duke had twice rehearsed to them himselfe. But the Recorder so tempered his tale, that hee shewed euery thing as the Dukes words, and no part of his owne. But all this noting, no change made in the people, which stood gazing at the bench as men altogether amazed. Whereupon the Duke rownd vnto the Maior, and said, This is maruailous obstinate silence, and therewith hee turned vnto the people againe with these wordes: Deare friends, wee come to moue you to that thing which peraduenture we not so greatly needed, but that the Lords of this Realme and the Commons of other parts might haue sufficed, sauing that wee beare you such loue, and so much set by your friendship, that wee would not willingly do without you the thing which is for our honour and your wealth, which as it seemeth, either you see not, or wey not; wherefore we require you, giue vs answer, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the Realme bee, to haue this noble Prince now Protector, to be your King or not.

(58) At which words the people beganne to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voyce was neither loud nor distinct, but as it were the sound of a swarme of Bees, till at the last, in the nether end of the hall, a bushment of the Dukes seruants, and Nathfields, and of others belonging to the Protector, with some prentises and laddes that thrust into the hall among the presse, beganne so dainely at mens backs to cry out as loud as their throats would giue, King Richard, King Richard, & threw vp their caps in token of ioy. But they that stood before, cast backe their heades, maruelling thereat, yet nothing they said. And when the Duke and Maior saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly cry, and a ioyfull, to heare euery man with one voice, no man saying nay: wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) since that wee well perceiue that it is all your whole minds to haue this noble man for your King, whereof we shall make to his Grace so effectually report, that we doubt not, but it shall redound vnto your great wealth, and commoditie: we require that to morrow you goe with vs, and wee with you vnto his Noble Grace, to make our humble request vnto him in manner before remembred. And therewith the Lords came downe, and the assembly dissolved for the most part sad, some with glad semblances, and yet not very merry, yea and some that came with the Duke, not able to dissemble their sorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wal, while the dolour of their heart burst out of their eyes.

(59) On the next morning, the Mayor with all the Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the City in their best array, assembling themselves together, resorted vnto Baynards Castle in Thames street, where the Protector lay. To which place repayed also according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers noble men with him, beside many Knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke sent word vnto the Lord Protector, of the being there of a great and honourable company, to moue a great matter vnto his Grace: wherupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if hee first knew some part of their errand, as though he doubted, and partly distrustful the coming of such a number vnto him so sodainly, without any warning, or knowledge whether they came for good or harme; then the Duke when hee had shewed this vnto the Maior and other, that they might thereby see, how little the Protector looked for this matter; they then sent vnto him by the Messenger such louing message againe, and therewith he humbly besought him to vouchsafe, that they might resort to his presence, to propole their intent, which they would not impart to any other person; that at the last hee came out of his chamber, and yet not down vnto them, but stood aboue in a gallery ouer them, where they might see him & speake to him, as though hee would not yet come too neere them, till hee understood what they meant. And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his Grace would pardon them, and licence them to propole vnto his Grace, the intent of their coming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be so bold to moue him in their suite. In which albeit they meant as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the Realm beside; yet were they not sure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend. Then the Protector (as he was very gentle of himselfe, and also longed sore to know what they meant) gaue him leaue to propole what him liked, verily trusting for the good mind that he bare them all, none of them would intend any thing to himward, wherewith hee ought to be grieved.

(60) When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waxed hee bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them thereunto, as you haue heard before: and finally, to beseech his Grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodness and zeale vnto the realm now with his eye of pittie, to behold the long continued distresse, and decay of the same, and to set his gracious hands to redresse an amendment thereof, by taking vpon him the Crowne and gouernment of the land; according to his right and title lawfully defended vnto him, and to the law of God, profit of the Realme, and vnto his grace so much the more honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer Prince reigned ouer any people that were so glad to liue vnder his obedience, as the people of this land vnder his.

(61) When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were, he partly knew the things by them alleged to be true, yet such intire loue he bare vnto King Edward and his children, that so much more he regarded his honour in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous, that he could not finde in his heart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other Nations where the truth was not well knowne, it would peraduenture be thought, that it was his own ambitious minde and deuise, to depose the Prince, and to take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie he would not haue his honour stained foranie Crowne, in which he had euer perceiued much more labour and paine, then pleasure to him that would so vie it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding hee not only pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hartly fauour they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whom hee was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as should like the King to vie him, he would doe his vttermost endeouour to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little time of his Protectorship (the praise be giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before, occasion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now partly by good pollicy, partly more by Gods speciall providence, then mans prouision repressed.

(62) Vpon this answer giuen, the Duke by the Protectors licence, a little rownd, as well with other noble men about him, as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that, vpon like pardon desired and obtained, he shewed aloude vnto the Protector for a final conclusion, that the Realme was at a point, King Edwards line should not any longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, as it was now no surety to retreat, as for that they thought it was for the weale vniuersall to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore if it would like his grace to take the Crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseech him thereunto; if he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrary, which they would be loth to heare, then must they needs seeke, and would not faile to finde some other noble man that would.

These words much moued the Protector, which else as euery man may know, would neuer of likelihood haue inclined thereunto. But when hee saw there was none other way, but that either hee must take it, or else he, and his both goe from it, hee said vnto the Lords and commons.

(63) Sith wee well perceiue that all the Realme is so set, whereof we be very sorry, that they will not suffer in any wise King Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no earthly man can gouerne against their wills, and well we also perceiue, that no man there is to whom the Crowne can by iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as very right heire lawfully begotten of the body of our most deare father Richard late Duke of York, to which title is now ioined your election, the Nobles and Commons of this Realme, which we of all title possible take for the most effectually: we be content, and agree fauorably to incline to your petition and request, and according to the same, we here take vpon vs the roiall estate, preeminence, and kingdom of the two noble realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, by vs and our heires, to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and subdue, and establish for euer in due obedience vnto this Realm of England, the advancement whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue, then we intend to procure. With this there was a great shout, crying King Richard, King Richard. And then the Lords went vp to the King (for so was hee from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuerfly of the matter, euery man as his fantasie gaue him.

(64) Much was talked, and maruelled at the manner of this dealing, that the matter was made so strange vnto both parties, as though they neuer had communed either with others before, when as themselves with there was no man so dull that heard them, but perceiued well enough, that all the matter was so made betwene them. Howbeit, some excused that againe, and said all must be done in good order: And men must sometimes for manners sake, not beacknowen what they know: for at the consecration of a Bishop, euery man woteth well, by the paying for his bulles, that he purposeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else, and yet must hee twice be asked, whether he will be a Bishop or no, and hee must twice say nay, and at the third time take it, as compelled thereunto by his owne will. And in a Stage-play the people know right well, that he who plaieeth the Sowdaine, is perforce a fower, yet if one should know so little good, to shew out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name, while he standeth in his maiesty, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head worthily for marring of the plaie.

(65) The raigne of this yong King may well be accounted an interregnum without King, as well for his minoritie being vnder the rule of a Protector himselfe, as for the short time wherein he continued the name of a King; which onlie was two monethes and sixtene daies, and in them also hee fate vncrowned without Scepter or ball, all which Richard aimed at, and perfidiously got, before they could come to his head; or into his hands. His age at the death of his father and entrance into his throne was eleuen yeeres five monethes and five daies, and within three monethes after, was with his brother smothered to death in the Tower of London, as shall be shewed in his Raigne, of whom we are now by order of succession to write.

Richard III.

RICHARD THE THIRD, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, ISSVE AND DEATH.

For the most part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

CHAPTER XIX.

Richard, the third sonne of Richard Duke of Yorke, born at Fotheringhay Castle in the County of Northampton, was first honoured with the title of Gloucester, being the third Duke of that number, & consequently by usurpation crowned King of England, the third of that name, a name indeed noted to the Kings so called, to bee euer ominous; and the title of Gloucester to those Dukes euer fatal, all of them both, dying violent and vntimely deaths, which ought to haue bene the more fearefull vnto Richard, now hauing possession and interest in them both. But that not regarded, or destiny enforcing, his aspiring mind gaue him no rest, till his restless body found it lastly in the graue. For his brother deceased when his life was most desired, no man in shew tooke his death so heauily as himselfe, or tendered the young King with a more honourable respect, when as (God knowes) his mind ranne vpon deepe reaches, how to compasse the wreath for his owne head; which the better to fashion, hee withdrew a while into the North, and at Yorke in most sad and solemne manner obserued the Funerals of the dead King: but howsoeuer the Maske couered this subtle Dukes face from the eie of the multitude; yet Buckingham well knew the ambitious desire of his aspiring heart, and indeed was the Dedalus that made him the wings, wherewith he mounted so neere vnto the Sun, as that the wax melting (like the high-minded young Icarus) he caught his last fall.

(2) What

All the Richardes and Dukes of Gloucester came to vntimely deaths. Richard 1. being with an arrow. Richard 2. murdered at Pomfret. The Woodstocke murdered to death. Humphrey murdered at S. Edmundsbury. Richard 3. slain at Bosworth field.

Duke Rike subtilly plotted for Crowne.

The Duke Buckingham the onely of the Prince

(2) What intendments they had before the Kings death, is vncertaine, though it may be suspected: but sure it is, he now gone, the Duke of Buckingham twice solicited Gloucester by his messengers in the North, met him at Northampton himselfe, accompanied him to London, forwarded him in Council, and was the first Actor in this following tragedy. For first making him Protector, procuring his young Nephew forth of Sanctuary, disabling the young King, bastardizing them both, perverting the Citizens, working the Nobility: and all this done, so set the Crowne vpon crook Richards head, and so moulded their minds vnto the man, as they all became humble petitioners vnto him for to accept of the same: who in the meane while had well conned his owne part, by profuse liberalitie, by passing great grauity, by singular affability, by ministering of iustice, and by deepe and close deuises, whereby hee wonne to himselfe the hearts of all, but the Lawyers especially, to serue best his turn, which was so affected, that in the name of all the States of the Realme, a Petition was drawne and presented him to accept the wearing of the Crown: the true copy wherof as we find it recorded in the Parliament Rol, we haue inserted, & is as followeth. In Rotulo Parliamenti teneti apud Westm. die Veneris Vicesimo tertio die Ianuarii, An. Regni Regis Richardi 3. primo inter alia continetur ut sequitur.

Memorandum quod quadam billa exhibitu fuit coram Domino Rege in Parlamento predicto in hac verba: Where late heretofore, that is to say, before the consecration, coronation, and inthronization of our soveraigne Lord the King, Richard the third, a roll of parchment containing in writing certaine Articles of the Tenor vnderwritten on the behalfe, and in the name of the three Estates of this Realme of England, that is to witte, of the Lords Spirituall & Temporall, and of the Commons by name, and diuers Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other Nobles and notable persons of the Commons in great multitude was presented and actually deliuered vnto our said Soueraigne Lord, the intent and effect expressed at large in the same roll: to the which Roll, and to the considerations, and instant petition comprised in the same, our said Soueraigne Lord for the publike weale and tranquillity of this land benignly assented. Now forasmuch as neither the said three Estates, neither the said persons which in their name presented, and deliuered as it is aforesaid, the said Roll vnto our said Soueraigne Lord the King, were assembled in forme of Parliament: by reason wherof diuers doubts, questions, and ambiguities becene moued, and engendered in the minds of diuers persons, as it is said: Therefore to the perpetual memory of the truth, and declaration of the same, be it ordained, provided, and established in this present Parliament, that the Tenor of the said roll, with all the contents of the same, presented as is aforesaid, and deliuered to our foresaid Soueraigne Lord the King, in the name and in the behalfe of the said three Estates out of Parliament, now by the same three Estates assembled in this present Parliament, and by authority of the same bee ratified, enrolled, recorded, approved, and authorized into remouing the occasions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawful effects that shall now thereof ensue: So that all things said, affirmed, specified, desired and remembered in the said roll, & in the tenor of the same vnderwritten in the name of the said 3. Estates, to the effect expressed in the same roll be of the like effect, vertue & force, as if al the same things had bin so said, affirmed, specified, desired & remembered in a full Parliament, and by authority of the same accepted & approved. The Tenor of the said Roll of parchment, wherof aboue is made mention, followeth, & is such.

To the high and Mighty Prince Richard Duke of Gloucester.

Please it your noble Grace to vnderstand the confi-deration, election and petition vnderwritten of vs, the Lords Spirituall & temporall, and Commons of this Realme of England, and thereunto agreeably to giue your assent to the common and publike weale of this land, to the comfort and gladnesse of all the people of the same. First, we consider how that heretofore in time past, this land many yeeres stood in great prosperitie, honour, and tranquillitie; which was caused, so much as the King then reigning, vied and followed the aduise and counsell of certaine Lords Spirituall and temporall, and other persons of approved sadnesse, prudence, policy, & experience, dreading God, and hauing tender zeale and affection to indifferent ministrations of iustice; and to the common and publike weale of the land: Then our Lord God was dread, loued and honoured, then within the land was peace and tranquillity, and among neighbours concord and charity, then the malice of outward enemies was mightilie resisted and repressed, and the land honourably defended with many great and glorious victories, then the entercourse of Merchants was largely vied and exercised: by which thinges aboue remembered, the land was greatly enriched, so that aswell the Merchants and Artificers, as other poore people labouring for their liuings in diuers occupations, had competent gaine to the sustentation of them & their households, liuing without miserable and intolerable poerty: but afterward, when that such as had the rule and gouernance of this land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by sensuality and concupiscence, followed the counsell of persons insolent, vicious, and of inordinate avarice, despising the counsell of good, vertuous, & prudent persons, such as aboue bee remembered; The prosperitie of this land dayly decreased, so that felicity was turned into misery, and prosperitie into aduersitie, and the order of policy, and of the law of God and Man confounded, whereby it is likely this Realme to fall into extreme misery and desolation (which God defend) without due prouision of couenable remedy bee had in this behalfe, in all goodly haste.

(3)ouer this, among other things more speciall wee consider, how that the time of the raigne of K. Edward the fourth late deceased, after the vngracious pretended marriage (as all England hath cause to say) made betwixt the said King Edward, and Elizabeth sometimes wife to Sir John Gray knight, late naming her selfe, and many yeeres heretofore Queene of England, the order of all politike rule was peruerterd, the lawes of God, and of Gods Church, and also the lawes of nature, and of England, and also of the laudable customes and liberties of the same, wherein euery English man is inheritor, broken, subuerted and contemned, against all reason and iustice, so that the land was ruled by selfe-will and pleasure, feare and dread, all manner of equity and law laide apart and despised, wherof ensued many inconueniences and mischiefs, as murders, extortions, and oppressions, namely of poore and impotent people, so that no man sure of his life, land or liuelyhood, nor of his wife, daughter nor seruant, euery good maiden and woman standing in dread to be rauished and deflowered: and besides this, what discords, inward battels, effusion of Christian mens blood, and namely, by the destruction of the Nobles blood of this land, was had and committed within the same, it is euident and notarie through all this Realme, vnto the great sorrow and heauinesse of all true Englishmen. And here also wee consider, how that the said pretended marriage betwixt the aboue named King Edward and Elizabeth Gray was made of great presumption without the knowing & assent of the Lords of this land, and also by forcery and witchcraft committed by the said Elizabeth and her mother Jaquet Dutcheffe of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the publike voice and fame is through all this land: and hereafter if the cause shall require, shall be produced.

The forme of the petition exhibited vnto the Protector.

Faire gloses vpon foule pieties.

O time how dost thou turne and art turned.

Flattery teares not how to report.

How can Princes rule to than reproach when they are dead.

The Queene & her mother fallie slandered.

ued sufficiently in time and place conuenient. And here also wee consider how that the said pretended marriage was made priuily and secretly without edition of banes in a private Chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the Church after the law of Gods Church, but contrary thereto, and the laudable custome of the Church of England. And how also that at the time of contract of the same pretended marriage, and before and long time after the said King Edward was and foot married, and troth-plight to one Dame Eleanor Butler daughter of the old Earle of Shrewsbury with whom the same Edward had made a precontract of Matrimonie long time before hee made the said pretended marriage with the said Elizabeth Grey, in manner and forme aforesaid: which Premises being true, as in very truth they be true: it appeareth, and followeth evidently, that the said King Edward during his life, and the said Elizabeth lived together sinfully and damnable in adultery against the law of God and of his Church: And therefore no maruell that the Soueraigne Lord, and the head of this land being of such vngodly disposition, and prouoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God; such heinous mischiefe and inconueniences as are aboue remembered, were vied and committed in the Realme among the Subjects. Also it appeareth evidently and followeth, that all the Issue and children of the said King Edward, beeing bastard and vnable to inherite, or to claime any thing by inheritance, by the law and custome of England.

(4) Moreover, we consider how that afterwards by the three Estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, holden at Westminster the 17. yeere of the reign of the said King Edward the fourth, hee then being in possession of the Crowne and royall estate, by Act made in the same Parliament, George Duke of Clarence brother to the said King Edward now deceased, was convicted and attainted of high treason, as in the same Act is contained more at large, by cause and reason whereof, all the Issue of the said George, was and is disabled and barred of all right and claime that in any case they might haue or challenge by inheritance to the Crowne and dignity royall of this Realme, by the ancient law and custome of this same Realme.

Over this wee consider that ye be the vndoubted sonne and heire of Richard late Duke of Yorke, very inheritor of the sayd Crowne and dignity royall; and as in right King of England by way of inheritance: and that at this time the premises duly considered there is none other person liuing, but ye only that by right may claime the said Crowne and dignity royall by way of inheritance, and how that ye be borne within this land; by reason whereof, as we deeme in our mindes, ye be more naturally enclined to the prosperitie and common weale of the same: and all the three estates of the Land haue and may haue more certaine knowledge of your birth and filiation aforesaid. We consider also the great wit, prudence, iustice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in diuers battels, which as wee by experience know you heretofore haue done, for the saluation and defence of this same Realme; and also the great noblenesse & excellencie of your birth and blood, as of him that is defended of the three most royall houses in Christendome: that is to say, England, France and Spaine. Wherefore these premises by vs diligently considered, we desiring effectually the peace, tranquillitie and weale-publique of this Land, and the reduction of the same to the ancient honourable estate and prosperitie, and hauing in your great prudence, iustice, princely courage, and excellent vertue, singular confidence, haue chosen in all that in vs is, and by this our writing choose you High and Mightie Prince our King and Soueraigne Lord, &c. To whom we know for certaine it appertaineth of enheritance to be chosen. And hereupon wee humbly desire, pray, and require your most noble Grace, that according to this election of vs the three estates of this Land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take vpon you the sayd Crowne and royall dignitie, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging aswell by inheritance as by lawful election: and in case ye so doe, we promise to serue and assist your Highnesse, as true and faithfull Subjects, and liege men; and to liue and die with you in this matter, and in euery other iust quarrel. For certainly, we be determined rather to adventure & commit vs to the perill of our liues, and to jeopardie of death, then to liue in such thraldome and bondage as wee haue liued long time heretofore oppressed and iniured by extortions and newe impositions against the Law of God and man, and the libertie, old pollicie and Lawes of this Realme, wherein euery Englishman is inherited. Our Lord God, King of all Kinges, by whose infinite goodnesse and eternall prouidence all things beeing principally gouerned in this world; lighten your soule, and grant you grace to doe aswell in this matter as in all other, that may be according to his will and pleasure, and to the common and publike weale of this Land: so that after great clouds, trouble, stormes, and tempests, the Sun of Iustice and of Grace may shine vpon vs, to the comfort and gladnesse of all true-hearted Englishmen. Albeit, that the right, title, & estate, which our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third hath to, and in the Crowne, and royall dignitie of this Realme of England, with all things thereunto within the same Realme, and without it vnited, annexed & appertaining, bin iust and lawfull as grounded vpon the Lawes of God and of nature: and also vpon the ancient Lawes and laudable customes of this said Realme; and so taken and reputed by all such persons as beene learned in the abovesaid Lawes and customes: Yet neuertheless, forasmuch as it is considered, that the most part of the people is not sufficiently learned in the abovesaid Lawes and customes, whereby the truth & right in this behalfe of likelihood may be hid and not cleerely knowne to all the people, & thereupon put in doubt and question. And ouer this, how that the Court of Parliament is of such autoritie, and the people of this Land of such a nature and disposition, as experience teacheth that manifestation and declaration of any truth or right made by the three estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, and by the authority of the same maketh before all other things most feith and certaine, and quiering of mens mindes, remoueth the occasion of all doubts, and seditious language. Therefore at the request, and by the assent of the three estates of this Realme: that is to say, the Lords spirituall and temporal, and Commons of this Land assembled in this present Parliament, by authority of the same be it pronounced, decreed, and declared, that our said Soueraigne Lord the King was, and is the very vndoubted King of this Realme of England, with all things thereunto within the same Realme, and without it vnited, annexed, and appertaining aswell by right of Confangunity, and inheritance, as by lawful election, consecration, and coronation. And ouer this, that at the request, and by the assent and authority abovesaid, be it ordained, enacted and established, that the said Crowne and royall dignitie of this Realme, and the inheritance of the same, and all other things thereunto within the Realme or without, is vnited, annexed, and now appertaining, rest and abide in the person of our said Soueraigne Lord the King during his life, and after his decease, in his heires of his body begotten; and in especiall at the request, and by assent and authority abovesaid, be it ordained, enacted, established, pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the high and excellent Prince Edward, son of our said Soueraigne Lord the King, be heire apparent of the same our Soueraigne Lord the King to succeed to him in the abovesaid Crowne and royall dignity, dignity, with all things as is aforesaid thereunto vnited, annexed, and appertaining, to haue them after the decease of our said Soueraigne Lord the King, to him, and to his heires of his body lawfully begotten.

(5) These things I haue laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Roll, that ye may vnderstand both what and how great matters, the power of a Prince, the outward shew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, pensive feare, desire of change, and goodly pretences are able to effect, in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdome, even against all law and right, so that the saying of Salomon in this State seemed most true that a living dogge is better then a dead Lyon. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to haue been a Soueraigne, had he not beene a Soueraigne as Calba was reputed; who, when he was a Soueraigne, deceived all mens expectation; but most worthy in deede of Soueraignty, had hee not beene transported with ambition (which blasted all his good parts) by lewde practises, and by mischievous means, made foule way therunto: for that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes; as indeed King Richard through his short time of raigne is accounted to haue beene.

(6) The Crown and Scepter accepted as is said, King Richard vpon the twentie fifth of June, went in great pompe vnto Westminster hall, and there in the Kings Bench Court tooke his Seat, saying, that he would take vpon him the Crowne in that place, where the King himselfe ought to sit, whose chiefest duety was to administer Iustice to his people, and with a pleasing Oration he tickled the cares of his Auditors, that hee lulled the rull to thinke that his like had neuer raigned in England; and to beginne himselfe with a pretended clemency, he pronounced pardon of all offences committed against him; for confirmation whereof, hee sent for one Fogge whom hee deadly hated, who for feare of him had lately taken Sanctuary at Westminster, and there in sight of the people with semblance accordingly, tooke him by the hand saying, that hee would be thenceforth his assured in affection; whereas the Commons greatly reioyced, and with applauses extolled, though others wiser among them tooke it to be but fained to serue his owne turne. And in his way homeward, whomsoever hee met, hee saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe to bee guiltie, is in a manner dejected to a seruile flattery.

(7) King Richard whose guilty heart was full of suspicion, had sent for five thousand Souldiers out of the North to be present in London at his Coronation; these vnder the leading of Robin of Ridgale, came vpy both euill apparelled, and worse harnessed, in rusty Armour, neither defensible for proofe, nor scowred for shew: who mustering in Finsbury Fields, were with disdain gazed vpon by the beholders. But all things now ready for his Coronation (and much the sooner in that young Edwards prouision was conferred vpon his) vpon the fourth of Iuly, he with his wife by water came to the Tower, where he created Estates, ordained the Knights of the Bath, set at liberty the Archishoppe of Yorke, and the Lord Stanley, more for feare then for loue, whose sonne the Lord Strange was then said to be gathering of men in Lancashire, where those Lords haue great command.

(8) But Marston Bishop of Ely a firme man vnto King Edward, and vnpossible to bee drawn vnto the disinheriting of his children, as was well perceived by the Protector, among others at the Council held in the Tower, was left there prisoner, and accused of many great, but vnlike treasons. This man borne in Dorsetshire, and brought vp in the Vniuersity of Oxford, was from a Doctor of the Arches made a priuy Counsellour vnto King Henry, and after his death allured by King Edward to serue him, was sworne likewise of his Council, and made one of the Executors of his will: whose insight into the intended designs, the Protector much feared, and therefore hauing him fast, minded for to keepe him, when hee released others laide in the Tower for the like feare. But the reuerence of the man, or vnderstanding of his wrongs, moued so the affection of the Oxford Academians, that they directed to the King (who professed much loue to that Vniuersitie) a petitory latine Epistle, no lesse eloquent & pithy, then circumspect and wary, wherein they thus pleaded for his liberty.

(9) Though many important motiues wee haue most Christian King, earnestly to recommend to your princely clemency, the Reuerend Father in Christ, the Lord Bishoppe of Ely, as being not onely one of the most eminent Sonnes of our Vniuersity, but also a singular Patron and indulgent Father to vs all; yet could not these inducements (howsoever very ponderous with all gratefull minde) perswade vs to become intercessors for his pardon, but euer with due regard both to your owne honour and safety; the greatnesse of your princely fauours haue more obliged vs, then of any your royall Predecessors: whilst therefore wee stood in some doubt, how hee stood affected towards your Highnesse, wee held it an high offence, if by tending his safety, wee should any way hazard yours: but now vnderstanding, that his offence proceeded, not of pertinacy, but humane frailty; and that hee hath alwayes humbly sued for pardon thereof, the bowels of our mother Vniuersity, like Rachel weeping ouer her Children were moued with compassion ouer the deplored distresse of this her dearest Sonne; where in yet (as wee hope) her affection deserues no iust reprehension. For if a pious affection be prayse-worthy, even in an enemy, much more is it in this our Academy, full of due obseruance towards your Maiesty, and professing the study of all vertues. These things so being, wee thought fittest, (without longer delays) to flie vnto your clemency, as humble Suppliants, that your Highnesse, already hauing in part inflicted (though mildly) some chastisement on his fault would turn your roial aspect towards him, & impart to him the bounty of your gracious clemency; wherein you shall not onely perform an act most acceptable to him, to vs, and the whole Church, but very honourable & advantageous also (as we hope) to your own person. For, vpon notice of the readmittance of so great a Prelate into your grace, who is there, that will not extoll with prayles vnto the skies your fo great, and euen diuine clemency? Thus gloried the Romans, to haue it marshalled amongst their prayles, that Submissus vultus they spared, but crushed the proud; and this also they challenged as their peculiar honour, that they were readier to remit, then to reuenge wrongs. Now if you will aspire to this high honour, (as easily you may, by being gracious to this man) you shall surmount the Romanes themselves by lo glorious a deed. As for the great benefite which may hereby accrue to your

"your highnes, albeit(as we suppose) we can sufficiently conceiue thereof, especially if wee call to minde his singular vertues; yet had we rather leaue that point wholly to your secret considerations, then pursue it with a discourse tedious to you, and enuie-breeding to his: least happily by insinuating in his praises, it may be thought, that we seeke rather by violence to extort, then by submissiues to beg his pardon, and or else to relie more on the greatness of his vertues, then of your Clemency, or lastly to appeale rather to your Iustice, than to your mercy. Wherefore (most puissant Prince) thus periwade your selfe of vs, that whatsoever we haue spoken in the Bishops behalfe, we doe it rather out of a sense of our dutifullness then any diffidencie of your Gracifullnes: and therefore omitting all things which might be alleaged, either to lessen his offence or augment his vertues: it is your sole mercy wherein we repose all our hopes; vowing, howsoever other meanes of gratitute may be wanting to vs, yet we shall neuer suffer the remembrance of lo great a fauour conferred on vs to be extinguished amongst vs.

(10) King Richard, after this, intending some easier restraint, though not liberty vnto the Bishop, was content to release him out of the Tower, and committed him to the custody of Henry Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to his Castle of Brecknocke in Wales, there safely to be kept, vntill himselfe should come thither.

(11) The next day with great pompe, state and attendance of the Nobility, the King rode through London, so as a more royall had not bene seene at any Kings Coronation, for there attended him, three Dukes, nine Earles, two Vicounts, twenty Lords, feauenty eight Knights, all of them most richly furnished, whereof the Duke of Buckingham so farre exceeded, that the carpiation of his horse was so charged with embroydered worke of gold, as it was born vp from the ground by certain his footemen thereto appointed. And contrary to my owne affections, or manner of my former proceedings, I will yet continue the most honorable offices performed at his roiall enthroning with no little Admiracion, how these Lords assembled to fet the Crowne vpon the young Princes head, were so suddainly carried to Crowne his Protector, and that vpon such false and slanderous pretences, as euery one of them saw his title to be merely an vniuist vsurpation, but in them may be seene, that we are all the sonnes of Adam, and in times of extremities, forefoll all publike regard, as ouermuch fearing our priuate and present estate.

(12) Vpon the sixt of Iuly, King Richard with Queene Anne his wife fet forth from White-hall towards Westminster, roially attended, and went into the Kings bench in the great hall, from whence himselfe and Queen vpon ray Cloth, both of them barefooted, went vnto King Edwards shrine in Saint Peters Church, all the Nobility going with him in their degree, the trumpets and Heralds marshalling the way, the Crosse with a solemne procession followed, the Priests in fine surplices and gray Amysses vpon them, the Bishops and Abbots in rich Copes all of them myrted, and carrying their Crosses in their hands; next came the Earle of Huntingdon bearing a pair of gilt spurs, signifying Knighthood, after whom came the Earle of Bedford, who bare Saint Edwards staffe for a Relique, then followed the Earle of Northumberland with a naked pointed sword in his hand betokening mercy, next whom the Lord Stahley bare the Mace of the Constableness, vpon whose right hand the Earle of Kent bare a naked pointed sword, and on his left hand the Lord Louell the like naked pointed sword, the former signifying Iustice towards the temporality, and the other Iustice to the Clergy; the Duke of Suffolke then followed with the Scepter, which signified Peace: the Earle of Lincoln bare the Ball and Crosse which signified a Monarchy: Then came the Earle of Surrey bearing the fourth sword sheathed in a rich scaberd, and is called the sword of Estate, next whom followed Garter King at Armes, vpon whose right hand went the Gentleman Viher of the Kings priuy Chamber, and on his left the Lord Maior of London, with a Mace in his hand; Next vnto whom went the Duke of Norfolk bearing the Kings Crowne betwixt his hands, and then King Richard himselfe came, in a Surcote and Robe of purple veluety, hauing ouer his head a Canapie borne by the four Barons of the five Ports, the Bishop of Bath on his right hand, and of Durham on his left. The Duke of Buckingham bare the Kings traine, and to signifie the office of high Steward of England, he bare a White Staffe in his hand.

(13) Then followed the Queene traine: before whom was borne the Scepter, the Ivory Rod with the Dove, and the Crowne, her selfe appaelled in Robes like the Kings vnder a rich Canapie, at euery corner thereof a bell of gold. On her head there were a circlet full of precious stones, the Countesse of Richmond bearing her traine; the Dutchesse of Norfolk and Suffolke in their Coronets attendants, with twenty Ladies of estate most richly attired. In this order they passed the Pallace into the Abbey, and ascending to the high Altar there shifted their Robes, and hauing other Robes open in diuers places from the middle vpward, were both of them annointed and Crowned, he with Saint Edwards Crowne, hauing the Scepter deliuered into his left hand, and the Ball with the Crosse a token of Monarchie in his right, the Queene had a Scepter giuen into her right hand, and the Ivory Doue in her left; then after the Sacrament receiued (hauing the host deuided betwixt them) they both offered at Saint Edwards shrine, where the King left his Crowne and put on his owne; and thus done, in the same Order and State as they came, returned to Westminster hall, and there held a most Princely feast. Whereof let Hall and Grafton tell you for me.

(14) But this his faire Sunne was soone ouercast with many darke Cloudes and mischiefes, which fell thicke vpon the necke of each other, for as the eching euill gotten, is neuer well kept through all the time of his raigne there neuer ceased death and slaughter, till his owne destruction ended it. Yet as he finished his daies with the best death, and the most righteous, that is to say, his owne: so began he with the most piteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murder of his innocent Nephewes, the young King and his tender brother; whose deaths and finall misfortunes haue neuertheless come so farre in question, that some remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies destroyed or no. Not for that only, that Perkin Warbecke by the malice of many, and the folly of more, so long a time abusing the world, was aswell with Princes as the other poore people, reputed and taken for the younger of these two: but for that also as all things were in late daies so couerly decaied, one thing pretended and another done, that there was nothing so plaine and openly proued, but for the common custome and close couert dealing, men had it euery inwardly in suspect, as many well counterfeit Jewels make the true mistrusted. Howbeit concerning the opinion with the occasions mouing either party, we shall haue place more at large hereafter to intreat of: in the meane time for this present matter shall be rehearsed the dolorous end of these young Babes, not after euery report I haue heard, but by such men, and by such meanes, as to my seeming it were hard but it should be true, saith Sir Thomas Moore.

(15) K. Richard presently after his mockish Electio & glorious Coronation, made his progresse towards Gloucester, to shew (as was thought) in that City his new Kingly estate, which first had vouchsafed him his old honour in bearing her Title; or else, and that rather, to bequestred from other busines, the better to attend that, vpon which his thoughts most busily ranne.

ranne. For albeit the Barke of his beguine aduentures, had without perill well passed the straightes, and now got sea-roume to spread saile at will; yet being vnder gale, and at fortunes dispoise, he feared the gust of euery wind: at leastwise suspected that his young Nephewes liuing would stay the course of his deeper reaches, as doth the little fish Remora, who holdeth (as at Anchor) the biggest shippe vnder saile. His inward study therefore still forged, howsoever his outward countenance was carried to cleare his passage by taking those dangerous lets away, well knowing, that his little Nephewes enioying their liues, men would be meddling with their downcast cause, and account him an vsurper without all right to the Realme. To stop which streame, no other course could hee find, but to cut off the current by which it ranne, as though the killing of his Kinfolke could better his bad claime, or vnkindly murder make him a kindly King. But being resolu'd, he forthwith sent one John Greene, a seruant in especiall trust vnto Sir Robert Brakenbury Constable of the Tower, with a letter of credence, that the same Sir Robert should in any wise put the two children to death.

(16) This Greene thus posted to London, deliuered his errand vnto Brakenbury, whom hee found kneeling at his Orizons before the Image of our Lady in the Tower, the businesse being of such weight as the King must be serued before hee had ended with his Saint. The Constable reading the letter, and perceiuing the bloody intent of the King, answered plainly, hee would neuer put those innocent babes vnto death, to die therefore himselfe. With which answer John Greene returning, recounted the same to King Richard being at Warwick, yet in his way to Gloucester, wherewith he was maruellously perplexed, and thereatooke such displeasure, that the same night hee said to a secret Page of his: Alas whom shall a man trust? those that I haue brought vp my selfe, those that I haue reueened would most surely serue me, even those I haue made, and at my commandement will do nothing. Sir quoth the Page, there lyeth one on your Pallat without, that I dare well say, to doe your Grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that hee would refuse; meaning this by Sir James Tirrell, who was a man of a goodly personage, and for Natures gifts worthy to haue serued a much better Prince, if he had well serued God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will, as hee had strength and wit.

(17) The man had an high heart, and fore longed vpward, not rising yet so fast as hee hoped, being hindered and kept vnder by the meanes of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, who longing for no more partners of the Princes fauour, and namely, not for him, whose pride they knew would beare no Peere, kept him by secret drifts out of all secret trust, which thing this Page had well marked and knowne: wherefore this occasion offered of very speciall friendshipp, hee tooke his time to put him forward, and by such wise to doe him good, that all the enemies hee had, except the Diuell himselfe could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For vpon this Pages words, K. Richard arose (for this communication had hee sitting at the draught, a convenient Carpet for such a Counsell) and came out into a Pallat-Chamber, where hee found in bed, Sir James and Sir Thomas Tirrells, of persons much like, and brethren in blood, but nothing of kin in conditions: Then said the King merrily to them, what Sirs, be ye in bed so soone? and calling vp Sir James, brake to him secretly his mind in this mischieuous matter, in which hee found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morrow hee sent him to Brakenbury with a letter, by which hee was commanded to deliuer Sir James all the keyes of the Tower for one night, to the end hee might accomplish there the Kings pleasure in such things as hee had giuen him in commandement. After which letter deliueted, and the keyes receiued, Sir James appointed the night next ensuing to destroy them, deuiling before and preparing the meanes.

(18) The Prince in the Tower slenderly attended; and altogether neglected by the Nobility, lastly, had newes that his vnkle had left the name of Protector, and taken vpon him the Title of King; who with full consent of the Lords was to be crowned within a few daies following, with the same Crowne, and in the like estate as had bene provided for his solemnitie, wherewith the dejected Innocent sighed and said: Alasse, I would my vnkle would let mee enioy my life yet, though I loose both my Kingdome and Crowne. Which words hee pronounced with such a feeling feare, as much moued the Relator to pittie, and to periwade him with the best comforts hee could: but forthwith the Prince and his brother were both shut vp, and all attendants removed from them, onely one called Black-will, or William Slaughter excepted, who was fet to serue them, and see them sure. After which time the Prince neuer lifted his points, nor cared for himselfe, but with that young Babe his brother lingered with thought and heauines, till their traiterous deaths deliuered them out of that wretchednesse: for the execution whereof, Tirrell appointed Miles Forrest, one of the four that kept them, a fellow fished in murder before time. To whom hee ioined one John Dighton his horsekeeper, a bigge, broad, square knaue.

(19) About midnight (all others being removed from them,) this Miles Forrest, and John Dighton, came into the Chamber, and suddenly wrapped vp the seely children in the Bed-clothes, where they lay keeping by force the feather-bed and pillows hard vpon their mouths that they were therein smothered to death, & gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the ioies of heauen, leaving their bodies vnto the Tormentors dead in the bed: which after these monstrous wretches perceiued, first by the struggling with the paines of death, and after long lying still to be thoroughly dispatched, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the bed, and then fetched Sir James their instigator to see them, who caused these murderers to bury them at the staires foot, somewhat deepe in the ground, vnder a great heape of stones. Then rode Sir James in haste to the King, vnto whom he shewed the manner of their death, and place of buriall, which newes was so welcome to his wicked heart, as he greatly reioiced, and with great thanks dubbed (as some hold) this his mericles Instrument, knight. But the place of their buriall hee liked not, saying, that vile corner should not containe the bodies of those Princes, his Nephewes, & commanded them a better place for buriall, because they were the sons of a King. Whereupon the Priest of the Tower tooke vp the bodies; and secretly interred them in such place, which by the occasion of his death could neuer since come to light.

(20) The continuer of John Harding tels vs from the report of others, that King Richard caused Sir Robert Brakenburies Priest to clothe their dead corps in lead, and so to put them in a coffin full of holes, and hooked at the ends with two hookes of iron, and so to cat them into a place called the Blacke-deepes at the Thames mouth, whereby they should neuer rise vp, or be any more seene. Wherefore they were buried, thus they died, and by these murderers. For very certaine it is, and wel knowne, that at such time, as Sir James Tirrell was in the Tower, for Treason committed against King Henrie the seventh, both Dighton and hee were examined, and confessed the murder in manner as is said, but whether their bodies were removed they could not say. And thus as I haue learned of them that knew much, and little cause had to lie, were these two noble Princes, these innocent tender children, borne of most roial blood, brought vp in great wealth, likely to haue liued, to haue reigned, and ruled in the Realme, by traiterous tyranny taken, deprived of their estates, shortly shut

(20) For first to beginne with the Ministers, Miles Forrest at S. Martins, speeche-meale rotted away; Sir James Tyrell died at Tower hill for treason. Dighton indeed walketh on aloue in good possibility to be hanged ere he die, lying at Calles no lesse distained and hated then pointed at of all. King Richard himselfe as ye shall hereafter heare, was slaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enemies hands, carried on horsebacke dead, his haire in despite torne and tugged like a Curre dogge: and the mischiefe that he tooke was within lesse then three yeeres of the mischiefe that he did, and yet all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, and much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his Chamberlaine, that after this abominable deed done, he neuer had quiet in his minde: he neuer thought himselfe sure: but where he went abroad, his eyes euer whirled about, his body priuily fenced, his hand euer on his dagger, his countenance & manner like one alwaies ready to strike againe, he tooke it rest a nights, lay long waking and musing, fore wearied with care and watch, rather slumbered then slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, suddainly sometimes start vp, leapt out of his Bed, and ranne about the chamber, so was his restlesse heart continually toiled and tumbled with the tedious impression and stormy remembrance of his abominable deed.

Neither had he in his best, any time of quiet, for immediately began the conspiracy (or rather good consideration) betweene the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other Gentlemen against him.

(21) Which Duke alsoone as Gloucester vpon the death of King Edward came to Torke, sent thither in secret wifes a trusty seruante of his, named Perfall, to assure him, that he would take his part in this his new world, and if need were, would waite vpon him with a thousand good-fellows: and againe sent others of the like vnto Nottingham, whither the Protector from Torke, with many Gentlemen of the North Countrey was come, and on his way to London ward in secret manner met him himselfe, but at Northampton openly with three hundred horse: and from thence still continued with him, being a partner of all his deuises, till that after his coronation they departed (as it seemed) very great friends at Gloucester: from whence as soone as the Duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And surely the occasion of their variance is of diuers men, diuersly reported: Some haue said, that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other things, required of the Protector, the Duke of Herfords Lands, to the which he pretended himselfe iust inheritor. And forasmuch as the Title which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title of the Crowne, by the line of King Henry before deprived, the Protector conceived such indignation, that he reiecteth the Dukes request, with many spitefull and minatory wordes, which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could indure to looke a right on King Richard, but euer feared his owne life, so farre forth, that when the Protector rode through London towards his Coronation, he fained himselfe sicke, because he would not ride with him: And the other taking it in euill part, sent him word to rise, and come ride, or he would make him to be carried. Whereupon hee rode on with an euill will, and that notwithstanding on the morrow rose from the Feast, faining himselfe sick, wherewith King Richard said, it was done in hatred and despite of him. And they say, that euer after continually each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, as the Duke verily looked to haue bene murdered at Gloucester: from which neuertheless he in faire manner departed. But surely some right secret at this day denied this: and many right wise men thinke it unlikely (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that Greene world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke stood, if he fell once in suspicion of the Tyrant) that either the Protector would giue the Duke occasion of displeasure, or the Duke the Protector occasion of mistrust. And verily men thinke, that if King Richard had any such conceived opinion, he would neuer haue suffered the Duke to haue escaped his hands.

(22) The very truth is, Buckingham was an high minded man, and could euill beare the glory of another; so that I haue heard of some that saw it, that the Duke at such time as the Crowne was first set vpon the Protectors head, his eye could nor abide the sight thereof, but wried his face another way. But men say, that hee was of truth not well at ease which to King Richard was well knowne, and nothing ill taken, nor any demand of the Dukes vncourteously reiecteth, but he both with great gifts and high behests in most louing and trustie manner, departed at Gloucester. But soone after his coming home to Brecknock, having there in custody by the commandement of King Richard, Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, who (ye before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar: whose wisedome abused his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the Dukes destruction.

(23) This Bishop was a man of great natural wits, very well learned, and honourable in behauiour, lacking no wise waies to winne fauour: he had bene fast vpon the part of King Henry, while that part was in wealth; and naythelesse leste it not, nor forsooke it in woe, but fled the Realme with the Queen & the Prince, while King Edward had Henry in prison, and neuer came home but to the field. After which lost, and that side vterly subdued, the other for his fast faith and wisedome not only was content to receive him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thence forth both in great secret trust, and very speciall fauour, which he nothing deceived. For he being (as you haue heard) after King Edwards death, first taken by the Tyrant for his truth to the King, found the meanes to set this Duke in his top, joined Gentlemen together in aide of King Henry, deuising first the marriage betweene him and King Edwards daughter: by which his faith, he declared the good seruice to both his masters at once, with infinite benefit to the Realme, by the coniunction of those two bloods in one; whose feuerall titles had long time disquieted the Land; hee fled the Realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, till the noble Prince King Henry the seuenth got him home againe, made him Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England, wherunto the Pope ioined the honour of a Cardinall. Thus liuing many dayes in as much honour, as one man might well wish, ended then so godly, that his death with Gods mercy, well changed his life.

(24) This man therefore, as I was about to tell you, by the long and often alternate prooffe, of well prosperitie as aduerser fortunes, had gotten by great experience (the very mother or mistress of Wisedome) a deepe insight in politticke worldly drifts. Whereby perceiuing now this Duke glad to commune with him, fed him with faire words, and many pleasant praifes. And perceiuing by the proceffe of their communication, the Dukes pride now and then balke out a litle bread of enuy, towards the glory of the King, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out, if the matter were well handled: hee craftily fought fought the wayes to pricke him forward, taking awayes the occasion of his coming, and keeping himselfe so close within his bounds, that hee rather seemed to follow then to leade him. For when the Duke first began to praise & boast of the King, and shew how much proficte the Realme should take by his raigne; Morton answered thus: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lye, for if I would sweare the contrary, your Lordship would not ween I belceue, but that if the world would haue gone, as I could haue wished, King Henries son had had the Crowne, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, and King Edward to raigne, I was neuer so mad, that I would with a dead man strue against a quicke. So was I to King Edward a faithfull Chaplaine, and glad would haue bene, that his child should haue succeeded him. Howbeit, if the secret iudgement of God haue otherwise provided, I purpose not to spurne against the pricke, nor labor to set vp, that God putteth downe. And as for the late protector and now King, and euen there he left saying, that hee had already meddled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his Booke and his Beades, and no further.

(24) Then longed the Duke fore to heare what he would haue said, because he ended with the king, and there so suddainly stopped, and exhorted him so familiarly betweene them twaine, to be bolde to say whatsoeuer he thought, whereof he faithfully promised there should neuer come hurt, and peradventure more good then he would weene, and that himselfe intended to vte his faithfull secret aduise and counsell, which he said was the only cause for which he procured of the King to haue him in his custody, where he might account himselfe at home, and else had he bene put in the hands of them with whom he should not haue found the like fauour. The Bishop right humbly thanked him and said: In good faith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault. Forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And euer I think on Asops tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed vpon paine of death there should no horned beast abide in the wood, one that had in his forehead a bunch of flesh, fled away a great pace. The foxe who saw him runne so fast, asked him whether he made all that haste? and he answered, In faith, I neither wor, nor recke, so I were once hence, because of this Proclamation made against horned beasts. What foole (quoth the Foxe) thou maist abide well enough, the Lion meant not thee, for it is no horne that is in thy head. No many (quoth he) that wot I wellynough, but what if he call it a horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrily at the tale, and said, my Lord I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Boare shall picke any matter at any thing heere spoken, for it shall neuer come to their eares. In good faith Sir, said the Bishop, if it did, the thing that I was about to say, (taken aswell as afore God I meant) could deferre but thanks; and yet taken as I weene it would, might happily turne me to litle good, and you to lesse. Then longed the Duke yet more to wit what it was; wherupon the Bishop said, in good faith my Lord, as for the late Protector, sith he is now King in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title, but for the weale of this Realme, wherof his Grace hath now the gouernance, and my selfe am a poore member, I was about to wish, that to those good abilities, whereof hee hath already right many, litle needing my praife, it might yet haue pleased God for the better store, to haue giuen him some of such other excellent vertues meet for the rule of a Realme as our Lord hath planted in the person of your Grace: and there left againe.

(25) The Duke somewhat maruailing at his suddaine pauses, said: My Lord, I note your often brea-things and suddaine stopping in your communication; so that to my intelligence, your wordes neither come to any direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, whereby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now towards the King, or what affection you beare towards mee. For the comparison of good qualities ascribed to vs both, maketh mee not a litle to muse, thinking that you haue some other priuie imagination imprinted in your heart, which you bee ashamed to disclose, and specially to me, which on my honour doe assure you to be as secret in this case as the deafe and dumbe person to the finger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop being somewhat bolder, considering the Dukes promise, but most of all animated, because hee knew the Duke desirous to be magnified, and also hee perceived the inward hatred which hee bare towards King Richard, hee opened his stomacke to the bottom, and said: My singular good Lord, sith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custody, I may rather call it a libertie, then a strait imprisonment, in auoiding of idleness mother of all vices, in reading bookes and ancient pamphlets, I haue founde this sentence written, that no man is borne free and at libertie of himselfe onely: for one part of dutie he oweth to his parents, another part to his friends and kindred; but the natie Countrey in the which he first tasted this pleasant & flattering world, demandeth a debt not to be forgott. VVhich saying, caught mee to consider in what case the Realme, my natie Countrey, now standeth; and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued; what gouernour we now haue, and what ruler wee might haue; for I plainly perceiue (the Realme being in this case) must needs decay, and be brought to confusion: but one hope I haue, that is, when I consider your noble personage, your iustice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale and ardent loue towards your naturall Countrey; and in like manner, the loue of your countrey towards you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and eloquence, which to much doth abound in your person; I must needs thinke this Realme fortunate, which hath such a Prince in store, meete and apt to be Governour. But on the other side, when I call to memory the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called King, so violated by tyranny, so altered by vlturped authoritie, and so clouded by blind ambition, I must needs say, that hee is neither meet to be King of so noble a Realme, nor so famous a Realme meet to be gouerned by such a tyrant. VVas not his first enterprize to obtaine the Crowne, begonne by the murder of diuers personages? did hee not secondarily proceed against his owne natural mother, declaring her openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and dissolute liuing; declaring furthermore, his two brethren and two Nephewes to be bastards, and to be borne in adultery? yet not contented, after hee had obtained the Garland, hee caused the two poore innocents his Nephewes, committed to him, to be most shamefully murdered: the blood of which little babes daily cry to God from the earth for vengeance. What surety can be in this Land to any person; either for life or goods, vnder such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blood, and much lesse the losse of others. But now to conclude, what I meane towards your noble person, I say & affirme, if you loue God, your lineage, or your natie countrey, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countrey men from the bondage of such a tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, then I adiure you by the faith you owe vnto God, to deuise some wayes how this Realme may be brought to some conuenient regiment, vnder some good Governour. ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a great while, so that night they communed no more.

(26) The next day the Duke sent for the Bishop, to whom hee said, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in heart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you bee a sure friend, a trustie counsellor, and a very loue of your country. And sith that at our last communication, you haue disclosed the secrets of your hart touching the now vsurper of the crowne, & also haue alittle touched the aduancement of the two noble families of Torke and Lancaster, I shall likewise declare vnto you my priuie intents and secret cogitations. And to beginne, when King Edward was deceased, I then began to studie, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme should be gouerned: I perswaded with my selfe to take part with the Duke of Gloucester, whom I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without iniurie, and so by my means he was made Protector both of the King and Realme; which authoritie being once gotten, he neuer ceased priuily to require mee and other Lords aswell spiritual as temporal, that he might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twenty yeres, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient King: which thing, when hee saw me somewhat stickie at, hee then brought in instruments, authenticke Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries of the Law, with depositions of diuers witnesses, testifying King Edwards children to bee bastards: which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to bee fained. When the said depositions were before vs read, and diligently heere, he stood vp bare headed, saying: well my Lords, euen as I and you would that my Nephewes should haue no wrong: so I pray you doe mee nothing but right, for these witnesses and sayings of famous Doctors bee true: For I am onely the vnderwrite heire to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Torke, adiudged to be the very heire to the Crowne of this Realme by authoritie of Parliament. Which things so by learned men for veritie to vs declared, caused mee and others to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted Prince and Soueraigne Lord. So againe by my ayde, hee of a Protector was made a King: but when he was once crowned King, and in full possession of the Realme, hee cast away his old conditions. For, when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the Earle of Hertford Lands, which his brother Edward wrongfully deteined from me, and also required to haue the office of the high Constableness of England, as diuers of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long discent continued; in this my first suite, hee did not only first delay mee, and afterwards deny me, but gaue mee such vnkinde words, as though I had neuer furthered him: all which I suffered patiently. But when I was informed of the death of the two young Innocents, O Lord, my heart inwardly grudged, inasmuch as I abhorred the sight of him; I took my leaue of the Court, and returned to Brecknocke to you, but in my journey as I came, I had diuers imaginations how to deprive this vnnatural vncle. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the Crowne, now was the way made plaine, and occasion giuen. For I well saw hee was disdained of the Lords Temporal, and accursed of the Lordes Spiritual. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betwene Worcester and Bridgenorth, I encountered with the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the very daughter, and sole heire to John Duke of Somersets my Grandfathers elder brother, so that he & her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond be both between me and the gate, to enter into the Maieftie roiall, & getting of the Crowne; and when wee had a little communed concerning her sonne, and were departed, I then beganne to dispute with my selfe, whether I were best to take it vpon me, by the election of the Nobility and Commualty, or to take it by power. Thus standing in a wauering ambiguity, I considered first, the office, duty, and paine of a King, which I truly thinke that no mortall man can iustly and truly obferue, except he be elected of God, as K. David was.

(27) But further I remembred, that if I once took vpon me the Gouernance of the Realme, the daughters of King Edward and their Allies, being both for his sake much beloued, and also for the great iniurie done to them much pittied, would neuer cease to barke at the one side of me. Semblably my cosin the Earle of Richmond, his aides and kinsfolkes will surely attempt either to bite, or to pierce me on the other side, so that my life and rule should cuer hang vnquiet in doubt of death or depofition: And if the said two linages of Torke and Lancaster should ioine in one against me, then were I surely matched. Wherefore I haue cleerely determined, vtterly to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the Crown. For as I told you, the Countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new named King, meeting me in the highway, praised me first for kindred sake, secondly for the loue I bare to my Grandfather Duke Humfrey, who was sworne brother to her father, to moue the King to be good to her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into England, and if it were his pleasure so to doe, shee promised that the Earle her sonne should marry one of the Kings daughters at the appointment of the King, without any thing demanded for the said espousals, but only the Kings fauour, which request I soone ouerpaffed and departed. But after in my lodging I called to memory more of that matter, and now am bent, that the Earle of Richmond heire of the house of Lancaster, shall take to wife Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to King Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of Torke and Lancaster may be vnited in one.

(28) When the Duke had said, Bishop Morton who euer fauoured the house of Lancaster, was wondrous ioyfull, for all his imagination tended to this effect; and lest the Dukes courage should affwage, or his minde alter, he said to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, sith by Gods prouision, and your incomparable wilddome, this noble coniunction is first moued, it is necessary to consider what persons we shall first make priuie of this politicke conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with my Ladie of Richmond the Earles mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: sith you will begin that way (said the Bishop) I haue an old friend with the Countesse, called Reinold Bray, for whom I shall fend, if it be your pleasure: so the Bishop wrote for him to come to Brecknock, who straight came backe with the messenger, where the Duke and Bishop declared what they had deuised for the preferment of the Earle of Richmond, sonne to his Lady and Mistress: willing her first to compass how to obtaine the goodwill of Queen Elizabeth, and also of her eldest daughter: and after secretly to fend to her sonne in Britaine, to declare what high honour was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marrie the Ladie Elizabeth asloone as hee was King of the Realme. With which conclusion, Reinold Bray with a glad heart returned to the Countesse his Lady. Bray thus departed, the Bishop told the Duke, that if he were in his Sle of Ely, he could make many friends to further his enterprife. The Duke knew this to bee true, but yet loth to loose the society of such a Counsellor, gaue him faire words, saying, he should shortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the Bishop ere the Dukes company were assembled, secretly disguised, in a night departed and came to Ely, where he found money and friends, and then sailed into Flanders, where he did the Earle of Richmond good seruice.

wherefore shee deuised a means how to breake this matter to Queen Elizabeth, being then in Sanctuary at Westminster, and hauing in her family a certaine Wellthman called Lewis learned in Philosophie, now hauing opportunity to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come, that her sonne should be ioined in marriage with Lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to King Edward: and that King Richard should out of all honour and estate be deiected, and required him to goe to Queen Elizabeth not as a messenger, but as one that came friendlie to visite her, and as time and place should serue to make her priuie of this deuise. This Physician with good diligence repaired to the Queene, and when he saw time convenient said vnto her: Madame although my imagination be very simple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am so bolde to vtter vnto you a secret conceit, which I haue compassed in my braine. When I remember the great losse which you haue sustained by the death of your louing husband, and the great sorrow that you haue suffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no lesse doe, then daily study how to bring your heart to comfort, and also to reuenge the quarrell of you and your children, on that cruell tyrant King Richard. And first consider what bartel, and what mischief haue risen by the dissention betwene the two houses of Torke and Lancaster, which two families if they may be ioined in one, I doubt not but that your line shall be againe restored to your great ioy & comfort: you know Madam, that of the house of Lancaster, the Earle of Richmond is next of blood, & to the house of Torke your daughters now are heirs. If you could deuise the means how to couple your eldest daughter with the Earle of Richmond in matrimony, no doubt, but that the vsurper should shortly bee depofed, and your heire againe to her right restored.

(30) When the Queene had heard this friendly Motion, shee instantly befoUGHT him, that as he had bene the first inuention of so good an enterprife, that now hee would not desist to follow the same, requiring him further, that he would report to the Countesse of Richmond, mother to the Earle Henry, and to declare to her on the Queenes behalfe, that all the friends of King Edward her husband, should assist and take part with the Earle of Richmond her sonne, so that hee would take an oath, that after the Kingdome obtained, to espouse the Lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. At Lewis so sped his busines, that he made a final end of this businesse, betwene the two mothers: so the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, brought to a good hope of the preferment of her son, made Reinold Bray chiefe solicitor of this conspiracy, giuing him in charge secretly to inuagel such persons of Nobility to ioine with her, & take her part, as he knew to be faithfull.

(31) This Reinold Bray within few dayes brought to his luer Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheine Knights, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ramney Esquiers, and others. In the meane while the Countesse of Richmond sent one Christopher Vrewicke, a Priest into Britaine, to the Earle of Richmond her sonne, to declare to him all the agreements between her and the Queene agree: and with all to shew him that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the first Inuentioners of this enterprife: shee likewise sent Hugh Conway an Esquire into Britaine with a great summe of money, giuing him in charge to declare to the Earle, the great loue that the most part of the Nobility of the Realme bare towards him, willing him not to neglect so good an occasion offered, but with all speed to settle his mind how to return into England, and therewithall aduising him to take land in Wales. When the Earle had receiued this ioyfull message, hee brake to the Duke of Britaine all his secrets, aduising him that he was entered into a sure & red-fast hope to obtaine the Crown of England, desiring him of help towards the atchieuing of his enterprife, which the Duke promised, & afterwards performed: wherupon the Earle sent back againe Hugh Conway, & Th. Ramney to declare his coming shortly into England.

(32) In the meane season the chiefe of the conspiracy in England beganne many enterprises, which being neuer so priuily handled, yet knowledge therof came to King Richard, and because hee knew the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head, and aide of this combination, he thought it most necessarie to plucke him from that part, and thereupon addressed his louing letters vnto the Duke, requesting him most earnestly to come to the Court, whose graue aduise for counsell hee then stood much in need of; with many words of kind complements to bee vttered from the mouth of the messenger: but the Duke mistrusting those sweet promises proceeded out of a bitter intent, and knowing K. Richard to speake most fayrest when he meant foulest play, desired the king of pardon, excusing himself that he was sickly & not wel able to trauel: which excuse the king would not admit, but sent other letters with checking wordes, commanding him without delay to repaire to his presence: vnto which the Duke made a determinate answer that hee would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared war against him. Wherupon Thomas Marquess Dorset came out of Sanctuary, and gathered a great band of men in the County of Torke, Sir Edward Courteney and Peter his brother, Bishoppe of Excester, raised another Armie in Devonshire and Cornwall, and in Kent, Sir Richard Guilford, and other Gentlemen raised a Company, and all this was done euen in one moment.

(33) King Richard roused from his pleasures in progresse, sent forth commission to muster his men, and with a great preparation from London marched towards Salisbury, thinking it not best to dispartle his power into small parts in pursuing his enemies euery way at once, and therefore omitting all others with a great puissance went to set vpon the Duke of Buckingham, the head of the spring. The Duke hearing of the Kings approach, made out to meet him before hee came too farre, accompanied with a great power of wild Welshmen, whom hee had enforced to follow him, more by his Lordly commandement then by liberal wages, which thing indeed was the cause that they fell off, and forsooke him. His march was through the forrest of Deane, intending for Glocester, where hee meant to passe Suerne, and so haue ioined his Army with the Courteney, & other Welshmen, which had hee done, no doubt K. Richard had bene in great eapordie. But before hee could attaine the Suerne side, by force of continuall raine the river rose so high, that it ouerflowed all the country adioyning, and was not againe bounded within his owne bankes for the space of ten dayes, so that the Duke could not get ouer, nor his complices any wife come vnto him, during which time the Welshmen lingring idle, without wages, or victual, sodainlie brake vp Campe and departed; wherupon the Duke was wonderously perplexed, not knowing how to recover this vnfortunate chance, and destitute of power, to shew himselfe in field, sought to secure himselfe in secret, till destiny assigned him a better day.

(34) A seruant he had in especial fauour & trust brought vp tenderly by him, and risen to great wealth and esteeme, his name was Humfrey Bantler, and place of residence nere vnto Shrewsburie, whither the distressed Duke in disguise repaired, intending there to remain secret, until he might either raise a new power, or else by some means conuay himselfe vnto Britaine to Henry Earle of Richmond: but as soone as the others which had attempted the same enterprife against the King, had knowledge that Buckingham was forsaken of his Company, and could not be found, as men trucke in sodaine feare shifted euery one for himselfe, many of them taking Sanctuary, but the most of the chiefe took into Britaine.

tainc, among whom were Peter Courtney, Bishope of Excester with his brother Edward Earle of Devonshire, Thomas Marquesse Dorset the Quenes sonne, and his young sonne Thomas being a Childe, Edward Woodville Knight, brother to the Quene, John Lord Wells, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir John Bourchier, Sir Giles Daubney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Cheine with his two brethren, Sir William Barkley, Sir Richard Edgecombe, and Sir William Brandon, Edward Poinings an excellent Captain, and others.

(35) Richard thus farre proceeded, and no enemy leene, his hopes were encreased, and feares daily lesse; yet being a Prince politicke and vigilant, he commanded the Ports to be securely kept, & knowing that Buckingham was not fled with the rest, made proclamation for the apprehending of that Duke, promising a thousand pound to the man that could bring him forth, with pardon of his faults, to enjoy the Kings fauour, and if he were a bondman, presently to be made free. Banister minding the present, and forgetting what was past, spread his lappe first to receive this golden shewer, and in hope of this gaine, made no conscience to betray his own Lord, who had now laid his life vpon trust in his hands: hee therefore repaying to the Shiriffe of Shrewsbury, revealed the Duke, who disguised like a poore Countreiman, and digging in a groue nere vnto Banisters house, was apprehended, and with a great guard of men was brought vnto Salisbury, where King Richard then lay, and where without arraignment or iudgement, vpon the second of Nouember he lost his head: whose death was the lesse lamented, for that himselfe had been the chiefe Instrument to fet the Crowne wrongfully vpon Richards head: and yet the treachery of Banister was moste cruelly punished, as many haue obserued, not onely in the losse of his reward promised, which he neuer had, and infamy receiued, neuer after shaken off; but also in himselfe and children, as are thus reported; his eldest sonne and heire fell mad, and dyed so distracted in a Boares styce: his second sonne became deformed in his limmes, and fell lame; his third sonne was drowned in a small puddle of water; his eldest daughter was sodainely stricke with a foule leprosie, and himselfe being of extreme age, was arraigned and found guilty of murder, and by his Clergy saued his life.

(36) An other Commotion at the same time was in Kent, where George Browne and John Gifford Knights, Foge, Scot, Clifford, and Bonting, with fife thousand men attempted great matters at Grauesend, but hearing of the Duke of Buckinghams surpris, disperfed themselves for that time. But when King Richard perceived how hee was euerie where beset, he sent one Thomas Hutton vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with proffers of gold to circumvent and imprison Earle Henry, who as hee feared was too well friended in those forraigne parts, which thing indeed this Hutton well perceived, and so to the King reported, that the Duke was nothing forward to bite at this baite, whereupon, those that lately fled England, were indited of treason, and other of Henries factions beheaded, whereof Sir George Browne, and Sir Roger Clifford Knights with foure others were beheaded at London, and at Excester for the like cause dyed Sir Thomas Sentleger, who had married Lady Anne Dutchesse of Excester, King Richards own sister, with others; so ialous was the King of his vsurped Crowne; and that nothing should be laide to vnprouident foresight, the coasts hee stored with Armies of men, furnished the Ports with store of Prouision, and made all things ready to withstand Earle Henries arriuall. Who now hauing gotten aide of fife thousand Britaines, with forty vessels well furnished, set saile from thence the twelfth of October, but was taken with so terrible a tempest, that his Fleet was disperked, some into Normandy, and some compelled to returne into Britaine, only the Earles ship with one other kept the Seas, being fore tossed all night, and in the morning arriued in the mouth of Poole in the County of Dorset, where he might behold the Shore full of men shining in armour, to his great amalement, whereupon hee sent out his shippe-boat to know whether they were friends or enemies; their answer was, that they were thither appointed by the Duke of Buckingham, to attend the coming of the Earle of Richmond, to conduct him in safety to the Duke, who lay encamped not far off, that so ioyning their forces, they might prosecute Richard the vsurper, who being in a manner destitute of men, was fore distracted, and desperate in his owne designs. These smooth vntruthes notwithstanding Earle Henry auoided, and with a forward gale returned to Normandy, whence he sent Messengers vnto young Charles King of France, whose father King Lewis was lately departed this life, to haue his safe conduct to returne into Britaine, which easily was granted with fauourable complements returned to the Earle. Lord Henry thus crossed by sea, had present news of Buckinghams surpris and death, with the flight of the Nobles escaped from Richard: who meeting with Richmond in Britaine, fell forthwith into Counsell: where first it was determined that Earle Henry should take his oath to espouse the Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter vnto King Edward, and the immediate heire to the Crowne, which hee solemnly did in the Church at Rhedon; and they for their parts swore vnto him fealty, doing him homage with no lesse respect then vnto their sole and crowned King.

(37) Of these proceedings King Richard soone heard, which indeed greatly appaied his thoughts, and all peniue and lad he returned out of the West towards London, where to cut off the hopes of Richards further calice, hee caused a Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, and therein attainted the said Earle Henry himselfe, and all such as had fled the land in his behalfe, enacting them enemies to their naturall Country, their goods to be confiscated, and all their lands and possessions to be seized vpon to the Kings vie, which was so forwarded by his lewd Counsellors, and so executed by his fawning followers, that some better affected, set forth the present and oppressed estate in these scoffing rimes, to their further disgrace, diuulging their names in manner as followeth;

(38) King Richards state standing in dangers a-broad, and not altogether free from conspiracies at home, hee thought it best policy to enter amitie with Scotland, which hee did for the terme of three yeeres, and the more firme to assure himselfe of that King, hee intreated a marriage betwixt the Duke of Rothesay the Kings eldest sonne, and the Lady de la Pole daughter to John Duke of Suffolke, and to the Dutchesse Elizabeth King Richards owne sister, whom hee so much fauoured, as that after the death of his owne sonne, he proclaimed John Earle of Lincolne, her sonne and his Nephew, heire apparent to the Crowne of England, disinheriting King Edwards daughters, whose brothers hee had before murdered.

(39) His feares nothing lessened, but rather daily increased, he attempted once more to stop the Curran which led to the spring, to which end hee sent his Ambassadors laden with gold, and many gay promises vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, offering to give him all Richmonds lands, and yeerely reuenues if he would either send the said Earle into England or commit him there vnto prison. the Dukes Court, could haue no communication with him, he lying extremely sicke, and his wits too weak to entertaine discourse. Whereupon Peter Landse his Treasurer, a man pregnant in wit, and of great authority, tooke the motion into hand, vnto whom the English Ambassadors promised all the Earles Reuenues if he could bring King Richards request to passe. He greedy of gaine, and being in place to doe what he would, promised to effect it, conditionally that King Richard would make good his offer. Thus whilest messengers posted betwixt Peter and Richard, John Bishop of Elie being then in Flaunders, was certified by Christopher Wysswick of all the circumstances of this purpose, whereupon the Bishop with all possible hast, sent the same intelligence the same day, and by the same man vnto Earle Henry in Britaine, willing him to shift himself and followers into France: who forthwith sent Wysswick vnto King Charles to haue his licence that he might with his good liking come into his dominions, which being obtained hee caused the other Lords vnder pretence to visite the sicke Duke to escape into Anion, and two daies after changing his Apparell with his seruant, waited vpon him as vpon his Master, and posted thence into France: whose escape when the Treasurer heard of, hee sent after to apprehend him, and that in such hast as at his entrance into the French dominions they were hard at his heels.

(40) This suddaine flight of the Earle and of the other English Lords, the Duke of Britaine (being somewhat recovered of his dangerous sicknes)ooke very greuously, imputing it a great dishonour vnto himselfe, to suffer the least suspect of breach betwixt him and the Earle, and therefore fore offended at Landse whom hee suspected to be deepe in the deed, hee sent for Edward Woodville and Edward Poinings two English Esquires, vnto whom hee deliuered a summe of money which hee had promised to Earle Henry, with a conuey vnto all the rest of the English, to depart Vannes, bearing all their charges till they came to their Earle in France. Neither was King Charles backward to forward Earle Richmond against the Tyrant and vsurper of the English Crowne. And the more to ioy Henry, John Earle of Oxford imprisoned by King Edward the fourth in the Castle of Hammes; with Captaine Blunt his keeper, and Sir John Fortescue Porter of Calles, came vnto Earle Henry to take their fortunes in following of his. This Earle of Oxford, as we haue seene, was a continuall aider of King Henry the first, against his opposit K. Edward, and had done many seruises in the Lancastrians cause, till destiny had cast downe the hopes of their side. Him therefore Earle Henry made his chiefe Counsellor for warre, as for experience, policy, valour, and faith in that busines, no man was more meete. Whose prowess further appeared when Earle Henry was the wreath at Bosworth field, where, in the Front of that Battell hee led the band of Archers, and euer after liued in great fauour with this King Henry the seuenth, and in great honour died the fourth yeere of King Henry the eighth. In the like trust for Counsell and fauour with these Kings, was Richard Fox Doctour of Diuinitie, who being then a student in Paris, was found by Earle Richmond to be the chiefe man for imployment in his French busines, which hee so prudently and faithfully effected, as the Earle being King, acknowledging him one of his principall aduancers, made him of his Priuie Counsell, Lord Priuie Seale, and raised him to very great places in Church and Common-wealth, and lastly to testifie in what deere esteeme hee held him, made him Godfather to his sonne Prince Henrie, who was after King of England with whom in great reuerence hee liued a long time, euen till his eyesight failed through age, and did many workes of piety, whereof Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, is and shall be for euer a noble witness; and his honorable care of reuerend antiquity, in preserving the bones of many Saxon Kings, and by him bestowed in faire Monuments in the Cathedrall Church of Winchester, shall neuer want due celebration amongst all that honour antiquity and glorious studies. But from these worthy Subjects, we returne againe to their Queraigne King Henry.

(41) Whose beginnings thus forwarded by the Duke of Britaine and the French King, drew many English into France, and filled the heart of the vsurper with an extreme feare, therefore to accomplish by policy, what was doubtfull by armes, he sought to baite his hooke yet another way. The title hee knew stood with the daughters of King Edward (his sonnes being murdered) and among them to Ladie Elizabeth the eldest, whose marriage hee well saw must bring Henry the Crowne. But that once diuerted, his streame of feare could beare no great floate, nor bring any inundation into the Land, and therefore Queene Elizabeth in Sanctuary must be Couraged, that her daughters might come to Court, and there be regarded according to their degrees. This so cunningly was carried, by men that could carry themselves to fit womens affections, that the King was purged of the murder of her sonnes; hee made to beleue that her selfe was respected a Dowager Queene, and sifter in law to the present King, and that himselfe had a Prince and many Princely Peeres most fit matches for those Princes her daughters; that her sonne Thomas Marquesse Dorset, whilst he followed the Runaway Henry, left his honorable preffements intended to himward; and lastly requiring a reconciliation with the Quene, forgave all iniuries vttered against him out of her womanish passions, with a most willing heart: and indeed these messengers were such Crafts-masters as they brought Queene Elizabeth into a fooles Paradise, and made her beleue that their words were his heart. Whereupon forgetting all things passed before, as the murder of her sonnes, the dishonour of her husband, the bastardy of their Children, and her owne scandall for Sorcery: nor remembering the faithfull promise shee made to Lady Margaret Earle Henries mother, shee deliuered her fife daughters as lammes committed to the rauening wolfe, in which act of hers is seene the weaknes of that Sexe, and the ambition whereunto by nature they are inclined, for presently vpon the deliuey of her daughters, shee sent priuily for the Lord Marquesse Dorset her sonne, then residing in Paris, willing him to desist from the Earles Faction, and come vnto King Richard, who promised him preferment, and that her selfe and daughters were in high fauour, and all iniuries on both parts forgien and forgotten.

(42) This entrance made vnto the Tragedy intended, to furnish the stage and finish the Scene of her owne life, the next Act must be Queene Anne, who onely now stood in the Tyrants way, her death hee meant should giue life to his intruded regencie, and ade a further Claime and strength to the possession which hee already had, by matching with his Niece the next heire vnto the Crowne the Lady Elizabeth, the le only telling that himselfe had a wife, her death therefore must immediately be sought, yet so as the honorable repute of his name should no waies be impeached, euer carrying himselfe in outward semblance for a good religious honest man, and much delirous that his people should account him so. First therefore hee began to lament the barrennes of his wifes wombe, and the great dangers that the Realme was like to sustaine, if himselfe should die issuelesse, complaining often thereof vnto his Nobility, but most especially vnto Archbishop Rotherham lately released out of prison, whereby the Prelate construed Queene Anne had not long to liue. Then restrained hee her bed vnder pretext of Penancy, taking her defect as a scourge for his owne sinnes, which day and night he sought to expiate by prayers: His next policy was, how her death might be wrought with the least suspect of wrong, and how taken when shee was gone: There-fore fore as an affay to the Peoples taste, he caused it to be giuen forth that Queene Anne was dead, which was so commonly divulged, that the rumour thereof came to her owne care, and shee hauing had sufficient experience of her husbands proceedings, feared this to be one of his plots, mistrusting (and not without cause) that her life was in danger, whereupon all dismayd with a lamentable countenance, she came to the King, and with weeping teares demanded, what offence shee had done, that the sentence of death was giuen against her already. Richard made it strange to see her so perplexed, and with loving words and smiling semblance, bad her liue to scandalize report, and to thinke that many yeeres were yet added to her life, but whether in conceit for sorrow, or of poison, I cannot say, she died shortly after, and was solemnly buried in the Abbey of Westminster.

(43) The King thus deliuered from the bands of Matrimony, and now a widower at liberty to choofe where he would, cast glances of loue towards the Lady Elizabeth his owne brothers daughter, and began to court her for his second Queene, but the thing was so offensive to the Law of nature, and so directly against the Law of God, as all men abhorred the motion, and most of all the maiden her selfe, which Richard perceiving, hee forbore ouer earnest pursuit to gaine his time and all fit occasions; but most especially, hauing no leasure to woo, his subiects on all sides daily reuolting, and his Nobles more and more had in suspect; among whom one was Lord Thomas Stanley Earle of Darby who had married Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, Earle Henries owne mother: him therefore hee most mistrusted, and before hee would admit his departure from Court, hee commanded him to leaue his sonne and heire George Stanley the Lord Strange for his hostage, which he did, though it little auailed to binde Darbies affection vnto his side.

(44) In this while King Richard hearing that Oxford had escaped out of the Castle of Hammes, and that hee, with the Capitaine thereof James Blunt, were fled into France and ioined with Richmond; thought it high time to quench the sparkes in those parts, before they should rise to a higher flame; and therefore hee appointed (which was presently accomplished) the Garrison at Calles to frait the said Castle with a hard siege, being well assured that many wellwillers to the Earles proceedings lay there harboured, who vpon the least aduantage would be ready to play. But Henry not vnmindfull of his distressed friends, nor Oxford forgetting his kinde Hostesse Capitaine Blunts wife, made vnto the Pecece, and on the sudden put Thomas Brandon, with thirty approued Souldiers into the Castle, who from the walles played vpon the besiegers, whiles Oxford annoied them vpon their backs, so that presently they offered, and came to a composition, which was, that they within should safely depart, but the Castle to remaine in Subiection to the King.

(45) Hammes thus restored in danger to be lost, and nothing had thence besides a woman and a few suspected persons, King Richard thought himselfe now sure of all, and fearing no inuasion at home, imagined that much harme could not bee done abroad: for Henry in France (as he thought) found very few friends, and was fully perwaded that the French Kings assistance flood more of words then in deedes. And indeed some occasion of such suspicion was ministred, for King Charles but young, and the Princes at variance, Earle Henry was enforced to make suite vnto them man by man. Besides Thomas Marquefle Dorset sent for by his mother the Queene, suddenly in the night made an escape from Paris, with purpose for England, which stroke great feare among Earle Henries part, chiefly for that all their Counsels were knowne vnto the Marquefle, which if he should reueale, their designs were made desperate. To prevent which, hee was posted after, and brought backe againe, though much against his will. These things considered, King Richard to lessen his great charges, discharged his Navy at seas, commanding the Welsh to watch the shoare; Beacons to be built, and armour to bee ready at euery call; then giuing his affections leaue to entertaine more security, saw not the sword that hung ouer his head.

(46) But Earle Henrie deliuered from the feare of the Marquefle, thought it not best to prolong time, lest others vpon like purposes should bewray his intents; and thereupon obtaining a small aide of the French with a certaine summe of money, for which the Lord Marquefle (whom he much mistrusted) and Sir John Bourcher were left in pledge, hee set forward to Rean, and prepared his shipping in the mouth of Seyn: whither tidings was brought him of Queene Annes death, & that King Richard purposed to marry Lady Elizabeth: a feare indeed fitte exceeding the former, theee being the Princesse by whom hee must claime, whereupon much distemperate arose, euery mans braine working vpon the newes. But after much consultation, it was held the best to make ouer into England, to interpose the proceedings ere the match was fully made, whereupon Earle Richmond with two thousand men onely, and a small number of ships, set saile from Harfleur the fifteenth of August, and the seuenth day following arrived at Milford haue in Wales, where taking land hee came vnto Dale, and thence the next day marched to Hereford well, ten miles into the Maine, from thence hee marched to Cardigan, where hee had newes that the Countrey was forelaide against him, but finding that vnture, hee made still forward, beating downe such Houlds as held against him: then sending secretly to Lady Margaret his mother, to the Lord Stanley, Talbot, and others, signified vnto them, hee meant to passe Seuerne, at Shrewsbury, and thence to march directly towards London. In his way to Shrewsbury, there mette him Sir Rice ap Thomas a man of great command in Wales, with a number of men to side in his quarrell, which Henry afterwards required in making this his first aide the Gouernour of Wales.

(47) The Earle more boldly from Shrewsbury, held on his march to the Towne of Newport, whither Sir Gilbert Talbot with two thousand strong from the young Earle of Shrewsbury gaue him his aide. Then passed hee forward to Stafford, and had conference there with Sir William Stanley, and proceeding forward was honourably received into the City Lichfield, where Thomas Earle of Darby with five thousand armed men had bene some few daies before, but hearing of Earle Henries approach removed to Anderson to auoide suspicion of the jealous King that kept his sonne Hostage for his further truth.

(48) King Richard at this time helde his Court at Nottingham, where being informed that Earle Henrie with a small company was landed in Wales, made small account of what hee could doe, altogether relying vpon the Lord Walter Herbert, and Sir Rice ap Thomas two principall men, in whom hee conceived no little trust: yet left this new risen spring might gather in more heads, hee sent to John Duke of Norfolk, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Earle of Surrey willing them with a selected power to repress the insolency of this headstrong Earle: moreover hee sent for Sir Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Thomas Bourcher, and Sir Walter Hungerford Knights, all of them in great ialousie and mistrust, commanding them with their forces to come and attend vpon his person which accordingly they set forward to doe, meane while sending his Spials to know the way Henrie went, had intelligence that hee was past Shrewsbury without any impeachment; whereat storming in choller and cursing their vntuthes whom hee had put in trust, craued vengeance from heauen, and instantly stantly intended to reuenge it himselfe; then hauing notice the Earle was at Lichfield, and his partie increased by daily repair, incontinently hee marshalled his followers; and like a valiant Capitaine and politike leader set forward his Battailles five and five in a rancke. In the midst of his troopes he bestowed the Carriages belonging to his Army: and himselfe mounted vpon a white Courser, inuironed with his Guard, followed by his footmen, and the wings of Horsemen ranged on euery side, with a frowning sterne countenance, but yet in great Pompe, entered the towne of Leicester after the Sun was set, being full of indignation and swelling in anger, which somewhat hee allayed with threats of reuenge.

(49) Earle Richmond from Lichfield departed for Tamworth, and in the way met Sir Thomas Bourcher and Sir Walter Hungerford going towards the King, who vpon this vnlooked for occasion, and knowing themselves in what suspicion they stood, secretly left the company of their Capitaine Brakenburie the night following, and wandering in waies vnknowne, with much adoe gotte safely vnto the Earles Companies.

(50) In the like danger through darkenesse of night, Henry himselfe chanced to come, for albeit hee was aman both valiant and forward, and by his owne widome could manage his weightiest affaires; Yet now hauing notice that King Richard with a strong army was nere, and that his father in law, the Lord Stanley stood as a Neuter, hee was stricke deepe in his dumps, and with twenty light Horsemen lingering behind, so seriously musing what was to bee done, as lastly, hee lost the sight of his Host, and by the darkenesse of night missed his way; neither durst hee for the Kings Scout-watch demand direction to Tamworth, but lay in a small village about three miles distant, to his no little griefe, and his whole Armes great amazement, the one prognosticating it to be a preface of an ill beginning, and the other doubting some detrimment of their Lord, but in the dawning of the next morning conducted by good fortune hee came to his Host, excusing that his absence was to haue conference with his secret friends; and then priuily departing to the Lord Stanley, had conference with him, and was put in good comfort.

(51) But contrariwise, King Richard was wrapped and perplexed with feare, not onely with the departure of Sir John Saunge, Sir Brian Sanford, and Sir Simon Digby, in whom hee had reposed great trust, but also in the dreadfull dreames which nightly hee suffered, wherein to his seeming, terrible diuels so pulled and haled him, as by no means hee could take any rest, which fearfull imaginations stricke so deep an impression vnto his heart, that the signes thereof appeared in his countenance, howsoever hee fought to put them off in fiew.

(52) But being determined to put himselfe to the trial of battell, or else, (and that rather) enforced by diuine Iustice to pull the reuenging hand of heauen against him, in the morning hee marched toward the enemy, and vpon a faire plaine called Redmore nere vnto Bosworth about seuen miles west from Leicester hee pitched downe his Tents, and thence sent a Pursuant to the Lord Stanley, commanding him to aduance forward with his company, and to come to his presence, which if hee refused to doe, hee sware by Christs passion, his fannes head should off before that hee dined. The Lord Stanley answered the Pursuant, that if the King did so, hee had more finnes alie; but to come to the King hee was not at that time determined. This answer declared, King Richard commanded the Lord Strange incontinently to be beheaded, at the very season, when the two Armies came in fight each of others, but his counsellors tolde him, that the time was now to fight, and not to execute, which might bettet bee done when the field was fought: whereupon the Lord Strange was deliuered prisoner to the keepers of the Kings Tents, and the Kings holy vow thus broke, the Lord Strange escaped with life, by this bad tyrants too good a death.

(53) But now the time and houre of Battell being come, he drew out his Army vpon the plaine, whose order for fight hee thus placed, the forward hee ordered of a maruellous length, to strike the more terror in the Beholders hearts, in whose forefront hee placed his Archers, as a Bulwarke to defend the rest, the leading whereof was committed to John Duke of Norfolk, with whom was Thomas Earle of Surrey, his sonne, his owne Battailion was furnished with his best approued men of warre, hauing Horsemen for wings on both sides of his battell: and being thus ordered for their further encouragement King Richard mounted in place to beheard, thus said to his Souldiers.

(54) "My faithfull followers, friends, and selected Chieftaines, I confesse by your puissant valours I first aspired to the top of this royal estate, in obtaining & wearing this Diademe of Imperiall Maiefty, and maugre the feditious attempts of all cankered aduersaries, by your prudent & politike counsels I haue gouerned the Realm, People and Subiects, as I haue omitted nothing I hope attaining to the office of a iust Prince, nor you pretermitted any thing belonging to the parts & duties of most prudent Counsellors. And albeit, that in the getting of the Garland I was prouoked by sinister Counsell, and seduced by a diabolical temptation to commit a most wicked & detestable Act, yet with salt teares and strait penance I haue, I trust, expiated that heinous offence: which abominable crime, I desire you as clearly to forget, as I daily remember to deplore and lament. If you will now vouchsafe to call to minde in what case we all stand, and in what doubtfull perill we are intrapped, I doubt not but that you will with me confesse, that if euer amity preuailed betwixt the raised, and the raisers, betwixt the Prince and his Subiects, this day requires as much in vs both. For if wife men say true, that there is not so much power in getting, as there is policy in keeping; the one, mere fortunes chance, the other wisdoms deepe insight, then I with you, and you with mee this day must needs take labour and paines, to keepe that preeminence & possession by force, which by your prudent labour I haue obtained. The diuel, you know, a continuall enemy to humane society, a disturber of Concord, and a fower of sedition hath entred into the heart of an vnknowne Welshman (whose father I neuer knew, nor him euer personally saw) exciting him to alpire and couet our Realme and Crowne, to the dishonouring of vs and of our posterity: you see further how a company of Traitors, Theenes, Out-lawes, and runnagates of our owne Nation, besides a number of beggerly Britaines, and faint hearted Frenchmen, are ayders and partakers of this his wicked enterprize, ready at hand to oppress and spoile vs, our lands, our wiues and children; which eminent mischiefs, if we then will withstand and resist, wee must liue and die together as brethren, fight together as Lions, and feare not to die together like men; thus resolu'd, beleue me, the fearefull Hart neuer fled faster before the greedy Grayhound, the silly Larke before the spar-hauke, or the simple sheepe before the Wolfe, then these proud bragging enemies will run out of the Field at the sight of your manly visage. For haue we not already manifest tokens of victory and triumphs? Is not the Capitaine of the Rebellion Richmond a Welsh milke-jop, of no courage and lesse experience in Marshall teates of war, brought vp by my brothers means, and mine, like a bird in a cage, in the Court of the Duke of Britaine, neuer saw Army, neuer wore Armour, without practise and therefore without knowledge,

The order of Richard's battell.

King Richard's Oration vnto his Souldiers.

King Richard confesseth his faults.

"how

"how to gouerne a field. What are his followers but "a fort of fainting runagates, whose fearefull eyes, "as they could not behold our raies in peace, can "worshipe to see our royal banner displayed against "them in fight; for their owne consciences shall be"wray their guilt; their oathes, their perjury; their "promise, infidelities; and the sight of vs their annoin-"ted Soueraign shall either cause them shamefully to "fly, or submissively to yeeld themselves to our mercy.
"As touching his French and Britaine aiders, their "valours haue bene well knowne to our Noble "Progenitors, often vanquished but neuer vanqui"shed, onely braggers without any great deeds, "drunkards without discretion, Ribaulds without "reason, Cowards without resistance, and (in a "word) effeminate, lasciuious, and neuer seene in "the Front of a Battell, seeking ten times more "meanes to flee and escape, then once to assault the "face of their enemies. Therefore like valiant Cap"taines aduance forth your Standards, and make "knowne your manhood by dint of sword, and be "yee sure that if euer one of you giue but one sure "stroke, the day wilbe ours; for how can a handfull "withstand a whole Realme? Aduance therefore "forward, my Captaines; in whom I well know is "wanting neither courage, pollicy, wisdom, nor "puissance. I therefore desire you, for your loue "to meward, the zeale of your native Countrey,
"and the safety of your Prince and felues, to shew
"this day your true English valour, and for my selfe
"I assure you I will this day either triumph in a "glorious victory, or die in this quarrell with im"mortal fame; in whose Palace all our names shall "be enrolled, if we preferre the renowne of our "Countrey before our owne liues. Now S. George
"for vs, and for victorie; haue therefore forward, "and remember this, that I am he who with high "aduancement will preferre the valiant and hardy, "and with seuerer torture will punish the dastard and "cowardly Runaway. The Oration ended, as it
"gaue courage to some, so gaue it distast vnto others, "whose hearts carried gall though their mouthes
"dropped honny; some intended to turne to Earle Henry,
"some determined to take part with the strongest;
"and some meant to stand still and doe nothing; so vi-"sured was he of his Subjects loyalty, that had been so "trayterous to his owne Nephewes.

The diuers opinions of King Richard do heere.

Lord Stanley sent for to Earle Henry.

The Earle mar-shaleth his bat-alions.

The Earle of Oxford Captaine of the Archers.

Henry Earle of Richmond oration.

(55) Earle Richmond then seeing King Richard thus embattell'd, sent to the Lord Stanley who stood houering aloofe off, to come helpe him to order his fight, whose answer was, that Henry should doe it himselfe, and that he would come to him when he saw time conuenient, which stricke the Earle into a great dumpe, but now hauing no time for delay, necessity compelled him to order his men. The Fore-ward he made single according to his small number of souldiers, and in the Front placed his Archers, ouer whom John Earle of Oxford was Captaine, the right wing was led by Sir Gilbert Talbot; and the left assigned to Sir John Saunce; Earle Henry himselfe with his vnkle Tasper Earle of Pembroke gouerned the Main-Battell, better replenished with horse, then foote, whose whole number consisted hardly of fife thousand, the kings doubling the number and more.
The Battells thus ordered, Earle Henry armed at all peeces suauing his helmet, rode from ranke to ranke, and from wing to wing, encouraging his men, and the more to encrease their hot spirits, mounted vp-on a little banke, the better to be seene and heard, these wordes he vttered in all their hearing.

(56) If euer God gaue victory to a iust quar-rell, if euer he aided warre for the tuition of a kingdome or Countrey, or euer succoured them that fought for the reliefe of poore innocents, oppressed by tyranny, then no doubt my friends and fellow souldiers, but that this day he will giue vs a triumphant victory. For if we consider for what, and against whom we fight, we may not doubt but that God himselfe will fight for vs. The thing "which we are here ready to try by sword, is the li"berty of the Land from vnder the vsurpation and "yoke of a Tyrant, and hee, against whom we "draw sword, is the Monster (for I may not call him "man) which feareth neither God, Lawes, Justice, "nor Humanity, an homicide, a murderer of his "owne kindred, a destroyer of the Nobilitie, a Mawle "to his subjects, and a firebrand to the whole King-

"dome, whom iust vengeance craeth to haue quic"ched; and consider I pray you, who be of his band,
"euen such as by murder and vnruth to their kin "and Countrey, haue got wrongfull possession of "our rightfull inheritance, letting your wiues weep, "and Orphanes wander, to seeke their liuelihood
"where they can get it, whose teares I doubt not "crie in the eares of the Lord, who will punish these "Malefactors either with pricke of conscience cow"ardly to flee, or deliuer themselves into our handes "without Battell. Consider further, I pray you, "that in yonder great Battell are men brought more "for feare then for loue, by force compelled and not "willinglie assembled persons that desire more the "destruction, then the life of their Captaine, and fi"nally a multitude, whereof the most part be our "friends and the least part his that leads them; and "surely it stands in suspence, whether the malice of "the souldiers towards their Generall, or his feare "conceiued against them, be the greater, for this is a "rule infallible, that as ill men daily couet to destroy "the good, so God appointeth the good men to con"found the ill, and if it be true that Clerkes preach "that the one is to be hated, and the other beloued, "who then can spare yonder tyrant Richard Duke of "Gloester vntruly calling himselfe king, that hath "broken both the Lawes of God and man, in the "blood of his brother, the murder of his Nephewes,
"the death of his wife, the slander of his owne mo"ther, and the bastardizing of his brethren. If you
"haue not heard, yet I haue read that Tarquinius
"the proud, for the rape of Lueretia, lost the Kingdome "of Rome; yet was not his fact so detestable as Ne"raes, who slew his owne mother, to behold the "place of his conception: but yonder vsurper is "both these persons in one; a Nero in murder of his "young Nephewes, and in defaming the wombe of "his owne conception; and a Tarquinius intending to "defile, and carnally to know his owne Nece vnder "pretext of holy Matrimony, which Lady you are "witness, I haue sworn shalbe my wife. This is the "quarrell for which we are here this day assembled,
"and for whose equity we craue God to be iudge:
"a good beginning, of his Protection we haue alrea"dy seene, in escaping the treasons laid for vs in Br-"taine, the dangers of Seas, and our safe arriuage vnto
"this place, not hunted by anie, but rather our felues "hunting after that furious Bore; who this day, and "in this place, is so intangled in his owne toyle, as his "crooked tuskes shall not be able to gnaw the cords "of his snare asunder, nor himselfe haue power, to "free himselfe from his pursuers, whose Iauelines (I "doubt not) shall be dield in the blood of this filthie
"swine, and shall well rid the world of an vglie hogd-"backed Monster: which thing to accomplish let vs "remember, that victory is not gotten by multitude
"but by manhood, but the smaller number we bee,
"the greater is our glory if we vanquish, if vanqui"shed steretring time shall neuer consume our memo"ry, that died to free our felues, and Nation from "the oppression of an vsurping Tyrant; and thus I "assure you, that for to iust a cause you shall finde
"me this day rather a dead Carrion vpon the colde "ground, then a Carper prisoner kept alive for re"proch. Aduance therefore forward like true hearted "Englishmen, display your Banner in defence of your "Countrey, get the day and be Conquerors, loose "the Battell, and be villaines; God and Saint George
"giue vs a happy successe. Which no sooner was said "but that the souldiers buckled their Helmes, the "Archers stript vp their slieues, bent their bowes and "frushed

The readie Earle Henry
souldiers frushed their feathers attentively listning when the Trumpet should giue the sound of Battell.

(57) Betwix both the Armies there lay a great marsh, which Earle Henry left vpon his right hand, with purpose to haue that for a defence, as also the Sunne at his backe, and face of the enemy, which when King Richard perceived, with sound of trumpet and shout of his Army, hee passed the Marsh, when the bow-men on both sides freely flie their arrowes: the rest comming to encounter with strokes: but the Earle of Oxford fearing to be encompassed by the enemy, commanded euer of his rankes to keepe within ten foot of his Standard, which being accomplished, and their fight a while stayed, their opposites mistrusting some fraud or deceit, ceased likewise from theirs, many of them willing inough so to doe; notwithstanding, the L.
Stanley at the same time ioyning with the Earle, a cruell battell was againe begunne, and manfully continued vpon either part. Till lastly, King Richard hauing intelligence that the Earle of Richmond was but slenderly accompanied with men of Armes, and them also builed in their owne guardes, meant by his incounter to finish the day, as the onely man, vpon whom stood all the hope of his enemies successe, and therefore hauing the markes of Earle Henry, made from the range of his owne battell, and vpon the spur with his Speare in his Reft, ranne violently towards him in a furious plee; in which rage, at the first brunt, hee bare downe and ouerthrew the Earles Standard, and slew Sir William Brandon the bearer thereof; next matching with Sir John Cheine a man of great might, manfully threw him to the ground, thereby making an open passage by dint of sword vnto the Earle himselfe: Richmond beholding the high valour of Richard, most lion-like coped with this cruell Bore, and held him maugre his tuskes at his sword point, betwix whom the fight was so desperate, that Henries company were strucke in great despair; at which very instant Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand tal fresh Souldiers, who entred the battell with such courage and valour, as they bare downe all before them where they went, whereat the Kings side began to faint, and to giue ouer fight; but the more resolute a while maintaining their ground, and now mistrus-ting treason among themselves, turned their backs and ran away, whereby King Richard presently percieued the downefall of his ill raised glory, and the full period of his short raigne: and all hope of resistance now past, a swift horse was brought to escape the field, with comforts that another day might set the victory on his side: but with a mind vnmatchable in hatred against Henry, or rather to haue his death registred in fames honorable role, whose life had bene blotted with the penne of diuiled infamie, hee hastily clofed his helmet, saying, that that day should make an end of all battels, or else in this now in trying he would finish his life, which last was presently performed; for thrusting into the middell of his enemies, and there valiantly fighting among the thickest, hee obtained more honor in this his two howres fight, then he had gained by all the actions of his whole life.

(58) There died that day with him John Duke of Norfolke, Walter Lord Ferrers of Charley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more: Sir William Catesby one of King Richards chiefe Counsellors with two others, were taken and two daies after beheaded at Leicester, among them that escaped were Frances Viscount Lowell, Humphrey, and Thomas Stafford brethren, which three tooke Sanctuary at S. Johns in Gloester. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey though he submitted himselfe vnto Henry, yet was hee committed to the Tower and therein a long time remained. Vpon Earle Henries part onely ten men were slaine, as Sir Gilbert Talbot wrote the newes from the field, whereof for note Sir William Brandon was the best, in all to the number of foure thousand men. This battell was fought the two and twentieth of August, and yere of Christ Iesus 1485. in the field Redmore, nere vnto Bosworth, in the Countie of Leicester; after which Earle Henry gaue thanks vnto God, and commending his Souldiers, with suffrance for them to take the spoiles of the field, dubbed many of the knights; which his doings was so acceptable to the whole Army, as with great applaue they all cryed King Henry, King Henry; whose forwardnesse to him-ward, when the Lord Stanley perceived, hee tooke K. Richards Crowne, found among the spoile of the field, and set it vpon the Earle of Richmonds head, thereby confirming the election of the people, at which instant beganne the raigne of this new King.

(59) The slaine body of the vsurping Tyrant, all tugged, and torne, naked, and not so much as a clout left to couer his shame, was trusted behind Blanch Seint Leger (or White Bore, a Pursuant at Armes,) like a hogge or Calfe, his head and Armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legges on the other, and all besprinkled with mire and blood, was so brought into Leicester, and there for a miserable spectacle the space of two dayes lay naked and vabur-dized, his remembrance being as odious to all as his person deformed, and lothsome to be looked vpon: for whose further despite, the white Bore his cognizance was torne downe from euerie Signe, that his monument might perish, as did the monies of Ca-ligula, which were all melted by the decree of the Senate: Lastly, his body without all funeral solemnity was buried in the Gray-Friers Church of that City. But King Henry his Successor, of a princely disposition, caused afterward his Tombe to bee made with a picture of Alabastrer, representing his person, and to be set vp in the same Church, which at the suppression of that Monastery was pulled downe, and vtterly defaced; since when his graue ouergrowne with nettles and weedes, is very obliu-ous and not to be found. Onely the stone chest wherin his corpes lay, is now made a drinking trough for horses at a common Inne, and retaineth the onely memory of this Monarches greatesse. His body also (as tradition hath deliuered) was borne out of the City, and contemptuously bestowed vnder the end of Bow-Bridge, which giueth passage ouer a branch of Stowe vpon the west side of the Towne. Vpon this Bridge (the like repore runneth) stood a stone of some height, against which King Richard, as hee passed toward Bosworth, by chance strucke his spur, and against the same stone as he was brought backe, hanging by the horse side, his head was dashed and broken, as a wife woman (forsooth) had foretold, who, before Richards going to battell, being asked of his successe, said, that where his spurre strucke, his head should be broken; but of these things, as is the report, so let be the credite. Dead he is, and with his death ended the factions a long time continued betwix the Families of Lancaster and Torke; in whose bandings, to bring, let & keep the Crown on their heades, eight or nine bloody set battels had bene fought, and no lesse then foure score persons of the blood-royall slaine, as Philipp Commies the French Writer saith; many of them being wel knowne to himselfe: after which stormes, and this Tirants death, a blessed vnion ensued, by joining those houses in Henry of Lancaster, and Elizabeth of Torke.

(60) Hee was of stature but litle, and of shape deformed, the left shoulder bunching out like a Mole-hill on his backe, his haire thinne, and face thort, a cruell countenance, in whose aspect might bee perceiued both malice and deceit. When hee stood musing (as hee would doe oft) his vie was, to bite and chaw the nether lip, his hand euer on his dagger, which euer hee would choppye and down in the sheath, but neuer draw it fully out. Pregnant in wit hee was, wily to faine, apt to dissemble, and haugh-haughty of Stomacke, an expert Souldier, and a better King then a man. He founded a Colledge at Middleham beyond Tork, and a Collegiat Chauntry in London, neere vnto the Tower, called Our Lady of Barkings; he endowed the Queenes Colledge in Cambridge with five hundred Marks of yeerely reuenew; and disforrested the great Field of Wichwood, which King Edward his brother had inclosed for his game: he reigned two yeeres, two months, and one day, and was buried, as we haue said.

His Issue.

(62) Edward the sonne of King Richard, and of Queene Anne his Wife, and the onely childe of them both, was borne in the Castle of Middleham, neere Richmond, in the Countie of Yorke Anno 1473. and being vnder foure yeeres of age was created Earle of Salisbury by his Vncle King Edward the fourth, the seuenteenth of his Raigne; but his father King Richard in the first of his vsurpation created him Prince of Wales, the foure & twentieth of August, and yeere of Christ, 1483. he then being about ten yeeres of age, vnto whom also the Crowne was intailed by Parliament; but this Prince dying before his father, and much vpon the time of his mothers decease, law not the reuenge that followed the Tyrants Raigne, whole bad life. no doubt hath made doubtfull the place of this Princes buriall, and other Princely offices done him in his life, and at his death.

Comb. Epit.

HENRIE THE SEVENTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XX.

HENRIE of that name the seauenth, hauing by such mixt meanes of valor and practise as are already described, obtained the possession of Englands Crown, we must now present vnto you his actions in the person and state of a King, maintained by him with like mixture of courage and skill as it was achieved; to the verification of that rule, That things are kept by the same Arts whereby they were gained. In describing whereof, wee meane nothing lesse, then for humoring the vaine admirers of phraze and conceit, to mount vp into Panegyricall flourishes, in honor of the man, though his excellent vertues would worthily beare, if not duely also exact them: yet may wee not omit to obserue, that as in his attaining to the Crowne, there was (through diuine prouidence) a concurring disposition of all important Circumstances, without which his attempt might haue proved disastrous; so hee, hauing now possessed the Soueraigne power, and mastered the State in the maine pointes, callly made circumstance waite vpon his wisdom, and to take their forme from his directions: Of the first kind, wherein his felicity deserues to be celebrated, were these. That he by the Male-line a meere stranger to both the roiall houses, as descended from the Welsh and French, and by the female springing out of such a family of Lancaster (the Beaufords) as by the same law which enabled it to inherite in ordinary estates, was made incapable of succession in the Regalitie, should so safely be conuayed away into forraigne parts, there to continue a head of expectation and reuolt, during ring the intestine troubles and dangers, to him inestimable here at home. Secondly, that the Realme of England should bee so averted from Richard, (though a very honorable, wise, iust and necessary Prince, after hee was somewhat settled) as for his sake, to neglect (in a sort) so many naturall heires of the house of York, some of them in right preceding Richard, such were the children of Edward the fourth, and George Duke of Clarence, Richards elder brethren, and all of them iust barres to the Earle of Richmond, who scarce had any thing of a legal title, or of a warrantable intention; but his purpose to remove an Usurper and marry the Lady Elizabeth, the rightful inheritor. Thirdly, a long and fatal slackness of Richard in his warlike preparations, through the meer contempt of his enemy the Earle, which was the cause, that both he landed securely, and Richard was driuen to fight in a manner with tu-multuary, rather then trained forces. And finally, that a principall, potent, noble, and yet a deeply inspected Conspirator, (as being Father in law to the Earle) should haue charge, vnder Richard, ouer a chiefe portion of his Army at the very instant of ioyning battell.

(2) These considerations (among many other) had in them such an aptitude to his designe, as no humane wit could fashion, and without the which a man of equall statures and parts to Henry, or Henry himselfe, might in vaine haue beene wife, in vain, indutious and valiant. Circumstances of the other sort shall plentifully occur in the whole carriage of his ensuing actions. In both which, are verified two contrary rules; for the state of the first obseruation teacheth vs with Plautus, that Centum doctorem hominum confilia huc vna vincit Dea, This one God-desse can effect more, then the wits of an hundred learned men; speaking as an Heathen man of that famous Idole Fortune; and in the second, that which Tuene all excellently noteth;

Nullum numen abest, si sit prudentia, sed te Nos facimus Fortuna Deam, colloque lacamus.

No Goddesse wants, where Prudence guides, though Chance A Goddesse deems, yond Men to Heauen aduance.

(3) Now for the Character of this famous wife Prince (which with reason ought to bee fer in front to his actions, as certain lights of the mind; by which to discern the fountain of counsels and causes) a learned, eloquent Knight, and principall Lawyer of our time, giues vs many things, of which these selected, are very regardable. This King (saith he) attained vnto the Crowne, not onely from a "private fortune, which might endue him with a mode"ration, but also from the fortune of an exiled man, "which had quickned in him all the seeds of obseruati"on and industry. His wisdom (speaking thereof, as "it was in his raigne) seemed rather a dexterity to "deliuer himselfe from dangers when they pressed him, "then any deepe foresight to prevent them a farre off.
 "Icious hee was ouer the Greatnesse of his Nobility, as "remembering how himselfe was set vp. Great and de-"uout reuerence hee bare vnto religion, as hee that "employed Ecclesiasticall men in most of his affaires. In "his government hee was led by none, scarcely by his "lawes, and yet he was a great obseruer of formality in "all his proceedings, which notwithstanding was no im"pediment to the working of his will. In his wars (mean"ing domesticke) hee was rather confident then en"terprising, by which all hee was commonly then en"poored. Generally, hee seemed inclinable to live in peace, "and in the quenching of the Commotions of his subiects,
 "hee was euer ready to achieve those wars in person,
 "sometimes referring himselfe, but neuer retiring him"selfe. Of nature hee coneyed to accumulate treasure: in "expending whereof hee neuer spared charge that his af-"fares required, and in his foundations was magnificent "enough. He chose commonly to employ cunning persons, as he that knew himselfe sufficiently to make use of their "uttermost reaches, without danger of being abused with "them himselfe.

(4) Another hauing a purpose to write in English the history of this Henry (an argument which for the worthy doing thereof, requires as wife a man as Henry himselfe,) hath among many extraordinary praises (most what framed out of his strong affection) truly noted concerning his achievement of "the Crowne: That the Almighty hand of God brought "him ouer the toppe of the highest and most dangerous "obstacles, to sway this Scepter, when neither Title, "Power, nor (great) Probability could giue him formach
 "as one found push to set him forward. And of the man "himselfe, That hee entertained that, as Iodaine, as So-"meraigne change of fortune, with such moderation, and "untransported discretion, as it well appeared hee had "throughly conquered himselfe, before hee subdued the "Usurper his enemy. What could bee added greater to true a praye? nothing certainly; for that he (as else-where that Writer saith) was the Salomon, who brought peace to this Kingdome, long before oppressed by warre and tyranny: it was onely an excellent effect of that excellent moderation. Other Authors of our times concur in the same iudgement of him, whom they prayse "for singular wisdom, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality; for policy, iustice, and gravity: which princely vertues caused him to bee highly reuerenced of foraine Princes. These honourable Eulogies after so many yeeres from his death, iustly countenance their relations, who writ-ting, in or about his owne dayes auerre no lesse; among whom, Bernard Andreas of Tholoz, is most flowing and abundant. This Andreas (as himselfe writes) was afterward entrusted with the instruction of Prince Arthur (eldest sonne to King Henry) in good letters, though hee was blind; and hauing afwell the title of Poet Laureat, as of the Kings Histori-ographer, (how hardlie fouer those two faculties meet with honour in the same person) meant to haue historified and poetized the Acts of this king, but (for want of competent and attended instructions in many places of chiefe importance) left his labour full of wilde breaches, and vnfinished; yet in such points as he hath professed to know, not vnworthy to bee vouched: for there is in him a great deale of cleare elocution, and defecated conceit aboue the ordinary of that age. Hee, among other verses in honour of this our Henry (whom he entyleth the most sapient King) hath these not hyperbo-licall, but proper, wherein hee salutes him,

Princeps ingenio nitente praestante, Famâ, religione, comitate, Sensu, sanguine, gratia, decore.

A peerlesse Prince for wisdom rare, Fame, piety, courtesie, debonaire, Knowledge, birth, grace, and feature faire.

Whereby also, after these portraicts of his inward faculties, and gifts, may be guessed that a body they had for their mortall mansion, no way vnfitable; and it seemes by that Maely (so they call the Images of our Kings, which are carried for representation in their funerall Chariots) which at this day is "extant, that hee was of stature tall and slender, com-
 "what round vifaged, and though in * his childhood "sickly, yet of aspect in all his outward lineaments, "so noble and gracious, as well prefiged, and after"ward fitted the most fortunate height to which he "was now ascended. But notwithstanding these great "praises, there want not some who think him to haue "been an heauy Father to the common wealth, which
 "by sundry courtes hee greatly laboured to bring vnder, "as a seeming ground-work of his owne, and his "posterities security. And in his last dayes Anaric, (the naturall maladie of age) tooke him stronglie, the enuy whereof he partly diuerted from himselfe by the splendor of some few public buildings, which

(5) Let vs now behold his vertues as they are shiningly deduced into action. After the Battell he hauing truly first ascribed the whole good of his successe to God, commanded, that to the body of * his enemy King Richard, an honorable interment should be giuen in the Friars at Leicester, where notwithstanding * hee was with little reuerence buried. From thence the King made speed to London, as to the chiefe seat and Epitome of the English Monarchie, without which no Prince found himselfe heere secure enough: he entred the Citie vpon a * Saturday, as vpon a Saturday he obtained his triumphall and Crowning victory. The Mayor of London and his fellowship, * receiued him in violet at Harnsey Parke, but his entrance (which was at * Shordiech) was honoured with a very great troope of the Peeres, and Nobles in his traine, at which our Poet-icall Historian Andreas was present, and saluted the victorious Prince with certaine Latine Sapphicks, which hee sung vnto him as himselfe writeth. But Henry staid not in Ceremonious greetings and popular acclamations, which (it seemes) hee did purposely eschue, for that (Andreas saith) hee entred * covertly, meaning belike, in an Horie-litter or clofe Chariot. His lodging was in the Bishoppe of London Pallace, where (after publike offertories and solemne thanks giuen to God in the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul) the businesse of his Coronation was seriously consulted of; which was afterward (vpon his remove to the Tower, where hee * created his vncle Isabel Earle of Pembroke, Duke of Bedford, and other Estates) with due pompe and rituall magnificence * accomplished at Westminster.

(6) But the naturall solder and indissoluble ec-cement, which must make this Kingdome stand, was his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late Edward the fourth. This as a point of most importance was with great maturity and iudgement againe thought vpon, when Henry was now already crowned. The remoter danger, supposed to reside in the person of Edward Earle of Warwick (only sonne and heire, euen in his infelicities, to that vntfortunate Prince George Duke of Clarence) was prevented; for he had bene, by King Henries direction, brought vp prisoner from the Manour of * Sheriff-hutton in Yorkshire, (where as well he, as the Lady Elizabeth were kept by King Richard vnder guard) and immediately shut vp within the Tower of London.

(7) Frances * Duke of Britaine had offered Henrie before his departure to match him with the Ladie Anne his eldest daughter and sole heire, but hee was otherwise affected, as placing his loue where it might afford him greatest & presentest strengths. Andreas addeth, that King Edward himselfe destinated his eldest daughter vnto Henry then Earle of Rich-mund, and fought in his life time to haue effected it; but his meaning being (belike) suspected, as but a drift to get Henry into his hands, the motion tooke no hold as referred till God had cleared the way of all such impediments, as might hinder the consolidation of both the Royall families, York and Lancaster, (after their fo mortall and confusue massacres) in the person of one Soueraigne.

(8) The Lady her selfe, besides youth and beau-tie (precious Ornaments of that Sexe) had in her from her * infancy a wonderfull feare, and care to please God, and a like dutious and humble carriage toward her parents: her brothers and sisters (see did exceedinglie loue, and as well toward the poore, as all the Seruants of Christ, see bare a singular affection. * Her Vncle the late vlturper) in contempt of God and man (whose Lawes hee was so long accustomed to violate, till the iust reward thereof did at the length ouertake him) incessantly meant to haue defiled her, vnder the abused name of Matrimonie. When therefore the newes of his death came to her eare, the ioy of her heart brake forth into these words. * So yet at the last thou hast, O God, regarded the humble, and not despised their prayers. I will remember, neither shall I at any time be weary to remember, that my most noble Father of famous memory meant to haue bestowed me in marriage vpon this most comely Prince. O that I were now worthy of him; but my Father being dead, I want such good friends as should motion so great a matter: and perhaps hee will take a wife from forraigne parts, whose beauty, age, fortune, and dignity shall bee more then mine. What shall I say? I am all alone, and dare not open my minde to * any.

 What if I acquainted my mother therewith? Baseness forbids: What if some of the Lords? Audacity wanteth.
 O then that I might but confer with him! perhaps in discourse I might let slippe such a word as might discouer my intention. What will bee I know not: this I know, that Almighty God cannot tell how to absent himselfe from them who trust in him. Therefore I make an end of thinking, and repose my whole hope vpon thee, O my God, doe with mee according to thy mercy. Shee secretly thus re-uoluing all matters, and resolving of them in her minde, was heard from aboue; for King Henry hauing vnderstood the honour, chastity, and singular vertues of the maiden Princeesse, the rather inclined to make her the Soueraigne of his affections: assigning therefore * a day, wherein (for the viter abolishi-ment of all Hostilities betweene the two Roiall houses of York and Lancaster) to establish an vnion of Families by coniunction of their two persons in marriage.

(9) The meane while hee wisely goes on to secure the maine, which consisteth in setting the generall state, and securing his owne person, hee, for the one, * holds a Parliament at Westminster, and for the other, institutes a certaine number of choise * Archers, with allotment of fees and maintenance, which vnder a peculiar Capitaine, and the name of Yeoman of the Guard, he assigned to that seruice, for him and his successors, Kings and Queenes of England. In the Parliament was attained Richard late Duke of Gloucester, stilling himselfe by vsurpation, King Richard the third; and with him by name many other of the Nobility and Gentry. And yet withall to lay a foundation for his green Government in loue and clemencie, hee, during the Parliament proclaimed free pardon and entire restitution of their fortunes, to all such as submitted themselves to his mercy, and made oath of Fidelity. A seasonable and necessarie Act; Whereby hee greatly weakened malicious humors, and wanne to himselfe no small accession of friendship and seruices; for many forsooke Sanctuaries, and tooke vp their refuges in his goodnesse and most gracious fauour. And to remoue all scandall and danger from his friends, he re-uerued and reuoked all former Acts, hurtfull either to himselfe, or to them for his cause, the whole house of Parliament, * concurring finally in establishing by a solemne Act, the Crowne vpon him, and his heires for euer.

(10) After dissolution of which Parliament, the King redeemes such pledges, as hee had left in France for money borrowed, and assumes into his Counsel those two renowned agents in aduancing his fortunes, John Morton and Richard Foxe, as the most necessarie parts and supports of his State; the former of which, not long after (Thomas Beuchier dying) was elected and enthronized Archbishop of Canterbury, the latter, was forthwith aduanced to be Lord Keeper of his Priuy Seale, & successively preferred to the Bishopricks of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester.

(11) The most wished and most welcome * day of marriage betweene King Henry and the Princeesse Elizabeth being now come, was celebrated by them with all religious and glorious magnificence, and by the people, with * fires of ioy, dancings, longes and bankets through London, all forts and sexes beech-ching Almighty God to send the King and Queene most prosperous success, and an infinite increase of the common joy by bestowing upon them a young Prince, and other issue at his good pleasure: Which prayers (saith Andreas) our Lord Iesus Christ vouchsafed to heare; the Queene within a while after, prouing with Child, of whom shee was happily deliuered in the moneth of September following at Winchester, which to the most fortunate King was a new happinesse, to the Queene a great reioycement, to the Church a souveraine delight: to the Court an exceeding pleasure; and in briefe to the whole Kingdome an incredible contentment. Nor that without reason, as it afterward appeared, for (if God had bene pleased to haue granted longer life) not England onely, but the whole world should in such a pledge haue had cause of eternall reioycement. But God who gouernes all things, and in whose hand are all the Scepters of Princes, as dates of their liues, disposed otherwise.

(12) Meanwhile there were not a few who did enuie to King Henry this vnexpected height of felicitie; but they who first discouered themselves, were certaine remaines of the late ouerthrow at Bosworth, whose diffidence, or euill will, was greater then to relie vpon King Henries clemencie, or to behold the dazzling brightnes of his new achieved glorie; and for that cause refused to forsake the Sanctuarie, which they had taken at Colechester. These were the Lord Louell, Sir Humphrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother. Who, while the King, secure of dangers behind him, was in his Progresse at Torke, meaning by affability, bounty and other his wisest courtes, to gaine the good will of the Northern people, (with whom the memory of King Richard was very deare) and so to weaken the strengths and hopes of all future conspiracies, forsooke their refuge, and secretly in several places gathered forces, therewith to surprize and dethrone the King. The Lord Louell raised his forces with such speed, that the King who at Lincoln first heard of his escape, and lightly regarded the same, was no sooner settled in Torke, but certaine intelligence came that he approached fast with an Armie; and withall, that the Staffords had assembled forces in Worcester-shire, meaning to assault the City of Worcester. The extremity of the King (who neuer dreamt of such a darling) was not small, for neither had he any sufficient numbers about him of his sure friends, nor could iustly repose confidence in the Northern men, whose loie to King Richard their late laine Lord, made them still suspected. But danger quickeneth noble courages, and therefore vpon due recollection of himselfe, hee armed about three thousand men, (furnished leather, whereof the most of their breast-pieces, for want of other stiffe, were framed, may be called armour) and sends them vnder the leading of Jasper Duke of Bedford, with commission to pardon, or to fight. The Duke offering pardon, the Lord Louell fled by night to Sir Thomas Broughton into Lancashire, where hee lurked certaine monethes; the headlesse multitude yeeld without stroake, and the felicity of King Henry preuailes in every place; for the Staffords hearing what had happened to their Confederates, disperie their Clouds of rebels, and speedily take refuge at Colham a village about two miles from Abingdon in Oxfordshire. But the priuiledges of that place * being iudicially found in the Kings Bench, they were found vnable to afford protection to open traitors, whereupon they were forcibly taken thence, and conueighed to the Tower of London, from whence Sir Humphrey Stafford was drawne and executed at Tiburne, but his brother Thomas by the Kings mercy had his pardon. These short dangers and troubles, by reason of their fainttude did worthily make the King wakefull euen ouer smaller accidents; this blaze being kindled from so neglected sparkles. But there followed deuises, which in their owne nature were so strangely impudent, and in their vent so strongly bolstered, that if Louels enterprise made him suspicious, these other might iustly fill him with innumerable ialousies.

(13) The records are immortal, which testifie, that the erection of Idols and Counterfeits, to dethrone them who are in possession, is a verie old Stratagem. What troubles a Pseudo-Nero wrought, by support of the Parthians (who wonderfully fauoured Nero liuing,) the Romane writers teach vs. Neither hath the Duell (Father of Impostures) any so solemne practise, as Personation and Resemblances of true, whether men or things. In so much that some Diuines haue thought, that as he can, and often doth transfigure himselfe into the forme of a Celestiall Angell, so that he also deceiued our first mother vnder that resplendent but assumed habit. And what mischiefs he wrought, in this very kind of thrusting out into the world false pretenders, the speech of wile Gamaliel testifieth, who rehearseth the names of Theudas and Judas Galilee; but the world hath since had more woeful experience hereof, in that execrable Impostor Mahomet, pretending to bee the Mesias. In England it selfe (before the time of this Henry) what strange practises and conspiracies were set on foote vnder the title of a Pseudo-Richard in the reigne of Henry the fourth, the former Histories haue sufficiently opened, so that this Prince encountered nothing new in the Generall, how soeuer pestilent and extraordinarie in the particular. Indeed his reigne (more perhaps then any other of his predecessors) afforded plentiful matter for such deuises to worke vpon, there being many then, who hauing bene * concealed (as it were) in the bowels of Sedition, and nourished with the bitter and pernicious milke of dissension, were not onely apt to embrace, but also, where they were not offered, euen there to beget occasions of confounding all. Men, who could neither endure warre, nor peace long, nor any lawes in either, as desirous to enioy the licentious violence of ciuill warre; a misery, which all wordes (how wide soeuer) want compass to expresse. The strange attempts of which kind of men (or rather Monsters) we shall see exemplified in the subsequent tragedies. Richard Simon, an ambitious and impetuous wretch, and withall a Priest, neither vnlearned, (the sacred shadow of which name the rather countenanced his practises) in hope to make himselfe the principall Bishop of England, plotted the aduancement of Lambert Symnell (being his pupil in the Vniuersitie of Oxford) to the Crown of England; instigated there to by the duell, and suborned by such as fauoured the White-roffe faction, vpon this occasion. There went a rumour, that Edward Earle of Warwick, sonne and heire to George the late vnfortunate Duke of Clarence, second brother of King Edward, * was either already murdered, or should shortly bee. This Architect of guile, Simon hauing this Symnell in tuition, (the sonne of a Baker, or Shoemaker, but a well-faced and Princely-shaped youth, of no very euill nature, but as it was corrupted by his Tutor,) means out of this rumors aerie substance, to produce an apparition and prodigie, which in Title, behaviour, and artificiall answers (insufed by his Tutors practises) should resemble * one of King Edwards children. Here we must confesse that our authors leade vs into a perplexitie: Some affirming, that this counterfet was exhibited to the world vnder the name of Edward Earle of Warwick, sonne of the Duke of Clarence, by the most turbulent and fatal Earle of Warwick slain at Barnet-field. But hereunto reason seemes repugnant. For what ground of claime could that Gentleman haue, not onely for that his Father was attainted, but much more for that the Queene of England then in being, was the indubitate eldest daughter and heire of King Edward the fourth, and sister and next heire to Edward the fifth? Neither wants there ancient authority then any of the others, affirming, that this Idoll did vnrue the name of one of King Edwards sonnes; many arguments concurring to buttresse this affirmation. For, if at the same time (as Polydore writeth) it was bruted, that the sonnes of King Edward the fourth had not been murdered vnder their usurping vncke Richard, but were escaped, and liued in obscurity beyond the Sea; how can that be true, which Stow and the rest (who follow Polydore therein) affirm, that Lambert was crowned King of England at Dublin in Ireland, as heire to George Duke of Clarence? For with what iniurie to the roiall brethren (fained to be alive) was that? Verily there seemes no coherence in the circumstances, nor apparence of truth in the substance. And how much stronger to the purpose of the Conspirators was the fiction of an Edward, the Kings sonne, and himselfe once proclaimed King, then of an Edward, who was but an Earle, and a Duke of Clarendon heire? But you will aske, what was the poore Earles part in this tragedie? what other? then that by rumoring his murder, they might bring the person of King Henry into common detestation for his crueltie; for clearing whereof the King publickly afterward shewed the Earle to the view of all. And albeit the vulgar fame is, that Lambert was called Edward, yet * one who then liued, saith directly, that this Cypher was dubbed & mounted from his owne meane ranke to the title of a King, vnder the name of the second brother, who for certaine was called Richard: but what Record there is to the contrary, it vs vs yet vnknown; for our vulgar Bookes extant can hardly passe with a Iury of ordinary Criticks, and Censors for vnchallengeable euidence.

(14) This aery Typhon (which grasped at the embracement of the two Kingdomes of England and Ireland) thus thoroughly schooled and instructed, is secretly conueighed by his Sionian Tutor to Dublin, the chiefe City of the Irish, where he was confidant of partakers, as amongst the hereditary Clients, and adherents of the house of Torke; which affection was first breathed into them by the cunning popularities of the Lord Richard Duke of Torke, the first of that line, who publickly named the English Crowne. His hopes deceiued him not, for the Lord * Chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Fitz-Gerald (of the noble Familie of the Geraldines) presently professed himselfe for the plot, and by his authority and persuasions drew the generality of the Irish after him into it. Messengers are hereupon dispatched, vpon all hands both into England, to such as they had hope of, and into low Germany to the Lady Margaret, sister of King Edward the fourth, Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundy, a most mortall enemy of the Lancastrian family. In both places the lighted matches of sedition found powdry spirits, and wonderfull correspondence. There is flocking from all parts to support the quarrell, and the Irish (to haue the glory of giuing England a King) proclaim & reuerence this painted puffe, & flying bubble with royall style and honors.

(15) Henrie seeing the fire so strangely kindled round about the wals of his best hopes & strengths, fals seriously to counsell at the Monastery of Carthusian Monkes nere Richmond, where after exact deliberation it was decreed, 1. That general pardon (to stay the minds of as many as it was possible) should without any exception bee proclaimed to such as from thenceforth should continue dutifull. Which was principally done to temper, and assure some priuate persons, as Sir Thomas Broughton and others, whose forces, willes, and wealth were held most in suspicion. 2. That Elizabeth late wife to Edward the fourth, and mother in law to Henry now King of England, should forfeit all her lands and goods for that (contrary to her faith giuen to them, who were in the plot for bringing in King Henry) shee had yeelded up her daughters to the hands of the Tyrant Richard. 3. That Edward Earle of Warwick then Prisoner in the Tower, should bee openly shewed alive in London. All which was accordingly executed, but without any great fruit, for still the plot went on.

(16) The condemnation of Elizabeth Queene Dowager, rather moued enuy towards Henry, then relieved his cause; for to many the iustice of that sentence was doubtful, the circumstance of a mother in law inferred a breach of pietie, and the iudgement it selfe did alwaies want example. The iustice was doubtfull both in regard of the cause, and of the proceeding. Of the cause, for how could shee haue defended her daughters by the priuiledge of sanctuary from such a Wolfe and Tyger, as would haue infringed it for her sons, had they not been quickly deliuered to his bloodie hands? The same Tyrant doth now demand her daughters as to honour, not to slaughter; but if it had bene to slaughter, what helpe? shee, terrified with the motion, after much deliberation yeelds them to him, when shee neither could, nor durst detain them. But you say the violated her faith, and hazarded thereby the liues and hopes of all that were in the plot for her cause. A great crime certainly. But Richard was in title, and power a King, and hung ouer her head with inuitable terrors; when Henry of Richmond was but an Earle, and he farre off, and in banishment, and without any apparence of preuailling, and her selfe a friendlesse widow. The manner of proceeding was no lesse strange; for by what law or triall was shee condemned in a Præmure? Shee neuertheless is put out of all, and confined to the Monastery of Berghamstedt in Southwarke, where finally she ended her dayes, borne to bee an example of both fortunes, hauing from a forlorne widowes estate bene raised to the bed of a Bachelour Monarcke; and in his life time bene reduced to the seeming of a priuate fortune, when her Lord was driuen to flie the land; and afterward saw those turnes and varieties as few Queenes euer felt, or saw so many, or more contrarie; whether we regard the height of worldly felicity, when shee did behold her sonne a King, or the depth of misery, when the Tyrant invaded his Crowne and life, or now her daughter being Queene, and her selfe a miserable prisoner. The consideration whereof, as it may worthily mortifie ambitious affections; so the strangeness of the sentence verifies that collection among others, which * that learned Gentleman makes of this Kings reign in these wordes. Hee had (saith hee) a very strange kind of interchanging very large and vnexpected pardons with seuerer executions. Nevertheless, (his wisdom considered) it could not be imputed to any inequality, but to a discretion, or at least to a principle, that hee had apprehended, that it was not good, obstinately to pursue one course, but to trie both wayes. How soeuer that was; certainly, hee being so iust an object of his commiseration, who had married that daughter, by which hee enioyed a Kingdome, and gotten that verie power, wherewith he ruined her; it cannot bee reasonably thought, but that there were other most important motives, perswading such a sharpe course, or otherwise, that it must bee reckoned among the chiefe of his errors. But as in the times of her flourishing estate, shee founded and endowed a faire Colledge for Students in Cambridge, which of her is called the Queenes; so we will leaue to those her Beneficiaries the farther search of this Argument, and deploration of her fortune, which seems such to vs, as if King Henry affected to leaue somewhat in this example, wherewith to oppose & amale the world. Vnlesse perhaps it were, that hauing proclaimed a general pardon for all offences without exception to such as in future should remaine loyall, and foregoing that some, who might be willing to lay hold of that benefite, might also bee cunningly practised with to fall away, vpon distrust of his word, when once hee had serued his present vices, hee therefore meant (by so cleare a demonstration, as the vtter vndoing, and perpetuall emprisonment of his wiues owne mother,) to giue them assurance, that hee, who vpon her person had bene so seuerer a punisher of breach-breath, would Queene Elizabeth deprived of her estate, and condemned to a Monastery.

King Henry provides for battell.

neuer violate it in his own, and thereby secure them in that point, and secure himselfe of them.

(17) Yet neither could this deuise take so good effect, but that John Earle of Lincoln (sonne of John de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth King Edward the fourths sister) secretly fled into Flanders to the Dutchesse of Burgundy, whither Francis Lord Lowell was likewise not long before escaped. Sir Thomas Broughton (another principal confederate) temporized in England, there to remaine, a stay to the businesse, aswell for mutuall intelligence, as receipt of an Army when it should arriue. This Earle of Lincoln, besides that he could not with any patience behold a Lancastrian weilding the English Scepter; was also of a sharper wit, and high reach, and therefore not without an ambitious sensibility, that in countenancing King Henry, hee wronged that expectancie, and relation to the Crowne, which hee had in right of his mother, sister to King Edward the fourth, and to King Richard the third, who had * designed him for heire apparent, & contracted his sister the * Lady Anne de la Pole, to James Prince of Scotland: was also the rather animated by letters receiued from his aunt the Dutchesse of Burgundy, earnestly calling vpon him for his preference. This Dutchesse was the second wife of Charles Duke of Burgundie, * slaine by the Swiss at the battell of Nancy, by whom thogh hee had no issue, yet by reason of her great dower, & wise behaviour among the Dutch, shee was strong in money and friends; all which shee was willing to conuert to the vtter subuersion howsoever of the Lancastrian line. Though therefore, shee well knew that this Lambert was but an Idoll, * hammered out of the hote braine of that Bouteferre Richard Simon, yet the embraceth the occasion, countenanceth the Imposture, and leaues nothing vnaid or vndone, which might giue life and successe to the enterprize. The Earle, the L. Lowell, and others theee furnished abundantly, and ioyneth vnto them a renowned Coronell Martin Smart, a Gentleman of * honorable birth, exemplary valour, and singular experience, and certain selected companies, to the number of about two thousand Almaines, which soone after arriue at Dublin. Lambert, who before was but proclaimed, is now in Christs Church there solemnly by them crowned King of England, * feasting and triumphing, rearing mighty howtes and cries, carrying him thence to the kings Castell vpon tall mens shoulders, that he might be seene and noted, as hee was surely (saith Stow) an honourable boy to look vpon; though nothing lesse was meant, than that hee should enioy that honour if they prevailed; as meaning then to erect Edward Earle of Warwick. Posterity might worthily doubt of the truth of these so desperate impudencies, and ridiculous Pageants, practised in the highest affaires of mankind, but that the thing is so vniuersally testified, and also that the highest affairs of the world (when once they are passed) are little better then such like Pageants.

(18) K. Henry (on the other side) though he had by most diligent epials endeouored to know the truth of Lamberts quality, to diuert the streame of affections, which hee saw inclined that way, for that the practise was carried with such wonderful art, as that very many (otherwise discreet and sober men) were induced to beleue that hee was indeed King Edwards sonne; and although the generall pardon proclaimed by King Henry, did vndoubtedly stay very many from open reuolt, but much more the carefull watch which was kept at the Ports, to hinder the escape of Malecontents or factious Fugitiues: yet hee manifestly saw, that it would in the end come to a field: for which cause he takes order for the leuie of an Armie, resoluing to giue his enemies battell with the first opportunity, it being the ancient and manfull fashion of the English, (who are naturally most impatient of lingering mischiefes) to put their publike quarrels to the trial of the sword. Lambert attended with John Earle of Lincoln, Francis Lord * Vicount Louell, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, or rather Maurice Fitz-Thomas (belike his sonne) and Coronell Smart, with an Army of desperate and pickt souldiers, aswell English, Dutch, as Irish (all fired with infinite hopes and promises to bee employed vpon the ouerthrow of King Henry) come on shore in Lancashire at a place called the pile of Fowday, where they ioine with their assured confederate Sir Thomas Broughton, and his sequele, and after some short refreshment in those partes, march with erected courages against King Henry, taking their way through Yorkshire (the hoped nursery of their furest friendshippes) and gloriously publishing their new King euery where, though without any increase of force by conourse, (for King Henries widome had marred their errand), their iourney was directed toward Newark vpon Trent.

(19) The King then at Countree, being by such scowtes as hee had appointed for that seruice, pretently aduertised of Lamberts arrival, and hauing his forces ready vnder the conduct of Jasper Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Oxford, because delay in this case was on all hands reputed mischievous, sets forward to Nottingham, and by a wood side called Bowry, encampeth his people; in whom there appeared a gallant forwardnesse to reuenge themselves by the sword of that indignity, which was offered to the English name by strangers and rebels, who durst hope to giue them a ruler. Thither repaired George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, George L. Strange his son, Sir John Cheine, and other noble and valiant Gentlemen with their numbers, which added no small sinewes to K. Henries muirers. Polyd. hath diligently set downe the names of such principall men in those parts as repaired thither, partly voluntary, partly sent for to the common defence of the King and Kingdom; but without due additions of each mans degree and place of precedency; yet their names doe well deserue to be remembered, both for the honour of their Families, and examples of loyalty. He recounteth sixty six Captaines which assembled from places thereabout, vnder whom there cannot probably be thought fewer Souldiers then eight or ten thousand, the English usually, till of late, hauing commonly an hundred and fifty in a Company. Their surnames (besides Edward Lord * Hastings) are in him as followeth; Langford, Montgomerie, Vernon of the Peke, Shurley, Folgerham, Grifley, Sutton, Stanley, and Stanley, Houghton, Meryng, Stanhop, Clifton, Stapleton, Willoughby, Perpointz, Babbington, Bedyll, * Marchel, Markham, Merbury, Brough, Tyrwit, Hufey, Shefield, Newport, Ormeston, Tempest, Knyvett, Willoughby, Dygby, and Dygby, Harrington, Sacheuerel, Vyllers, Eydling, Poulney, Vaux Gryne, Gryfin, Lucy, Belknap, Tregonmorton, Gray of Nuthin, Wolfson, Eynder, Phillips, Cheney, Cotton, S. John, Morand, Trevel, Rainford, Paynton, Daniel, Marney, Armidel. From the vttermost bounds of the North, there repaired also other chiefe persons and leaders (saith he) as * Ogle, * Newble, a Latimer, Bulmer, Langford, Norres, Newble of Torthenbrig and Williams. The Earle of Lincoln neuertheless comes forward with his Counter-king, nothing perhaps adding greater courage to that side, then the example of Henry himselfe, who with lesse numbers (but much more secret Art) prevailed in a pight field at Bosworth: his meaning was to get into Newark. The King wakefull vpon all aduantages, and perfectly instructed of his enemies courses (whom desperation did thrust forward to a daring hope) dislodged with his Army, & passed through Newark, leauing it behind him about 3. miles, to intercept the Lambertaines, and there sits downe againe. The Earle of Lincoln encamps with great brauerie and shew of courage in the face of the Kings forces.

(20) The next day both the Armies are brought forth to fight, neere to a little village called Stoke. The Earle of Lincoln marshalled his people by the aduise of

The Almaines were all of them hardie and approued men, and thoroughly well-appointed, and so in likelihood were such English as stood for that side; but the Irish, besides multitudes and fiercenesse, had small prouision, save (after the rude manner of their Nation) darts, spears, or the like. The maine of the Battell rested wholly vpon the English and Almaines. King Henry on the other side, (as hee that thirsted for an end of this bloody daies worke,) speedily disposed his whole numbers into three Battailions: the Voward whereof was best replenished with store of choice and pickt men, well armed and appointed, and fortified with wings. The Armie being thus ordered, Andrew saith that King Henry vlteth this speech:

(21) Most faithfull Lords, and you most valiant Companions in Armes, who haue (together with vs) endured so great perils by Land and Sea; lo, we are againe against our wils, drawne to trie our fortunes in another Field. For the Earle of Lincoln (a perjured man) without any occasion mistred by vs, defends an vnjust quarrell against vs: neither doth hee it diffembly, but most openly impudent, without any feare of God, nor so much onely to endamage vs, as to fulfill the humor of a giddie, and intemperate-tongued woman, who is not ignorant that her blood was extinguished by her brother Richard; but because that line did alwaies maintaine a most deadly feud against ours, theee (without any great regard to her Name, my dearest Consort) affiaies to destroy aswell vs as our posterity. Yee see therefore how often wee are provoked by them, but they shall not carrie it away vnuengued. God therefore and his holy Angels we first call to witnes, that we are prouident both night and day for your safetie, and for the Common quiet; though thus the ancient enemy repugneth. But God, a iust, strong, and patient Iudge, will also bring a remedy to this euill. In the meane time we exhort and admonish you, that the consideration of our iust inheritance be at this present more forcible with you, then their wickednes, neither doubt, but that the same God, who in the former warre made vs victorious, will enable vs to triumph now also ouer these enemies. Let vs therefore set vpon them courageously; for God is vpon our side to assist vs.

(22) The Earle of Oxford (on the behalfe of the whole Army) was prepared to make answere, but the King hastening to the prooffe, brake off all Ceremonies, and the signe of Battell giuen, they thunder forward with shewes of people, and found of martiall musicke, and like a blacke tempest, powre themselves vpon the Front of the Enemies Battels: who rushed forward with equal violence and furie, as men that at once encountered against feare and fortune. The fight continued doubtfull aboue three houres. A long space for men of courage to be employed in killing one the other, and sit to glut the hunger of furie. The Earles English wanted nothing but a good cause, and the Almaine gave not place to the Kings people in any point worthy of gallant Souldiers, but sold their liues dearly, and their Coronell Smart had scarce any before him in personal performance. Neither were the Irish behind for their parts, if their skinnas had bene sword-prooffe, for the contempt of death was alike in them as the rest. Briefly, the wonder of that daies worke was, that Christian men, in no sounder a quarrell, could dare to die so boldly, such chiefly, as the Earle of Lincoln and some others, who knew the secret of that desperate enterprize. But God, the Lord of reuengers, punishing their vnjust malice, with a suddaine whirlewinde rising in the heat of the Battell, (even as when Constantine fought against the Enemies of the Church) our souldiers, who seemed vanquished, became victorious. For the Kings vanguard * reanforced it selfe, and gaue so furious a recharge, (in likelihood vpon this encouragement sent as it were from Heauen) that it vtterly brake the Enemies Squadrons; and giuing in among them with full randon, flew * first such Captaines as relisted, and put the residue which yielded not, either to the sword flight. Herewith the whole Armie * shouted, the trumpets sound victorie, and the generall cry runnes King Henry, King Henry. When the battell and chafe were ended, so that there was time and leasure to view the field, it then appeared what mindes the slaine bodies carried; for all the chiefe Captaines, the Earle of Lincoln himselfe (though the King would gladly haue had him saved, to come thereby to a greater light of his dangers) the Lord Lowell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Coronell Smart and * Maurice Fitz-Thomas, General of the Irish, were (like Castille and his Complices) found to couer those places dead, which they defended liuing, among foure thousand other souldiers which were slaine vpon that side. The King at this battell lost * almost halfe the People in his Vangard, and Surgeons had store of worke among the Suruiuers, so that the Garland gained at this iourney was not vndipt in blood; Howbeit there is no mention that any man of honor or speciall note, fell vpon the Kings side.

(23) Among the Prisoners was the Countersfeit himselfe, and the lewd contriuer of this wicked Stratagem, Richard Simon, who with little change may most truly be called another Simon. The King (who referred himselfe in this battell, (as in others, but * neuer retired) made both their perious examples of his clemency. For Lambert being questioned, how such a breaching-boy as hee was durst attempt so great a wickednes, denied not, that hee was compelled therunto, by certaine bad persons, who were of that conspiracie; and as for his parents quality, hee confessed them to bee such as indeed they were; altogether of base and despicable calling. * Sim subtil, or Sir Richard Simon the Priest, whether for discouery of some great secrets, or the extraordinary reuerence borne to his function (extraordinary say we, for otherwise * Priests had bene openly put to death) was not executed, but * condemned to a dungeon, and perpetuall shackles. Lambert (whom the glittering periwig of regal style did but lately to adorne) was condemned to * the Kings kitchen, there to manage spits at the fire; who if his wit and spirit had answered his late Titles, would haue chosen much rather to haue bene turned from the Ladder by an hangman. But * hauing in this abiection giuen sufficient prooffe that hee was but a Puppet, or a property in the later tragical motion, * hee was at length (promoted wee cannot say) made one of the Kings Falconers, in which estate it seemes hee liued and died inglorious. This battell was fought vpon a * Satterday a day of the weeke which is * obserued to haue been fauourable and luckie to this Henrie. His first care after the victory setled, was that which most became a religious Prince, the humble and ioyous acknowledgement of thanks to God, in the very place. From thence hee passeth to * Lincoln, where hee spent three daies in publike supplications, processions, and thankgiuings, and sent his Standard to our Ladies Church at Walsingham in Norfolk, there to remaine as a Monument of his victorie and gratitude. Such as were taken in the Battell or chafe, are then executed. From Lincoln hee progreseth into Yorkshire, where hee tooke a sure course aswell by execution, as ranfome, for purging those parts from such as were culpable, or probably dangerous. At Newcastle about * the middle of August, hee dispatched his experienced and trusty Agent Richard Fox Bishop of Excester, and Sir Richard Edgcombe Knight into Scotland, there to settle a peace with King James the third, to empeach the retreat and protection, which his enemies and rebels found therein. Himselfe hauing spent a great part of Summer in this progresse, or rather itinerary luiting, returnes by Leicester toward London. Those prudent Ambassadors ladors in the meane time negotiating with the Scottish King, wrought * him to bee more inclinable to a perpetual peace, then it stood with his safetie to let his Subjects vnderstand, who fauoured him not. Seven yeeres truce is consented vnto, with a secret promise of King James to renew that terme, as it began to expire; with which assurance the Ambassadors returning, gladdened their wife Soueraignes heart; who thereby found that the Bishop of Exeter, was no lesse industrious in preferring his Regall state, then he had bene prudent in furthering him vnto it. The firebrands and readiest fuel of Rebellion thus seemed to be quenched, and the King beholds himselfe in the Grace and fauour of his people, nor lesse of foreigne Princes; Margaret Duchesse of Burgundy (his implacable * Inno) excepted; whom the newes of her Nephewes Earle of Lincolnes death, and the bloody blowing vp of all her late hopefull and costly contriements, did gall and wound extremely; but added fresh appetites of reuenge to her former immortal malice, which * neuer gaue ouer working, till shee had vented another no lesse prodigy then Lambert was. But the King being honoured and fought vnto, aswell by a Nuncio * from the Romane See, who obtained leaue to publish a Croisado here against the Turkes, as also from the French; after his many labours, aswell Marriall as Ciuill, sustained on behalfe of himselfe and the Common-weale, makes a triumphall * entrie into London, which was adorned in the best manner. And in the same moneth vpon * Saint Katharines day, his wife Elizabeth was Crowned Queene of England, as if that then first hee had held himselfe assured of Roiall estate: for he saw not what dangerous lifts would yer be given by that vnquiet Ladies practices, to heaue him out of authoritie.

(24) The next maine action which fitted the iudgement, and tride the finewes of King Henry, wasa forraigne case of more difficulty and Arr, then of intestine danger, as in which the high and paramount respects of Common-weale were intangled, or encountered with offices most neerely concerning the honour of a Princes minde, which neuer is more blemished then with the note of ingratitude. A dispute and combat betweene wisdom and blood, publicke and priuate, (if any quality, or action of a King may be said to be priuate) which seemed worthy of so excellent, cleare, and considerate a discourse, as that of Henries. You heard what notable fauours and humanities, when he liued a banisher Earle in the Continent, he had receiued, first of the Duke of Britaine, then of Charles K. of France; so that he stood equally (as it were) obliged to them both, & could acknowledge no lesse, Charles (more ambitiously then iustly) desired exceedingly to annex Britaine to the Crowne of France, taking occasion of the time, and other circumstances, which all seemed to conspire with his affections. The Duke old, and the father of one onely daughter suruiuing till marriage; Maximilian King of Romans, and riuall of King Charles in the same desires, (aswell for the Dutchy, as the daughter,) feeble in meanes; and King Henry well obnoxious to the French for benefites, as busied in his particular at home: and the Duke of Britaine, by succouring Lewis Duke of Orleans, and other French Lords, whom King Charles reputed his aduersaries, ministred to the French an occasion (or colour at least) of warring vpon Britaine, and so by the apt concurrence of circumstances, to annexe it by conquest, if by treaty hee could not. Henrie of England, now knowne to be victoriously feiled, seemed worth the Courtting. Ambassadors come from the French, who lay open the wrong offered by the Britaines, in succouring the enemies of France, put Henrie in minde of passed benefites; and pray his assistance, or at the least a neutrality; but altogether concealing the mystery of this warre, which was to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France. Howsoever, Henry, though he well enough knew, that a King must euer bee the best part of his Councell, (for what are others opinions, if himselfe want the happinesse, or iudgement, to choose the best?) propounds the points to his priuy Councell, whereupon hee Christianly offers himselfe a Mediator betweene the French and Britaine; an office, in which it was apparant he might best satisfie all obligations and duties both to God and them. The French pretend liking, but in the meane time follow their designe hard. Henry sends his Chaplen, Master Christopher Ypswicke a man * whom he very often imploied. The French maske on. Things come to some extremities. It becomes manifest that King Charles abused the King of Englands credulity; for the City of Nantz in Britaine was brought by sledge to point of yeelding, while messengers, and packets, outwardly oiled with the name of peace, slide to and fro, and the French doubt nothing so much, as left the English should stirre, before their victorie had made Britaine irrecoverable. The Lord Woodville (as without the Kings will, or priuaty) slips ouer into Britaine with three or foure hundred choise men to asside the Duke, and came time enough to bee slain with almost all his Souldiers, at the battell of Saint Albins, where the French wanne the day; notwithstanding that the Britains, the rather to appall their enemies, had apparelled * seauenteene hundred of their owne Souldiers in white Coates with redde Croffes, after the English manner, and made thereby a shew of two Regiments of English. The Britains had a great losse in that battell, wherein they were made fewer by fixe thousand. The Duke of Orleans and Prince of Orange, who then were British in faction, were taken Prisoners in the same fight. The French lost about twelue hundred, and their Generall an Italian. So that the state of Britaine seemed ripe for a fall.

(25) But King Henry, hauing long since suspected, and foreseene, what the vttermost marke of the French might be, and seeming to haue enough suffered the interest, which they might expect in him as a man, to be abused by their practices to the prejudice of his other friend, the Duke of Britaine, (who forgate not to sollicite and vrge that point,) had made the quality of this affaie knowne to the body of State in open Parliament, for that purpose assembled; as meaning by authority thereof to purge himselfe from all imputation, if, as a King, he did that which the reason of Government required, which would not assent, that Britaine should be made French, left by that accession their Neighbourhood might grow intolerable, Britaine hauing so many Sea-townes and Outlets to mischiefe the English trafficke. Himselfe was otherwise also sufficiently reioiced, that the general good ought to predominate the particular, and that his priuate obligations ought not to entangle, or prejudice the publicke seruice. The Parliament therefore, considering that which stood for the Common-weale, decrees aide of men and money, on behalfe of the Duke of Britaine; it being (besides all other respects) a perillous example, to suffer the great to deuoure the lesser Neighbour States, vpon pretences of iustice, or reuenge. Forces are leuied; but (for respect of King Charles, and in hope that the shew of preparations would stoope him to equal conditions,) not yet so roundlie, as the Britons necessities expected. Meane while that no formality or Princely Ceremony should be vnaccomplished, King Henry by his Ambassadors certifies King Charles of his Parliaments decree; praises him to desist from farther Hostilities; otherwise that he must asside the Duke; but yet (for the French Kings sake) with this reservation, of pursuing his subiects no where but in Britaine. Charles made small account of these ouertures, because hee truly perriued himselfe that the English aides would not arrive in season; which fell out accordingly; for before that time, the French had gotten that victorie, (whereof euen now wee speake) at the Battell of Saint Albins. Vpon newes whereof, the English Regiments were immediately sent ouer vnder Robert Lord Broke General, Sir John Cheyny, Sir John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leigh, Sir Richard Lecon, and Sir Edmund Cornwall Knight, and Coronels. The whole Army contained eight thousand men. These march toward the enemy; who, acquainted with the temper of the English, whilst they are fresh, as * being then almost insinuable, containe themselves within their Campe; but yet * molest the English with continuall skirmishes on horsebacke in several places at once; finally to the profit of the French, who * were alwaies put to the worke, the Archers received them with such perpetual stormes. In the meane space, Francis Duke of Britaine dies, leauing in effect, one onely daughter, the Lady Anne, (for the other, * being the younger) deceased not long after. This altered the whole state of the case. The British Nobility (vnder their young Mistresse) immediately fall at variance among themselves, and the English thereby were on euery hand in danger: so that God (as it appeared by the sequelle) had destined Britaine to be annexed to the Crowne of France; for the English (after five moneths stay) were in widome compelled to returne; the rather, for that Winter now was come vpon them, and Britaine, destitute of competent defence, (her Rulers disagreeing among themselves) was finally by the marriage of King Charles with the Lady Anne, made a parcell of the French Monarchy, as hereafter will appeare.

(26) King Henry the while was againe in danger to haue had present vfe of Souldiers at home. Wee shewed, what care was heretofore taken by him to weede the North, and free it from lurking enemies. That notwithstanding, when the Earle of Northumberland, (Lieutenant of the North) signified at an assemblie (according as the truth was) that the King (though the Northern people had sought it) would not remitte one penny of such Subsidy, as was granted in Parliament for supportation of the warres in Britaine * left the Aids of State should beauered at the rude peoples pleasures; but that on the contrary Commission and warrant was sent downe for him to see the same leuied by distress, or otherwise: the desperate multitude, falsely supposing that the Earle was the occasion of such an answer, did suddenly set vpon him at the incitement of one John a Chamber, and furiously murdered him, with certaine of his seruants in a place called Cocklegge by Thrusk, eightene miles from Torke. They to carry their wicked attempt through, make head vnder Sir John Egremond, a discontented Knight of those parts, openly declaring where they came, that their meaning was to fight with the King in defence of their liberties, as if the causeless killing of a most noble Lord had bene one of them. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey sent from Court with some forces to repress their increase, skirmished with a route of these Rebels, beats them away, and takes John a Chamber prisoner. The whole swarme flockes to Torke, where they roosted about three or foure daies, when hearing of the Kings approach (who was euer one of the first in the necke of such occasions) they scattered themselves, but the ring-leaders were hanged and quartered, and John a Chamber, with some others, were executed at Torke after an extraordinary manner. Sir John Egremond elcaped, fled to the common Center of all King Henries dangers and enemies, Margaret Duchesse of Burgundy, to that though the colour of rising was about money, yet Egremond at least had reference, it seemed, to the general perturbation of the Kingdom, vpon the old ground of quarrell (hatred of the Lancasterian Familie) and this to bee but a sparke or flash of that great and troublesome fire, which afterward brake forth and blased so prodigiously. The Earle of Surrey is left by the King (hauing * severely punished the mutherers) Lieutenant of the North, and Sir Robert Tunsall Knight, as chiefe Commissioner for leuying the tax or subsidie.

(27) The unworthy death of the Earle of Northumberland was followed by a more unworthy of James the third King of Scotland, so as King Henry lost at home a most honorable Ray of his Northern affaires, and a sure Ally abroad. This unfortunate Prince, hauing * by some irregularity of life, and partialities, and errors of government (amplified perhaps by the constructions and reports of his malignant Subiects) incurred extreme hatred with many of the Nobility and people, laboured with * King Henry, as also with the Pope, and King of France, to make an accord betweene him and his Mutinados, for that they had compelled Prince James, his sonne, to be the titular and vnnatural Head of those armes, which traitorously (as pretending to haue a right on behalfe of the Common-weale to depose an euill King) they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by earnest Ambassadors, but could obtaine no other then this outrageous answer: That there was no talking of peace vntill he would resigne his Crowne. King Henry and King Charles vehemently protested against these their whole proceedings, declaring by their Ambassador, that they thought the same to be as a common injury done vnto themselves; for the example to be very wicked and pernicious, and not sufferable by Princes; that Subiects should be permitted to put hands vnto their Soueraigne. Hereupon it came to a Battell at Banockburn by Stripelin, whereat K. James (rashly fighting before his whole numbers were come) was (notwithstanding the contrarie commandement of the Prince his sonne) slaine in the Mill of that Field, whither he fled after the battell ended. By reason of this infortunate precipitation of the Scottish King, Hadrian de Castello an Italian Legate, whom Pope Innocentius the eight had sent to take vp the cruell quarrell, came too late, (for he arrived not in England till the battell at Banockburn was passed,) but not too late to receiue honour at the hands of King Henry, who respecting his wilddome and excellent learning, (vpon the special commendations first * of John Morton Archbishop of Canturburie, but afterward vpon his owne experience of the man in sundry employments to the Roman Sea,) bestowed vpon him the Bishopricke of Hereford, and (after renegation thereof) the Bishopricke of Bath and Wells; who was also at the length created Cardinal by Pope Alexander the sixth. * But who is hee among many thousands (saith Polyd.) that wish not to admire these outward honours which may like be given to the unworthy as well as to the well-deserving, and may like be taken away from either? But the praise of this Hadrian is of another farre more noble kinde and eternal: for he was the man who first reuined the glory of the ancient Latine eloquence, and of all other sorts of abuse and exquisite learnings, as in which himselfe excelled. Thus doth Polydore (himselfe an Italian,) celebrate the learning of his Country-man, of whose other qualities, yet others write more harshly; as that out of meere ambition to be Pope (without any other grudge) hee conspired, with Alphonso Petruccio, and other sacred Cardinals, to murder Pope Leo the tenth: induced thereto by suggestion of a Witch, who foretold him that one Hadrian, an old man, of meane parentage, of great Learning and wisdom, should succeed in the Papacy. The man thought it must needs be himselfe, as being, though of very base Parentage, yet of some noble qualities: but another * Hadrian, the sonne of a Dutch Brewer, and instructor of Charles the fifth the Emperour, procured to be the man; and this our Hadrian lost by deprivation all his promotions whatsoever, for his nefarious attempt. Into such extreme folly is learning and wisdom metamorphosed; where it is tainted with Ambition, or wants a Religious discretion to manage it aright.

(28) And albeit the King himselfe could verie gladly haue spent his time in the studies of peace, as those those which were farre more apt for the service of God, and for attaining of knowledge, then in martiall tumults; yet the quality of his supereminent place enuied vnto him that felicitie; for he was necessarily drawne into a warre with France vpon lesse occasions. Anne the young Dutcheffe of Britaine, (by their aduise, who affected to preferre the liberty of that Dukedome, which by vnion with France, would be absorpt & extinguished,) had for farre entangled and engaged her selfe with the Procurators of Maximilian King of Romane, that shee was not only publickly contracted, but contented for vitermost performance of those rites whereof marriage by proxy was honorably capable) to take vpon her the Bride, and being solemnly bedded, to permit Maximilian Deputie, in the presence of sundry Noble witnesses all men as women, to put in his legge, stript naked to the knee, betweene the spousall sheetes, that ceremony seeming to amount to a Consummation. Charles King of France, notwithstanding these solemnities, and his owne particular engagement with the Lady Margaret daughter of Maximilian, (whom for the purpose of marriage he had already entertained into France,) did so ambitiously and vehemently couet to gaine Britaine, that vpon confidence of his force, hee resolved to breake through all respects, and not only to offend all his forreine friends, but to make them his iust enemies, rather then to faile in effectuation. Instruments are therefore very secretly set on worke, and batterie is placed with bags of gold at all the opportunities which might let in his purpose. Ambassadors also (the Lord Frances of Lutzenburg, Charles Marillac, and Robert Gaguine) Generall of the Order of the holy Trinitie, are dispatched to Henrie, praying that with his good will he might dispose of the body of the Lady Anne in marriage according to the right which he had thereunto, as the chiefe Lord of whom shee held the Dukedome. Henrie denied the request, but yielded notwithstanding to send Ambassadors into France there to Capitulate about a peace. The French carried this affairsto notable Art, for to diuert the world for looking into the depth of their drift, King Charles still detained the young Lady Margaret, Maximilians daughter; so as at most it could be but suspected, that Charles meant to match her with some of his blood, and all the entercourse of Orators and Ambassadors vsed in the meane time, tended but to hold the English busied vpon other objects, till they had wrought their feate in the Court of Britaine. For Maximilian, (to let the world see what injuries shall be offered euen to Kings, that are not strong) him they altogether neglected; King Henrie they plaied with, and Ferdinando King of Castile (who was ready to ioin with Maximilian and Henrie against the French) they resolve to appeale, with rendering vp vnto him the Counties of Ruscinoon, and Perpinian; as accordingly they did, without reembursement of one penny of those 300000. Crownes, for which Iohn King of Arragon (father to Ferdinando) had morgaged them. The young Ladies doubts, rising either out of religion, or point of honor, his cunning Agents, and Emisaries wipe away with these solutions. That Maximilians daughter was not of yeeres to consent, and therefore the contract between King Charles and her did not binde either in law, or conscience: That her owne contract with Maximilian was void, for that it was done without the consent of her Soueraigne Lord, King Charles, whose ward or Client shee was. The Lady vanquished in her iudgement with these reasons, attracted with the present greatnes of King Charles, and loath by refusal to make her Countrey the seat of a long and miserable warre, secretly yielded to accept of another husband. Thomas Goldstone Abbot of S. Augustines in Canterbury, and Thomas Earle of Ormond in Ireland, King Henries Ambassadors into France, hauing beene dandled by the French during these illusive practises, returned without other fruite of their labors.

(29) What could now the most patient doe lesse then take sword in hand vpon so palpable and vnworthy illusion? But Maximilians wrongs were too impudent and intollerable; for Charles sent home the Lady Margaret, and married the Inheretrix of Britaine, annexing it to his owne Realme: whereas King Henrie found himselfe rather mockt, then otherwise empaired. James Contibald hereupon comes Ambassador from Maximilian, and obtained his request, which was, that they with might forces should by a certaine day prefixed, invade the French, in full reuenge of their bold provocations; Maximilian for his part, promising to support that warre with at least ten thousand men for two yeeres. King Henrie hauing formerly in abundant manner prouided himselfe of treasure, was ready before the day with a roiall army: but Maximilian (whose will to worke the vitermost mischief to France was not doubted,) being sent vnto by King Henrie, signifying his forwardnes, was found vterly vnfinshed. Causes of Maximilians weakenesse in state, were the rebellions and dislikes of his Flemish Subiects cherished by the French, the ialousie of Princes neighbourhood making them vniufully glad either of others molestations. For subduing whereof though King Henrie had heretofore giuen him good and successfull assistance vnder the conduct of Giles Lord Dawseney Governour of Gallis, the Lord Morley and others, whereby he the rather ouercame, yet was hee the feeble, as then, by reason of so fresh exhausters. King Henrie with good cause was not a little troubled at these newnes, secretly signified by his trustie Almer M^r. Christopher Pyrwick, and Sir Richard Kifley knight, his Ambassadors to Maximilian; For hee was very loath to vndergoe so great an Action vpon his particular strengths, though he doubted not to finde a potent party among the Britaines, (whose affections were as yet but loosely setled toward King Charles,) and yet farre more loath to deuide the expectation of his owne people, who had so largely contributed; Chiefly the City of London, out of which, euen in those daies hee received for his furniture in that voyage almost ten thousand pounds from the Commoners, and (as it seemes by our Author) two hundred pounds besides from euery Alderman, where the same King could not, but with some difficulty, leuie in the third yere of his Reigne a loan of foure thousand pounds, whereof three of the best Companies are noted (as for hauing done and deferred extraordinarily) to haue lent about nine hundred. And verily this wife King (knowing how great a strength that rich City was vnto him) humored that people with all sortes of popularities, for himselfe did not onely come among them, and cause himselfe to be centred a brother, in one of their Companies, but ware the habit of a publicke feast, and fate as Maister, as is verie credibly reported out of the Records of their Hall. His wisdom therefore saw, that in giuing ouer the inuasion of France; he should foolishly abandon a goodly occasion of making himselfe vniuersally acceptable to his people. His resolutions therefore are by him at leastwise pretended to continue, and for that cause he sufficiently encreased his numbers, that he might seeme able to goe through with that enterprize alone; and though the time of yeere were too farre spent (for he landed not at Calais till the sixth day of October) yet marcheth he with his whole forces toward Bologne, being well assured that with this trowell he should at once plaister two wals, that is, humor his English subiects, and for a peace draw to himselfe store of Crownes from the French.

(30) He had with him besides the flower of his Nobility, and Capitaines, answerable numbers of People fit for the seruice. The most named persons were these, Jasper Duke of Bedford Lieutenant General of the Army, Thomas Marquess Dorset, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, Suffolk, Shrewsbury, Derby, Kent, Denonshire, and Ormond, sundry Barons, as Dawseney ney, Abernethy, Delawar, South, Hastings, Cobham, &c. But this is needlesse to weary our felues with long relations of a short voyage; for King Henrie before hee set forth out of England, was secretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes Governour of Henault, according to instructions on the French Kings behalfe, to accept of conditions, which till Bologne was besieged (as now by him it was) was not knowne. The ignorance of this mystery made many forward Gentlemen to mortgage their lands, and runne into much debt for their fuller and brauer furniture, in hope to get great matters in this warre, whereof to their griefe they found themselves deceived. In the mean time the L^d. Cordes hauing met at Calais with Richard Fox Lord Bishoppe of Excester, and *Giles Lord Dawseney, the Kings Commissioners; after iust and long debate, concluded vpon Articles of peace betweene the two Kings.

(31) Bologne was brought to some distresse, when by interuention of this agreement it remained safe and quiet. King Charles was chiefly moued to buy his peace at a deare rate, both for that the state of Britaine was as yet vnsettled, and for that hee meant forthwith to march into Italy for the conquest of the Kingdome of Naples; and K. Henrie on the other side was not vnwilling, because Maximilian had failed, and Britaine seemed clearly past possibility of euiction. To which may be added, a natural, noble, and religious inclination in King Henrie, to liue in amity with his neighbours; the inclining of new dangers, then in brewing against him by the turbulent, and vnappaeable Dutcheffe of Burgundy, and *cherished by King Charles; and lastly, the enrichment of himselfe by reembling the charges both of this, and the Britishe warre out of the French elsewhere, whereby he should farre the better be able to withstand all forraign practises, or meddlesome outrages. As for the preferuing of himselfe, and his honour with his Subiects, hee wanted not both true and honourable glosses: Such as were the care to auoid vnecessary effusion of Christian blood: the vses of his presence at home, besides many other: but his wisdom in the carriage of this right weighty action was chiefly eminent in this, That hee would not enter into Treaty, till hee was in the field; and that with such a puissance, as was likely enough to force his owne conditions; nor suffer the least signe of his secret willingness to peace, or inward doubt of troubles at home, to creepe out at any cranny or chinke of his discourse or carriage, whereby hee as farre outwent the French fairly, as they formerly seemed to haue ouerwrought him fubly. Had they truly bene informed in those points, it is probable they might haue gone a cheaper way to worke: for, besides what other Articles locuer, it was concluded, That Henrie should not quit his claim to France; but that for a Peace, which by the contract was only to continue during the two Kings liues, Charles of France should pay in present to Henrie for his charges in that warre, seven hundred, forty and five thousand *. Duckets, and twenty five thousand Crownes yearly toward the expenses, which hee had heretofore beene at in aiding the Britons. Which (by the English called Tribute) was duly paid during all this Kings raigne, and also to Henrie his son, till the whole debt was run out, thereby to preferue amity with England. There were moreover (by Henries consent, who was thus content to gratifie his Peeres at anothers cost) not onely present rewards, but also certaine annuall pensions allotted to the chiefe Lords of his priuie Councell. A course of bounty which might otherwise haue proued prejudiciall to the seruice of the King of England, by engaging his Counsellors affections to the French: The siege of Boleine lasted till the eighth day of November, & Henrie (whom his Queens most tender, frequent and louing liues, did the rather inuite to speediest returne,) hauing setled all his transmarine affaires, *arrived at Douer, from whence hee iour-nied to Westminster, there to celebrate the Feast of Christmas. This voyage into France, affording no greater exploits then wee haue heard, was celebrated by blind *Bernard with hyperbolicall and well-borne verses not ordinary, in which directing his speech in honour of Henrie, to the Henries he concludes.

(32) The famous counterfeiance of Perkin Warbeck, with which the braine of the Lady Margaret Dutcheffe Dowager of Burgundie had long travelled, doth now beginne to disclose it selfe, and make new businesse for King Henrie. The inglorious glorie of the first inuention in his raigne of this kind of vexation, Lambert Simmels perion had giuen to his Master the wily Simon, so that our Dutcheffe was but an imitatrix, and yet perhaps shee gaue not place in any point to the first example, or Archetype, neuertheless the fortune of the first deuise, being no more successfull then it was, might reasonably haue deterred her from the edition of a second: but whether it were an immortal enuie toward the Lancastrian race, or a burning zeale of aduancing one that might at leastwise beare the name of a Plantagenet, though by any finisier practises, as if it had bene lawfull to attaine her ends (admit them iust) by any iniurious courtes, shee resolves to erect another Idoll, as perceiving by the first, how notable an engine impolture was, to trouble Henrie; being well assured, that England was full of corrupt humors, and ill-affections to worke vpon, not so much through the desert of her present King, as for that the dregges which naturally reside in the bottom of mens hearts, where most bloody and barbarous factions haue for a long time weltered, and worried one the other with various euent, were not cleansed and auoided. The Diuell therefore ready to furnish all attempts which may raise trouble, and mischief, easily fitted her. There was come therefore to her hands a youth adorned with such a shape, as might easily perswade the beholders was worthy of a noble fortune; he had thereunto a natural fine wit, and (by reason of his abode in England in K. Edwards dayes) could speake our language, as also some other, which hee had by a kind of wandring trauell obtained. This youth was borne (they say) in the City of Torney, and called *Peter Warbecke, the son of a conuerted Iew, whose Godfather at Baptisme King Edward himselfe was. The English in *contempt (and for a note perhaps of his forraigne birth) did afterward call him by a diminutive of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. Him the Dutcheffe (as a fine peece of timber, out of which to carue a new Idoll) moulds by degrees, & makes him take shape according to that Idoll, which shee had prefigured in her working imagination; before the which the late honours of her house conspicuous in three Princes (which altogether made not twenty and five yeeres of raigne) did so perpetually houer, as her soule could neuer take contentment, but in the hope that the house of Torke should againe be the dwelling place of Mainely.

(33) Her offence against Henrie wanted not many seeming reasons, but none so great, as that hee had slaine her own brother King Richard, who albeit he was there reputed murderer of her Nephewes, yet were they a degree more removed from her, and so lesse deere in likelihood to a brother; and howsoever shee might secretly detest, or belieue the commitment of that parricide, yet could she neuer brooke (seeing they were gone) that the reward of her brothers death, and that euen to him who slew him, should bee the Crowne of England, whereby not onely only her brother, but the whole male-line of her family was for euer to bee excluded; much lesse could shee (a Plantagenet) abide that Henry, who brought to the Crowne the surname of a newly raised Familie. These and other considerations in the breast of a Lady, bred vp in a dominating Familie, her selfe a Dowager, in such a fortune, as in which shee was Paramount for the time, and absolute without controule, being carelesse withall of fauing for posterity, because shee was without a child, and in that regard the more abundantly stored with treasure; all which made her spirits ouer-boile with impatience and verulency; so farre forth, that hauing infused al her principles into Peter her creature vnder the Title of Richard Plantagenet, second son of King Edward the fourth; the most couerly sends him into Portugall, from thence to take his leucon flight, as * elsewhere is related. Neuertheless, there will not (perhaps) want some, who in defence of the Dutcheffe, had rather referre it to Magnanimity, and Noblenesse of Spirit, in seeking the honour of her house; which, if it might passe for such among the heathen, yet can it not among Christians; much the lesse, for that her duty to England, & the royall flourishing estate of her own Necce, the right heire, exacted at her hands a greater tendernes.

(34) That Peter Warbecke should bee inflamed by her fauours, and encouragements, to dare in earnest the personation of a Kings sonne, seemes not a thing to be admired; for there is in humane nature (which ties not her self to Pedigrees, nor Parentages) a kind of light matter, which will easily kinde, being toucht with the blazing hopes of ambitious propositions. He therefore vpon the first disclosure of * himselfe, did put on so excellent a seeming as might iustly moue King Henry to bee ieaalous, whereunto the pernicious practise might come at last; for there wanted nothing in the whole forme of the young vpsart, but only the confidence of a truth, and truth it selfe: which makes me call to mind * what one hath written of a goodly white Saphyr in Venice, made by art so neerely to resemble a true Diamond, that with much difficulty, and but by one onely lapidary, it was discovered; which if it had beene graced with some great Princes, wearing, what would want to haue made it passable for a very Diamond of great esteeme? Perkin came such from out of the Burgundian forge; and (if his parentage bee respected) assumed the image and resemblance of a king, being otherwise not so much as a meane Gentleman. Neither can it be maruelled at, if such a Phantasmie as this, did abuse, and trouble the common people of that time; for euen to such as do write thereof, it begets a kind of doubt (which without some little collection of their spirits doth not easily vanish,) it seeming almost incredible, that such a bloody play should meere be disguised and fained; the discouery therefore was worthy such a wit as King Henries, and the pulch it gaue to his foueraignty did throughly try his sitting, being of force enough to haue cast an ordinarie rider out of saddle.

* Holinsh. Id. d. a. M. S.

(35) Therefore, it was the Dutcheffes misfortune, that her intentions (if they were hers) had to encounter to politicke and constant man as King Henry; whose prudence searcht into the abstrusest secrets, and whose diligence ouercame all difficulties. Yet the Lady Margarets course to vent her Creature at the first was exquisite, for she (as in a Magicke practise) hauing kept him secret till shee saw her time, caught him to bee closely conuayed into * Portugall; from whence (attended with fitt associates and Priuadoes) hee sailed into Ireland (the Foster-place and nursery of immortal good will to the house of Torke) where (notwithstanding their late calamities,) he so strongly enchanted that rude people with the charmes of false hopes, and mists of seemings, as he was sure of partakers in great plenty. Charles the eight, King of France, hearing (and perhaps beleeuing) that the Duke of Torke was alive, and glad to haue so probable an occasion of doing mischief to Henry of England, in regard of these flagrant enmities which as then remained vnquenched betweene them, inuited Duke Richard most officiously to Paris, and besides all other honours, assigned him (at his coming) a guard for his person, whereof the Lord Congreshall was Capitaine. Afterward there repaired to this new Duke, Sir George Nevill Knight, (* a bastard of the noble house of the Nevills;) Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Robinson, and about an hundred English, to whom (as a principal) wee may adde * Stephen Frien, French Secretary to King Henry himselfe; all which, together with the whole Stratagem, was smooke out of France with the first graine of incense sacrificed vpon the Altars of Peace at Bologna, after the same was once made and ratified (as you haue heard) between the French and vs. The Dutcheffe then seeing her artificiall creature thus turned againe vpon her hands, pretends an extreme ignorance that euer shee had seene him before that present, and an excuse for his miraculous escape, and preservation, which seemed such to her (as shee pretended) as if hee had beene reuiued from death to life, and that the fable might want no quickning, which her personal countenance, or her Court could afford, shee openly salutes him by the delicate Title of the * White Rose of England, and questions him of the manner of his escape, with such like, to beget a firme beliefe in the hearers, that the neuer had seene him before that time, and that he was indeed her Nephew Richard Duke of Yorke. The Nobility of Flanders accordingly, doe vnto him all honour, and three enuiours his person with a guard of thirty men in murrey and blew. Neither was hee in any point wanting to his part; but fitted such likely answers to all questions, and such princely behaviours to all occasions, as made fame bold to publish him with the fullest blast of her Trumpet, for no other then a true Richard Plantagenet; and as it is so obserued of some, that by long vsing to report an vntruth, at last forgetting themselves to bee the Authors thereof, beleue in earnest; so these honors making our Peter to bury in viter obliuion his birthes obscurity, he seemed to bee perswaded; that hee was indeed the selfe partie, whom hee did so exactly personate. Nought, and impudency were scarce euer knowne to haue found more applause, or beliefe, euen among many verie wise, and (otherwise) worthy men; who moued in confidence, and not onely vpon discontent, inclined to partake with this new Plantagenet, as the onely right heire of the English Diadem, as if, whether he had beene the true one, it was past dispute. This intoxication, & abuse of the world, was wonderfully encreased by the secret reuolt of Sir Robert Clifford Knight, whom (as one that had seene, and knowne the true Richard) the cunning conspirators in England had sent ouer, to informe himselfe, and them, whether hee was indeed as hee seemed. Sir Robert (whose presence and errand were to the Dutcheffe most welcome,) being brought to his sight, did forthwith giue credite, and constantly signifie, that this was indeed Richard Plantagenet, the true Duke of Torke, and that hee well knew him for such. Money and encouragements, were hereupon sent out of England, from such as fauoured him; among whom was * Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain to King Henry (by whose punctual reuolt from K. Richard he had principally atchieued the Crowne of England;) * Iohn Ratcliffe, * L. Fitzwalter, * Sir Simon Montfort, * Sir Thomas Thwaites Knights, and others; but the maine countenance of the cause in forraigne parts was Sir Robert Clifford (a knight of an honourable fame and family) which moued the secret friends of the new Duke to set the rumor so cunningly on foot among the English, that * sooner might a cloud, which causeth thunder, be caught or knowne, then the Author thereof; and multitudes being weakened therewith, store of humor, dangerously prepared to mutation, did euer where discouer it selfe. (16) For prevention therefore of all those effects, which might issue out of these causes, (being in their proper nature most generative of sedition, and of all sorts of ciuill furies) King Henrie diligently caught the coasts of England to be well and strongly watcht, as well to empeach the landing of enemies, as the escape of fugitives: but about all, he writes letters to his best friends in forraigne parts, & also employs nimble wits with feuerall instructions, (some to assaile the constancy of Sir Robert Clifford, (the maine stay and credite of Perkins cause) with promise of immunitie and fauour if hee would returne into England in quiet; others, to find out the truth of Perkins quality, being furnished with treasure to draw and require intelligences; and all of them (as occasion should serue) to pretend themselves vehement fauourers of the new Duke. These necessary hypocrites and double faced Ambidexters, called Spies, (whose seruices, howsoeuer conduciue to such as lesse then on worke, yet their perfidious quality commonly partakes with that of Indus;) doe pierce their charge so roundly that * Sir Robert Clifford is secretly drawne off, the new Duke is discouered aswell by them, as by * sundry letters from friends abroad, to bee but Perkin Warbecke, and many other mysteries are reuealed. This gaue to the wise King great satisfaction, who to weaken the enemies practise the more, not onely diuulgeth the fraud, but sends ouer sea, Sir William Poinings Knight, and Sir William Warham his Ambassadors to the Arch-Duke Philip, Duke of Burgundy (then gouerned by others by reason of his tender age) who promised not to assist the said Perkin, but if the Dutcheffe Dowager would doe any such thing to the prejudice of King Henry, it was not in him to hinder her; for that the might dispose of her owne. A maine argument vsed by these Ambassadors before the Archdukes Council to conuince, that Richard the very Duke of Torke was murdered as well as King Edward his brother German, as Polydor (who seemed to haue had good means to vnderstand these things) rehearseth it, was, That their uncle Richard should in vaine haue made away the elder brother, if the younger had bene suffered to suruiue, for that the right of the elder, was immediately upon his death in the younger, and that consequently during his life, King Richard could haue no more assurance, then if the elder were still alive: which Argument notwithstanding doth at most prove nothing but this: That their uncle the Yurper might intend, that both his Nephewes should be murdered, and that hee knew nothing perhaps to the contrary. Whereas facts are to bee proved by confessions of parties, by witnesses, or vehement presumptions, (though vehement presumptions are said to constitute but an half proof) all which are * otherwhere so supplied, as leaues final cause to doubt of both their deaths. But Warham (a learned Priest and Doctor in the lawes) the mouth of that Ambassage sent to the Arch-Duke, in the end of his oration vsed this bitter scoffe, and Sarcasme against the Lady Margaret: That shee in her old age brought forth two Monsters within the space of a few yeeres, and both of them not in the eight, or ninth month after their conception, as naturall mothers, but in the one * hundred and eightieth month; and whereas other women brought forth infants utterly unable to helpe themselves, these birthes of hers were tall striplings, and as soone as they were borne, offered battell vnto mighty Kings. And albeit the Arch-Dukes answer seemed reasonable, yet was not King Henry so satisfied, but that within a while after, for * that the Arch-Duke had secretly furnished Perkin with leaders, hee tooke occasion to banish all Flemings, and Flemish wares out of his Dominions, and inhibited his Subjects to trade in any Countries within the obedience of Maximilian King of Romans, or of the Archduke Philip his sonne, who by way of talio and requital did the like against the English. (17) Let vs come now from the addressees of things, to their doing. The high prudence and industry of Henry hauing thus discovered the foundations of Perkins hopes in England, and the humors which were most vnsoend, made it his first worke to raze those groundworks, and purge the veins of his Realme from that corruption by needfull Phlebotomie. The * Lord Fitzwalter, a principall conspirator, being condemned, and sent to Calis, liued there in hope of pardon; but for practising with his Keepers to escape, hee finally payed his head for satisfaction. Sir Simon Montfort, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney (Gentlemen of noble houses) as Captaines and Authors of the conspiracy were beheaded, but all the reit awei Clerkes as Lay-men had their pardons. Not long after these executions and pardons, the King vpon sure intelligence, that Sir Robert Clifford (in whose bosome the secret of all Perkins plot lay) was arriued, entered the Tower of London, and there continued; that so, if Clifford should accuse any of the great, (and whom hee then would accuse, it is probable King Henry knew) they might without suspition, or tumult bee attached; the Court, and publicke prison for crimes of highest nature, being then within the cincture of one, and the same wall. Sir Robert Clifford at his coming into the Kings presence, (though hee was secretly before assured of his life) most humbly praying and obtaining pardon, approached (among many others) Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine. The King would not at first giue credite (or at leastwise pretended, not to giue credite) to the accusation of a Peere so great, and so neere vnto him: but vpon farther search, finding the same confirmed with circumstances, and particularly, for that he said to Clifford, * Hee would neuer beare Armes against the young man, if he knew him for certaine to be the sonne of King Edward, hee resolued to vie severity against the delinquent. (18) But Bernard Andreas directly faith, That (besides bare words and purposes) Sir William had supported Perkins cause with treasure, wherein hee is recorded so to haue abounded, as that in his Castle of * Holt he had in coine and plate to the value of forty thousand Markes, besides lands of inheritance in sundry places about, to the yeerely value of three thousand pounds (a pretty stocke in treasure at those times, to vphold the first brunt of a warre, and a large extent of land to furnish the wing of a powerfull battell with able souldiers out of Tenancies) with all which the same Author in plaine wordes saith, That hee promised to defend the said Pretender, and bring him into the Kingdome. And if we haue any insight into King Henries disposition, it seems to vs, that before hee entered into the Tower, hee not onely knew the Lord Chamberlaine vnsoend, but also that for his quiet apprehension hee chiefly repaired thither. Stanley being hereupon attached and referred to farther examination, is said * To haue denied nothing of all that whereupon hee was charged, which hee perhaps the more confidently did, in hope that King Henry would pardon him in respect of passed seruices, they (in their effects considered) being the greatest whereof mortality is capable, preservation of life, and gaining of a Kingdome. But the poore gentleman found himselfe farre deceiued in his politicke Lord and Master, who (to teach mankind thereby, how dangerous it is to make a King) was not vnwilling to cut him off, as perswading himselfe, that those seruices proceeded of ambition, not of affection, or if of affection, the cause now ceasing, the contrary effects might proue as pernicious, as the other had beene aduantageous and auailable. The King was vnwilling to displease his Father in Law, Thomas Earle of Derby (brother german to Sir William Stanley) and did therefore for a while suspend his judgement; but rigour finally preuailed, and hee was at Westminster openly arraigned, conuicted, and after ward at the block on Tower-hill beheaded. In whose office Giles Lord Dapweney a most faithfull and moderate man succeeded. This sharpe iustice exercised vpon so eminent a person, was of great vse in the stay of peoples minds through the Realme of England. But in Ireland they were not so letted, or reduced, but that for the better and fuller purging thereof, Henry Deny (a Monke of Langton Abbey) was sent Lord Chancellour thither, with orders and directions, and Sir Edward Poinings Knight, with souldiers; whose greatest diligence and cares were not wanting, to punish such as heretofore had aided Perkin, or might hereafter. The Earle of Kildare Lord Deputy, falling into suspicion with Poinings, was by him apprehended, and sent prisoner into England; where the King did not onely graciously heare and admit his defences, but also returned him with honour, and continuation of authority. In the meane time (the error, or weaknesse of the Burgundian Dutchesse and her Perkin, suffering their enemy in this sort, to puruey for his own security, and their depulsion) he yet for farther assurance of himselfe makes a progresse into Lancashire, there to recreate with his Father in law the Earle, and the Countesse his mother, where among all other his secret purposes, he thoroughly satisfied the Earle, both for the iustice and necessity of Sir William Stanleyes death.

The Kings praier and speech to God.

(39) These certainly, were perillous times to live in, and vndoubtedly full of infinite ialousies, and hypocrisies, nor vnlike to those lately passed, wherein there was nothing so plaine, and openly proud, but that yet for the common custome of close and covert dealing, men had it euer inwardly suspect, as many well-counterfeited iewels make the true suspected: these generall distrusts being among the strange gradations, by which the incomprehensible providence doth vse to chastise insolent Nations and to make regular Princes, meere and absolute. But the Dutchesse and her Perkin knowing all things as they passed in England, reloued notwithstanding to proceede; and therefore taking advantage of the Kings absence in the North, he with a force of broken and discontented persons, sets saile for England, and approcheth the coasts of Kent about Sandwich and Deale, there to beginne his enterprize for obtaining the Crowne of England, vnder the borrowed name and title of Richard Duke of Yorke, if he found the Commons forward. But they, though doubtfull at first what to doe, yet at the last considering that his Souldiers were for the most part of desperate fortunes, and felonious qualitie, (though hardy otherwise, and approoued men of warre,) remembering withall the mischiefes of part-takings, would not adhere, but training them within danger vpon promise of succour, assaile, and drue them to their shippes, take five of the Captaines, Mountford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintin, and Genin, and * one hundred, sixty and four others, which were all of them afterward executed. Perkin himselfe who would not trust his person on shore, being worthily troubled at the inauspicious fortune of his followers, presently hoied sailes, and returned to his Lady Patroneffe and Creatrix, into Flanders.

(40) These newes being brought to the King, where he was then in the North, he is * said to haue giuen God thanks, and declared his ioy in these words. I am not ignorant (most mercifull Iesu) how great victoriesthou hast giuen mee, vpon the Saturday at the praiers of thy most gracious Mother, all which I ascribe not to my deserts, but to the bounty of thy celestiaall grace. Thou seest, O most benigne Iesu, how many snares, how many deccits, how many weapons, that terrible Iuno hath prepared, notwithstanding that after my marriage (see saining herselfe ioyfull, hath faithfully promised to beare toward us all fauour and good will, but see, more changeable then the winde peruerting all things awell diuine as humane, feares not God, but in her fury seekes the vster ruine of her owne blood. Thou, O God, who knowest all, deliver us also (if we seeme worthy) from these evils, but if our times haue deserved to suffer, doe thou, O Lord, thy good pleasure. Neuertheless we owe to thy Grace immortal thanks, which though with our tongue we cannot utter worthily enough, yet must they be rendered. We are abates of good courage, and O minded for certain, that no prosperity, no aduersity, no chance, no distance of places, or times, shall once make vs of thee vnmindfull. The most modest King hauing ended his speech, doth forthwith (faith our Author) seriously deliberate with his Councell what was to be done hereafter. It may probably seeme, that he had with-drawne into the North, to inuite Perkin (by occasion of his absence) the rather to take Land, that so hee might draw all his dangers into one place, and decide them in a Battell, if his Subiects should reuolt to Perkin in any numbers, or if they did not, then might he fall into his hands, by landing vnwarily vpon trust of the peoples fauour, and so by a more compendious, and easie way settle his Estate; of which heailed but little, by the faid counterpolicy of the Kentishmen. In regard whereof, in the first Act of Councell, praife and thanks were decreed to them, with which Sir Richard Gylford Knight was presently sent away, and order taken for the erection and watching of Beacons vpon the Coasts.

(14) The Dutchesse on the other side, seeing the South of England proue so drie, and barren to her driftes, conueighes againe her Idoll into Ireland, where she well knew there could not want partakers, and Perkin himselfe daring to entertaine the hope of a Crowne, (for by so long peroration of a Kings sonne, and heire, ambition had throughlie kindled his youthfull blood) was now no little cause of bringing things to an issue by his owne forwardnesse. * Maximilian King of Romans, whither as one willing to keepe the English buified (* Henry hauing forbidden his Subiects all traffike with the Flemmings, and all other of his sonne the Archdukes Subiects,) or as crediting the fiction, and therefore led thereunto in honour and conscience; * Charles also King of France, but specially the Dutchesse of Burgundy, (by whom this bubble was first blowne vp, and put abroad) did concur to the molestation of King Henry; Maximilian, and the French King, more secretly, but the Dutchesse with all her Oares and Sailes plied it in open view. Borne vp by these supporters he the rather easily drew the Irish to assent to his pretext; but his counsell weighing with themselves that the Irish mens friendship, how firme so euer, was insufficient in respect of their nakednesse and poeerty to worke their wishes, hee according to such aduises as were taken before his departure from his Creatrix, coasteth into Scotland, for feare of punishment, faith * Andreas; if perhaps by the Kings true Subiects within Ireland hee should chance to be apprehended; but the euent shewes, that it was not onely for his more security, but principally to strengthen his enterprize with the Scottish aide, whereof in those daies hee had small reason to bee doubtfull; and his case was such, that no third course was left vnto him, but either to fight and conquer, or liue branded with immortal infamy both of Cowardize and impotence. Henry hearing these things were not slacke to prouide for his iust defence, greatly careful vpon what coast this wandring cloud would at length dissolue it selfe, in what effects sooner; and therefore obserued all his waies with as much curiosity as was possible.

(42) James the fourth, a young Prince of great hope was at that time King of Scots, to whom this bold counterfeite (being specially recommended, for the true Richard Duke of Yorke, by the * King of France, and vndoubtedly much more by the Dutchesse of Burgundy,) repaires; and had most courteous entertainment, and audience, the effect whereof Andreas thus coucheth: That the King was finally deccied by errors, as most of other, though most prudent Princes, had become before. But the rare impudency of the the Lad, & that connexion which his darings had with so many great Princes, deferue not to be so slenderly ouerpassed. Hee therefore being in honourable manner accompanied, and brought to the presence of King James, had words to this effect. That Edward the fourth late King of England, leaving two sons Edward and Richard Duke of Yorke, both very young, Edward the eldest succeeded their Father in the Crowne by the name of King Edward the fifth: that their uncle Richard Duke of Gloucester to obtaine the Kingdome, purposed to murder both, but the instrument employed by him to execute the execrable Tragedy, hauing cruelly slaine King Edward the eldest of the two, was mooued to saue Richard his brother, whom neuertheless the world supposed to haue bene alike barbarously made away; though falsely (supposed); for that himselfe there present, was that very Richard Duke of Yorke, brother of that unfortunate Prince, King Edward the fifth, now the most rightfull, and lineall inheritor heire Male to that victorious and most noble Edward of that name the fourth, late King of England. * That hee in his tender age thus escaping by Gods mercy out of the County of London, was secretly conuied ouer the Sea, * whither when hee was brought, the party who had the conuiance of him in charge, suddenly forsooke him, and thereby forced him to wander into diuerse Countries, where he remained certain yeeres as vnknew, * till at length he came to the true vnderstanding of himselfe. * In which season it hapned one Henry, son to Edmund Tydder Earle of Richmond, to come from France, and enter into the Realme, and by subtil and fowle means, to obtaine the Crowne of the same, which to him the said Richard rightfullie apperained. That Henry as his extreame and mortal enemy, so soone as he had knowledge of his being alieue, imagined, and wrought all the subtilties waies, and meanes he could, to deuide his final destruction. That the said mortal enemy hath not only falsly furnished him to be a fained person, giuing him nicknames, so abusing the world, but that also, to deferre, and put him from entrie into England, hee hath offered large summes of money to corrupt the Princes, with whom he had bene retained, and made importune labour to certain seruants about his (the said Richards) person, to murder or poison him, and others, to forsake and leaue his righteous quarrell, and to depart from his seruice, as Sir Robert Clifford, and others. That euerly man of reason may well vnderstand, that the said Henry needed not to haue moued the foresaid Cofts, and importune labour, if he had bene such a fained person. That the truth of his cause so manifest * moued the most Christian King Charles, and the Ladie, Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie, his most deare Aunt not onely to acknowledge the said truth, but lovingly also to assist him. That now because the Kings of Scotland (Predecessors of the said King James) had oftentimes supported them, who were rest and spoiled of the said Kingdome of England, (as in freest memory King Henrie the sixth,) and for that he (the said King James) had giuen cleare signes, that he was in no noble quality, vnlike to his royall Ancestors, he so distrest a Prince was therefore moued to come, and put himselfe into his hands, desiring his assistance to recover the Realme of England, promising faithfully, to beare himselfe towardes the said Scottish King, no otherwise then as if he had bene his owne naturall brother, and would (vpon recovery of his inheritance) gratefully doe to him all the pleasure which lay in his utmost power.

(43) Perkins speech ended, and his amiable person being fitted with so many countenancing circumstances of state, and seemings, (by the recommendations of great Princes, aide from the Irish, assured hope of aide in England, and his owne well-appointed company,) made so strong an impression in the young Kings conceit, that, albeit there wanted notice, who with many arguments aduised the King to repute all but for a meere dreame and illusion, his person was honorably receiued, as it became the person of Richard Duke of Yorke, and his quarrell entertained, which the more to grace in the Wordles eye, he gaue his consent, that the said Duke of Yorke should take to wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, daughter to the Earle of Huntley, being neere cosen to the King himselfe, a young maide of excellent beaurtie and vertue. By which marriage, as the gentle King abundantly declared that he took him for the very Duke of Yorke, so Perkin, * (disstrustfull of the Scots, * and desirous to gaine the lone and fauour of the Nobles of the Realme) cunningly serued his owne ends for the present, passing current for a Prince of high blood, and roiall hope. Vpon this ground a warre was presently vnderaken against Henrie, and entered into; the King of Scots in person, and Perkin, followed with great numbers, specially of Borderers, fell vpon sundry parts of Northumberland, which they most grieuously afflicted, burnt and spoiled, publishing neuertheless by Proclamation made in the name of Richard Duke of Yorke much fauour and immunitie to all such as would adhere to his iust quarrell, and a thousand poundes in money, and one hundred markes by yeere, of land of inheritance to the meaneest person, that could either take or distresse his great enemy, who (he said) was flying the land. But King Henry by his diligence, and wildome had so settled the mindes of his people in those parts, that there is no mention made of any one person which offered his seruice. This vnexpected auersion so blank and damp the Scottish enterprize on Perkins behalfe, that the King offended therewith, retired with his armie (laden with booty) into his Realme, and from thenceforth esteemed of his new Cosen the lesse. But King Henry not minding to forgoe so vniust and causelesse outrages, calls a Parliament, opens his griefes, and praies aide for an inuasive warre against Scotland, which was generally assented vnto, there being scarce anie more gratefull propolitions to the English in those swording times, than warre with French or Scots: an humour, vpon which this King did practise to enrich himselfe. For the public monies by these occasions came into his Exchequer, with a final part whereof he flourished out a show of hostile prouisions, and the Remainder thereupon (if peace ensued, which he alwaies knew how to bring about with honour) was cleerly his owne without account. The summe allotted to be gathered was * sixscore thousand poundes, and for collection thereof were granted two dismes, and an halfe, and two fiftenees. But the leuie of this money lo granted in this Parliament, kindled a dangerous blaze in England; in so much, that the Lord Dapweney being lent General of the Forces against the Scots, and vpon his way thither, was recalled by occasion of intestine troubles.

(44) Which troubles had their Original from the leuie of such payments among the Cornish, as were assented for the Scottish warres. When therefore the Collectors came among them, the People (being a stout, bigge, and hardy race of men,) tumultuously assembled a whom one Thomas * Flammarck a lawyer, and Michael Ioseph, a blacke-smith or horsefarrier of Bodmin, like firebrands of rebellion inflamed, and were followed as Captaines, not without secret and silent relation (as it may be suspected) to Perkins pretences, and that hope of redrefe (if he were King,) which, by his Proclamations he had colourably giuen to the people, at the time of the Scottish Inuasion; where, among manie other things, (tending to humour such as were malecontent, by making the person and gouernment of King Henrie odious,) this we find.

(45) Our great enemy (saith the Proclamation) to fortifie his false quarrell, hath caused diuers Nobles of this our Realme, whom he held suspect, and stood in dread of, to be cruelly murdered: as our cosen Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Simond Montford, Sir Robert Ratliffe, William Dapweney, Humfrey Stafford, and many other, besides such as haue detested bought their liues, some of which Nobles are now in the Sanctuary. Also he hath long kept, and yet keepeth in prison our right intirely wel-beloued Cosen, Edward, sonne and heire to our Vncle Duke of Clarence, and other, withholding holding frō them their rightfull inheritance, to the intent they should neuer be of might & power, to aid and assist us at our need, after the dutie of their leageances. He hath also married by compulsion certaine of our Sisters, and also the Sister of our forefaid Cousen the Earle of Warwicke, and diuers other Ladies of the blood royall, vnto certaine his kinsmen and friends of simple and low degree, and putting apart all well-disposed Nobles, he hath none in fauour, and trust about his person, but Bishop Fox, Smith, Bray, Louel, Oliuer King, Sir Charles Sommerst, Dauid Owen, Ryssel, Sir Iohn Trobante, Tyler, Chamley, James Hobert, Iohn Cut, Garth, Henry Wyot, and such other Caitiues, and willaines of birth: which by subtil inuentions, and pilling of the people, haue been the principall faders, occasioners, and counsaillers of the misrule, and mischiefe now reigning in England, &c. We remembering these premises, with the great, and execrable offences daily committed and done by our forefaid great enemy, and his Adherents, in breaking the liberties, and franchises of our mother, the holy Church: to the high displeasure of Almighty God: besides the manifold treasons, abominable murders, manslaughter, robberies, extortions, the daily pilling of the people by fines, tasks, tallages, beneuolences, and other "unlawfull impositions, and greuous exactions, with many other hainous effects, to the likely destruction and defolation of the whole Realme, &c. shall by Gods grace, and the helpe, and assistance of the great Lords of our blood, with the Counsell of other fad persons, &c. see that the commodities of our Realme bee employed to the most aduantage of the same, the entreuerse of Merchandize betwixt Realme and Realme, to be ministered and handled, as shall move best to the Common weale, and prosperitie of our subiects: and all such fines, tasks, tallages, beneuolences, unlawfull impositions, and greuous exactions, as are above rehearsed, to be foredone, and laid apart, and neuer from henceforth to be called vpon, but in such causes as our Noble Progenitors, Kings of England haue of old time bene accustomed to haue the aide, succour, and helpe of their subiects, and true liegemen.

(46) The tide of people being thus vp: Flammeock and the blacke Smyth (hauing firme promise of the Lord Audleys personall helpe) lead them forth toward Kent, where they doubted not greatly to encrease their numbers; and had in likelihood so done, but that the singular diligence and wisdom of the King, frustrated their hopes by sundry Princely Arts. Yet they flow on and to shew what they durst doe, they flew in their way at Tansford the Prouost of Perin, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidie; and marching forward without offering other violence, James Thichet Lord Audley ioines himselfe at the City of Wells vnto them, according to secret agreement, and becomes their Generall. From Wells they proceeded to Salisbury, thence to Winchester, and so toward Kent, where the Countrey was letted and prouided. But the King farther doubting that the Scots would take fresh occasion, by these feditious vproares, to invade the borders of his Realme, dispatched Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (*a Peere of excellent vertue) to defend those parts, with the helpe of the Bishopricke of Durham, and the Marches, till these home-comotions were appeased; that then the Lord Dawbeney might with a iust and full Army prosecute the warre against the Scots. But James their King, perceiving the end of the English intestine warres, would be the beginning of his troubles, thought it best by way of anticipation to weaken his enemy before hand as much as hee could, and thereupon fiercely invaded Northumberland againe, and besieged Norham Castell belonging to Richard Fox, whom the King for his noble seruices and desert, had now advanced from Exeter, and Bath and Wells, vnto the Bishopricke of Durham. But the Scotts King, hopelesse to winne the Castell, though hauing done much hurt both to it and to the countrey, withdrew his people before the Earle of Surrey could approach with his Army, wherein was the Earle of Westmorland, the Lords Dacres, Strange, Neuill, Latimer, Lumley, Scrope, Clifford, Comers, Darcy, the Baron of Hilton, and many Knights, as Percie, Bulmer, Gastoigne, Penington, Bigot, Bowes, Elarker, Parr, wharton, Strangwith, Constable, Ratcliffe, Sawle, Goner, Masgraue, Mallerie, Leger, Eueringham, Stapleton, Worley, Pickering, Heron, Gray, Ridley, Griffith, Fenwicke, Ward, Strycland, Bellingham, Curwen, Putter, Tempest, Metcalfe, and others: who missing the enemy, marched after into Scotland, and tooke such reuenge as the thortnesse of their fodaine prouisions would enable.

(47) The Rebels on the other side, (whom king Henry thought not good to encounter in their first beates) but suffered them to tire their fury, and subrate themselves with a long march, the countries as they past being forelaide from ioyning with them) coming neere to Kent, found few, or no partakers there; but the Countrey strongly defended against them by the Earle thereof, the Lords Aburgenie and Cobham, with other principall men and their followers; which made diuers of the Rebels secretly shrinke and abandon the enterprise. But the Lord Audley, Flammeocke, Michael Ioseph, and the rest, kept on their way, and encamped vpon Blackheath, between Greenwich and Eltham, from the top whereof they might behold the Citie of London, & the whole brauery of that Horizon. Here they resolved to abide the King, or to assaile London. The King on the other side, by the diligence of the Lord Maior, and other the Magistrats, secured the Citie, which was full of feare and businesse; himselfe enuironed with his Nobles, & the choice of the South, hearing where the Rebells was encamped, resolved by dint of sword to deliuer his people from tiring expectations, and for that purpose marcheth out of London, and encamps in S. Georges field, where he lay that night. The next day when he vnderstood that the Enemy had drawne forth his People, and set them in Battell-ray, he sends out Henry Bourchier Earle of Essex, Edmond de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and others, with certaine Cornets of horse, and Companies of Archers, to beset the hill, and the descents thereof, while Giles Lord Dawbeney with the strength of his Armie, chargeth the Enemy in Front, whom with some slaughter they draue from the Bridge at Deepford strand; and then mounting the hill, he and the Earles charge the maine squadrons on all sides, and without much labour breake and defeat them. The number of the Rebels slaine is vncertainly reported, the odds being betwene *two thousand and *three hundred. The Kings armie returned fewer by three hundred. Fifteen hundred rebels were taken Prisoners, & the takers had their Prisoners goods granted them. James Lord Audley, Flammeocke, and the Smith were taken and executed. To all the rest mercy was seasonably extended. The Lord Audley led from Newgate to Towerhill in a coat of his owne Armouries painted on a paper, reuerst and torne, there paid his head, for being a Head to that heady Route: Flammeocke and the Smith were quartered. Memorably strange was the comfort, with which this Blacksmith is said to haue cheered vp himselfe at his being drawne to execution, saying, That yet he hoped thereby, that his name and memorie should bee euerslasting. Who could beleue, that the desire of a long-lasting name howsoever should take the affections of so meane a person? Such therefore was the end of this insurrection; but the times being queasy, the King wisely forbore to take any seuer reuenge vpon more then onely vpon the chiefe Leaders, for he was truly informed that this calamitie had not broken the willes of the Cornishmen, who remained ready for any desperate fuddlesse exaltations, in so much as that the quarters of Flammeocke, and the Smith being once appointed to haue bene set vp in Cornwall for terror, were onely fixed about London, the King thinking good to temper his iustice euen in such a circumstance.

(48) His next care was so to order the warre against Scotland, that the Peace whose foundations he had laid a far off, might bee made to his more honour: & because the iniuries sustained by the youthful error of King James, were too publike to bee altogether forgotten; hee sent the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Neuill, and others, to invade the Scottish borders with an Army, who pursued the reuenge with great vehemency. Meane while there arrieth in Scotland Peter Hyalus an Ambassador from Ferdinando and Elizabeth, King and Queene of Spaine, as from friends equally well affected to both parties, to mediate a peace between the two Kings of England and Scotland, which perhaps in their owne persons would not easily haue bene brought about, the point of honour might thereunto haue giuen such empeachment. But this was the way to a peace which King Henry forelaw, there being not onely a strict bond of loue between him and Ferdinando, but an ouerture, if not a secret conclusion, to match his eldest sonne Prince Arthur with the young Lady Katherine daughter of Spaine, who for her excellent vertues was well worthy to be the happy wife of any Prince then breathing. Hyalus so handled the point of his employment, that an honourable truce followed. This Ambassador was a practicke man of much experience, and knew the better how to deale on the behalfe of King Henry against Perkin Warbecke, (*an imaginary and Stage-play Prince) for that his Soueraigne Queene had also bene exceedingly molested by a Counterfeite. For Henry the fourth, King of Castile, and brother to Elizabeth, being vnable to begette children, Ioan (daughter of Edward king of Portugal) his wife found meanes notwithstanding to beare one, by occasion whereof, after King Henries death, for that it was borne in marriage, a dangerous warre was vnderaken by *Alfonso King of Portugal, on behalfe of Isabella the supposed inheretrix; but Truth, partly by force, and partly by mediation, was in the end victorious; and Elizabeth, or Isabella sister of Henry succeeded to her brother, and brought the inheritance of the Kingdomes of Castile and Leon, with her to Ferdinando King of Arragon. The chiefe point of this truce with Scotland was, that Perkin Warbecke should leaue that Kingdom, seeing King James, standing vpon his honour, would not deliuer him vp to King Henry. Perkin hauing now no remedie, did accordingly, taking with him his wife, the Lady Katherine Gordon; and with such few as remained to him, past into Ireland, where hee had not continued long, but the Cornish-men offer to rise at his arriual, and to aduventure their fortunes, and liues in his quarrell: Which motion Perkin gladly entertained, as perceiving yet some little hope left to maintaine himselfe, by the troubles, and hazards of others: but the policie and fortune of King Henry were growne so venerable with the Princes his Neighbours, that Ambassadors came from France, and from the Arch-Duke of Burgundy, the one to ratifie amity, the other to request the restitution thereof; both which K. Henrie (who reposed his whole trust next vnder God, vpon the amity of his neighbours) granted, and the English Merchants (who had been somewhat long forbidden by their Soueraigne to trade in the Arch-Dukes dominions) *returning to Antwerpe were receiued into the same with Proceffion: so that Perkin could scarce cast his eye vpon any place, not onely where to raise aides, but not where to rest his head, vnlesse perhaps in the Court of the Dutcheffe of Burgundie; neither in all his fortunes did anything seeme miserable or vnworthy, but the great infelicity of his wife, whose beauty, birth, and honourable qualities ought not to haue bene so betrayed by her friends temerity. Perkin hereupon landing at Whitsand Bay in Cornwall in September, found meanes afterward at Bodmin to raise some thousands of people, whom with most lawfull promises, inuectiue proclamations, and strong impudency, he held together vnder the Title of Richard the fourth King of England, whose fate was none of the happiest, while the maiesty of her name might so be played with by impostors. Perkin thus accompanied, marcheth toward the City of Exeter, purposing if hee could winne it by force, to enrich his Souldiers with the spoiles thereof, and to inuite all other loose or lost people to his seruice by the hope of like booties, and by taking into his possession such places of strength as lay in his way to secure his retreat, if (according to the ordinary fortune of warre) any thing should happen to him vnluckily.

(50) But the King (hearing that the varlet was landed, and againe made head against him in Armes vpon trust of the Cornishmens assistance) is said to haue smiled, vling these words: *Lee, wee are againe prouoked by this Prince of Kakebells, but left my people should through ignorance bee drawne into destruction, let us seeke to take this Perkin by the easiest wayes we can. Reason hee had to smile, for now hee seemed to see the bottom of his perill, and as it were to hold his enemy empounded within the English Ocean, it being a perpetuall and noble wit of his, that he might looke his dangers in the face, and deale with them hand to hand, as the neereft cut out to a full conclusion. Hee therefore prouides accordingly, assembling his forces, and his wits (no lesse to be dreaded then his forces) sending forth his espials into all parts to obserue the tracke, and hopes of this empty cloud, which is now scene before Exeter, a principall strength and ornament of the Western parts of the Kingdom. Parlea, and the allurements of wordes vnder the guilt title of King Edwards sonne, prouing vnauailable with those resolute and faithfull Citizens; Perkin forthwith betakes himselfe to violence, sets fire on the gates, mounts his scaling ladders against the wals, and with his utmost fury labours to force a suddaine entrance, for that as hee suspected, succours could not long bee wanting. The Citizens on the other side, and such of the Countrey, as came in, prepare, and make a very valiant defence against the Rebells, and in stead of quenching the fires kindled by the enemy at the gates, to open a passage (for they had not Canon or any other Ordinance) the Citizens threw on great store of fagots and fuel, and so with flame did shut vp the way, when the gates themselves were now consumed, and in the mean while they cast vp trenches, and man their walles, from whence, with the slaughter of about two hundred Rebels at this assault they valiantly draue them. Such messengers as by cords slip downe the walles, to signifie their perill, sped toward the King; but the loyall diligence of *Edward Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, the Lord William his sonne, with many principall Gentlemen of those parts, as Trenecher, Carew, Fulford, Haleswell, Croker, Edgecomb, Semar, followed with great store of Souldiers, faued him the labour of a personall rescue by timely approach.

(51) Perkin hearing thereof, riseth from before Exeter, and marcheth to Taunton (a goodly town not far off) there to take the musters of his Armie, and to prouide for encounter, where he found very many blanks in the list of his numbers, for that they had secretly thrunk away, as mid-doubting the sequel, the Earle of Deuonshire being so neere at hand with the power of the Countrey, and the King vpon his way against them, with the maiesty and terror of a roiall name and Armie, none of the Nobilitie (which was chiefly hoped) comming to their aide. Perkin neuertheless makes shew of standing, with such as were left vnto him. The Earle of Deuonshire marching towards Taunton, in the way there came vnto him Edward Duke of Buckingham, a young Lord full of great honour and courage, followed by a goodly troupe of Knights, & others excellent well appointed, both for their owne perill, and their

(52) In the meane while the King makes a reioicefull entrance into Exceſſer, to teſtifie his princely loue to the Citizens, whom he highly commended and graced, both for their courage and loyalty; commanding ſome of the Corniſh Rebels to be executed there, which did the better ſet-off the others contrary condition. There alſo hee gaue directions, to offer life, and obliuion of all crimes to Perkin, if he would voluntarily quit the Sanctuary, and ſubmit himſelfe. Perkin being now without hope, without abode, without eſtate, moſt gladly came forth, and did put himſelfe into the Kings hands. Reaſons leading that wife Prince to extend this fauour, were drawne out of the depth of true iudgement, cleared from vulgar perturbations: firſt, it was not altogether impoſſible, but that Perkin might eſcape him, (though by offering ſelfe-violence) and ſo the world ſhould leeſe the light of ſatiſfaction in ſo profound and perhaps a matchleſſe impoſture; then againe his youth might merite ſome compaſſion; but the infinite deſire which Henry had, from the mouth of the party himſelfe, to learne all the ſecrets of the plot, and who they were that lay vndiſcouered, and yet had linger in the myſtical praſtice, moued him to affect the poſſeſſion of this perſon aliu; which now

(32) Perkin being thus guarded, doth notwithstanding attempt to escape. And, if it were lawful to insert particular conjectures, drawn out of the considerations of circumstances, we should perhaps not spare to say, that his attempt for escape, was not without the Kings priuie; vñing such instruments to perswade, or furnish his flight, as might withall betray him, that so by degrees (occasion taken to cutte him off) the Realme might be ridde from such perpetual matter of trouble. For the deprauid witt and will of man might find or faine reasons to abuse the world still, if Perkin were at liberty; as that the confessions were extorted by feare, or forged by Henry to serue his turne, and the like. Therefore Perkins inrenction and escape (for hee was escaped) being discouered to the King, all the wayes were belet, and hee so close pursued, that in the end betaking himselfe to a religious house of Carthusian Monkes, hee declared how hee was, and besought their Prior in the humblest manner he could, for Gods sake to begge his life, which at the Priors suite was granted; but the Kings wrath being kindled, or the passage of his suppressed wrath opened thereby, he banisht all former respects, commanding him to be fettered, and set (for an whole day) in a paire of Stockes, mounted on a Scaffold before

(57) But forsomuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto mee the holy Euangelists, and the Crosse, by the Maior of the towne, which was called John Lewelin, and therein in the presence of him and others, Iooke mine oath (as the truth was) that I was not the foresaide Dukes sonne, nor none of his blood. And after this came vnto me an Englishman, whose name was Stephen Poitron; and one John Water, and laid to me in swearing great oathes, that they knew well that I was King Richards bastard sonne; to whom I answered with like oathes, that I was not. Then they aduised me not to be afraid, but that I should take it vpon me boldly; and if I would doe, they would aide and assist me with all their power against the King of England; and not onely they, but they were well assured, that the

(60) This new deuifit to vncrowne King Henry, fo wakened his owne feares, and the cies of the Catholians, (who had fecrety agreed to marry their Princeffe Katherine to our Prince Arthur) that there fecmed no fure ground of fuccellion, if that the Earle of Warwicke were not made away. A fearefull call, where the false reafon of State fhall faine to it felfe an impoffibility of well doing, without fhedding innocent blood, and fhall therefore refolute to found vpon fo crying a finne, the hope of perpetuity in fuccellion; fith nothing is truer, then that finne was euer an unfure bafis to fettle lafting workes vpon. But ð the narrow capacities of the moft feeing men; and the confidence whereof did vndoubtedly lead this King (herein not iuftifiable, howfoe excufable in refpect of humane frailty, which might propound to it felfe many feares, and refpects both publike and priuate) to conuicte at the plotted death, or rather formall murder of this harmeleffe Gentleman, whole wrong may yet moue the hardefte to compaffion, as it afterward stirred God in iuftice to reuenge, prospering no part of that great worke which was thereupon thus corruptly fought to be perpetuated. That noble Lady Katherine herfelfe was hereof fo fenfible, that when the diuorce was afterward profecuted againft her by King Henry the eighth, her fecond husband, fhe is reported to haue faid, That it was the hand of God.

for that to cleere the way to her marriage that innocent Earle of Warwicke was put to vnworthy death. Neither let licentious Practises vouch the singular Act of Salomon in taking away the life of his elder brother Adonias to colour this homicide: for he that will argue from particular facts in Scripture, shall not only leaue no Adonias liuing, but perhaps no Salomon. To worke this young Warwicke ruine, the mischeuous and dismall wretch Perkin becomes an occasion, if not an instrument, for he by his supple insinuations and flowing promises had corrupted his keepers, the seruants of Sir John Digbie Knight Lieutenant of the Tower; who (as * was affirmed) meant to haue murdered their malter, and then to haue set Perkin, and the Earle at large, to which practise of escape the poore Earle is said to haue consented. Perkin for this conspircie had his trial at Westminster, and hee together with one John Waters, who had bene sometime Maior of Corke in Ireland, were condemned, and being drawne to Ti-borne, had the sentence of death executed vpon them. Perkin at the Gallows did reade his former confession, taking on his death that the same was true, and vnderwent his punishment with patience. Walter Blewet, and Thomas Astwood (being two of the conspirators, for the other two, Strangewises and Long Roger, being the Lieutenants men also, were not executed, nor for so much as wee haue read, arraigned) not long after receiued the reward of their offence at the same place.

strangenes of which dangers made him thinke nothing safe. This Earle was the last heire male of the blood, and surname of Plantagenet; whose race as it was a long time glorious for giuing Kings to England, (euen from King Henry the second) so in the end (chiefly for the house of Torke) it became hateful (as it seemes) to God and man, for the most horrible and inextinguible deadly fewdes, murder, perjuries, and other horrors committed within it selfe, which (as then not fully expiated) lay heauily vpon the head of this Earle, and finally threw open all those fences, which the possession of Malestie and numerositie of issue had for sundry ages cast about it, letting in thereby the surname of Tydder being but two descents English, and which now after three descents and five Princes is also vanished. Now, among those few great works of peace which ensued their firebrands of warre, we must remember the marriage of Prince Arthur, with the Princess of Spain Lady Katherine. The interim from Warwicke death till then, brought forth a verie great plague, whereof in London there are said to haue died about thirtie thousand. The King and Queene remoue to Calais in May and returned in June. The maine * busines was to reuiue and ratifie the state of amity, and negotiations, betweene the English and the Duke of Burgundies subiects. Shine also was burnt, and being new builded, called Richmond, for which and the like, it will be fittest to haue recourse to vulgar Annals.

(62) The Coast of State now seeming cleare from al thickning weather, Ferdinando and Isabella King & Queen of Spain, according to the points of agreemēt betweene them and King Henry, concerning their fourth daughter the Lady Katherine (borne at Alcala de Finari or Complutum) sent her royally appointed in a goodly Flete to England, there to fulfill in person, what hitherto had bene onely treated of, who after many difficulties tooke land at * Plimouth in October. Ferdinando her father was the sonne of John King of Arragon and Sicilia, and although he was vnlearned, as being brought vp among armes and soldiery, yet by using the familiarity of wifemen he also became very wise, and proued that great Prince which first in these latter times recalled the old glorie of Spain, and reared it to such an enuious magnitude, as that the ialousie thereof hath bred no small quarrels in Christendome. For by his marriage with Isabella, (sole sister and heire to Henry the fourth King of Castile and Leon,) he reigned in right of his wife, and jointly with her, ouer those two Kingdomes and their appurtenances, who together (saith * Marineus of Sicilia) did admirable things and workes most holy. They * recovered the huge City and Kingdom of Granada, and part of Andaluzia from the Moors, after they had bene in violent possession thereof seuen hundred and fourescore yeeres, and hauing purged those places from the filth of Mahomets superstitions, built Churches to the honour of Iesus Christ, by occasion whereof Ferdinando was surname the Catholike King. The walles of the Citie of Granada at the time of the surrender, which (after about tenne yeeres warres) was by Foabdelis King thereof made to Ferdinando and Isabella, had * twelue miles in compass, and in the same twelue Gates, and a thousand towres enclosing seuen Hilles couered with building, innumerable people, and inestimable riches, & the Spanish forces at this conquest were about 12000. Horse, & one hundred thousand foot. The said King and Queene, besides many other their mighty actions, did also first discover America, by Christopher Columbus, & thereby brought a whole new world to the notice of Christendome. Isabella her selfe, defended of the blood roial of England, being daughter of John the second King of Castile & Leon, son of Henrie the third King of Castile and Leon, and of Katherine his wife (daughter of * John Duke of Lancaster, third sonne of our Edward the third of triumphall and neuer-dying memorie) was a Laddie, whose * like the Christian world had seldom any of that wisdom, grauity, chastity, and of so laborious a deuotion, that * she did not only day by day performe the Canonically and homely taske of prayers vnto Priests, but many other, and brought vp her children accordingly.

(63) The Lady Katherine being about eightene yeeres old, and borne of to great, so noble, so victorious and vertuous parents, is with iust maiesty and solemnity openly * married in Pauls Church to Arthur Prince of Wales, aged about fiftene yeeres, and eldest sonne to Henry the fourth, King of England, and of Elizabeth his wife. The Archbishop of Canterbury assisted with nineteene Bishops and Abbots, mixed, ioynd their hands, and performed all the other Church rites vpon that great day. The vulgar Annals can tell you the splendor and glorie thereof, in apparrell, jewels, Pageants, banquets, guests, and other princely complements, the onely weighty businesse of many weaker braines. A graue Lady (as som haue written) was laid in bed between the Bride and Bridegrome, to hinder actual consummation, in regard of the Princes greene estate of body; but others alleadge many arguments to proue that matrimoniall performance was betweene the, howsoeuer her selfe, (when that afterward came in question) * appealed to the conscience of K. Henry the eighth (her second husband) if hee found her not a maide. But Prince Arthur enjoyed his marriage a very short while, for in Aprill following hee died at Ludlow, being vnder sixteen yeeres of age: being a Prince, in whose youth the lights of all noble vertues did cleerly beginne to shine. His apertesse to learn was almost incredible, for (by the report of his * Malter) hee had eith learned without booke, or otherwise studiously turned and reuolued with his own hands & eies these authors following. In Grammar, Garin, Perot, Sulpicius, Gellius and Valla: In Poetrie, Horace, Virgil, Lucan, Ouid, Silius, Plantus, and Terence: In Oratorie: Tullius Offices, Epistles, Paradoxe, and Quintilian. In Historie, Thucydides, Linie, Celsus Commentaries, Suetonius, Tacitus, Plinius, Valerius Maximus, Salustius, Eusebius. Wherein wee haue bene particular, to signifie what Authors were then thought fitt to bee elementary and rudimentall vnto Princes; and by their example, to all of Noble or gentle birth, whose superficial boldnesse in booke in these frothy dayes, is become most scandalous and iniurious to the honour, and vfe of learning.

(64) But before the vtinely expiration of this great hope of England, King Henry weary of warres and tumults, and desirous to lay the beginnings of a long peace by most inward friendship with all his great neighbours, had concluded a match betweene Margaret his eldest daughter, and James the fourth King of Scotland, the * assurance whereof was published in the February next before Prince Arthurs death at Pauls Crosse; in reioycement whereof, Te Deum was sung, and other signes of publike ioy declared. The * Bishoppe of Rose saith, that the Earle of Bothwell did openly handfast, or espouse the said faire Lady, in the name of King James at Pauls Crosse, being Saint Pauls day. This contract was brought about in manner following. After that the storme of warre had (by mediation as before said) bene thoroughly laid betweene the two sister Nations, it chanced certaine of the Scots by their suspicious behauiour, and rough Phraese to prouoke the Garrison of Norham Castle to issue, who in the bickering slew and hurt some of them, and droue the rest away. King * James expostulates this violence very sharply by letters with King Henry, who returned most satisfactorie answers. Richard Fox Bishop of Durham (whose the men and Castell were) wrote also many deprecatory letters, humbly praying the Scottish King to accept amends, wherunto hee in the end inclined, and hauing some matters of farre greater moment to impart, desired the Bishops presence in Scotland (knowing his deepe wisdom and great grace with his Soueraigne) which King Henry gladly assented vnto. The meeting was at Melrose, an Abbey of Cistercian Monkes, where the King abode, who hauing roundly vttered to the Bishoppe his offence conceided for the breach of good termes at Norham Castle, and yet being finally pleased to receiue satisfaction, hee then secretly discoursed his whole mind, the summe whereof was, That the king of England would be pleased to giue to him in marriage the Lady Margaret his eldest daughter, as a pledge of indissoluble amitie. The Bishoppe promised his best diligence, and accordingly after his returne, laboured therein with King Henry, who most gladly hearkened thereunto. Whereupon the Scottish King sent the Archbishoppe of Glasgow, the Earle of Bothwell, and others to demand the Lady in marriage. Their entertainment was hearty and princely. But when the proposition came to fanning at the Councell table, it had not currant passage at first: for there were who objected as an inconuenience, That by this marriage the Crowne of England might come to the Scottish line, by the issue of Lady Margaret. Whereunto it is said, King Henry made this answer: * What if it should? for if any such thing should happen, (which Omen God forbid) I see it will come to passe, that our Kingdome shall leese nothing thereby, because there will not bee an accession of England to Scotland, but contrariwise of Scotland vnto England, as to that which is farre away the most noble head of the whole Island, seeing that which is lesse vnto, feth to accrue to the ornament and honour of that which is much the greater, as Normandy heretofore came to be vnder the dominion and power of the English our forefathers. When this was said, the whole boord of councell receiued it as an Oracle, & it went cleare about, That Margaret should be married to the King of Scotland. With this answer and other instructions the Scottish Ambassadors were sent home, who afterward returned into England with full authority & satisfaction to all Henries propositions, whereupon ensued the before said publication of assurances at Pauls Crosse. It was a principall Article in this agreement: That no Englishman should enter Scotland, nor Scot into England without commendatory letters from their Soueraigne. Which Article was reputed aspeciall meane to preferre the peace inuolable.

(65) But ere the young Lady her selfe was conuaued into Scotland, her brother Prince Arthur died, and in * February next ensuing, their mother also Queene Elizabeth, as shee lay in Child-bed within the Tower of London. The King to repaire his mind with fresh consolations, in aduancing his onely remaining sonne, Henry Duke of Torke, created him suddenly Prince of Wales, Earle of Chester & Flint, within few dayes after his mothers deceasse. Thus was Arthurs losse supplied, howsoeuer Henry made Prince, espoused soone after (* though with much reluctation) the Lady Katherine his elder brothers widow, * vpon the five and twentieth of June, at the Bishoppe of Salisbury house in Fleets street. And in this wise, by providing so worthy a wife for him, (though to say truth, her great Dower was the chiefe motiue) the king thought, that the estate of England was sufficiently settled; wherefore conuening his cares to the accomplishment of affinity with Scotland, hee most sumptuously furnished his dearest eldest daughter for her journey, & himselfe in person travelled fro Richmond as farre with her as Colewelle beside Norhampton, where his mother the Countesse lay: after certaine dayes spent in solace, the King gaue her his blessing, with fatherly counsell and exhortation, and committed the guard and conduct of her person principally to the Earles of Surrey and Northumberland, and to such Ladies and Gentlewomen as were appointed to that seruice; a great company of Lords Knights, Esquiers, & men of Marke attending them as farre as Berwicke. principall of his Nobles, received her from the hands of the Earle of Northumberland, and the next yeere after, married her at Edenborough, in the presence of all his Nobility. The King gave great entertainment to the English, and shewed them iuling and other pastimes after the Scottish fashion. The Scottishmen (saith *the Bishoppe of Ross) were not behind, but farre aboute the Englishmen, both in apparrell, rich Jewells, and masie chaines, many Ladies hauing their habiliments set with Goldsmith worke, garnish with Pearle and Stone of price, with gallant and wel trapped horses. Diuerse Ladies also and young Gentelwomen of Denmarke, attending Queene Margaret, remained there, and were well married to certaine Noblemen of Scotland, whose progenie liues honourably there euen at these dayes. The effect of this marriage is grauely described by the same Bishop in these words. There was perfect peace and sincere amity betweene the two Realmes of England and Scotland a long time after. And verily, during the life of King Henry the seventh, no cause of breach was ministred by either of the Princes, but they continued in great love and friendship, and mutual societie, contracting of marriages, continuall entercchange of Merchandize betwixt the Subjects of both the Realmes, as they had bene AL under the obedience of ONE PRINCE; where through, Justice, Policy and Riches did flourish, and abound throughout the whole Isle of Albion. And of this marriage is James the sixth descended, being that ONE PRINCE vnder whose obedience AL are now gouerned, as vnder the sole and lawfull lineall Monarch of great Britaine: for this James the fourth had issue James the fifth, hee had issue Queene Mary, hee had issue our present Soueraigne, the great grandchild of the said Queene Margaret eldest daughter of K. Henrie the seventh.

(66) Which effects of peace and riches, as they could not but bee comfortable to so wife a King as Henry, they being the fruit as it were of his owne iust labours; so let vs now obferue the last worldly cares of his raigne, and vpon what objects hee fixed his mind, freed from the awe of open challenges of the Crowne, and from throwes at his maine, which with what art, valour and felicity, hee at first achieved, and with how great hazards, troubles, and bloudie busineses, he brought it to such passe, that neighbour Kingdomes reputed it safe to entermarry with his family, wee haue already heard: Two principall points tooke vpon the last Scenes of his life, for the rest of his time hee wholly employed, either in the seruice of Almighty God (wherein hee was so diligent, that euery day he was present, after the deuotions of those times, at two or three Masses, oftentimes hearing godly Sermons,) or in building, wherewith hee kept his senses busied. The one of the two chiefe points, was to watch ouer the waies of his wiues kindred (the remaining branches of the turbulent and vnfortunate house of York) whose growth and greatnesse hee supposed might at some time or other ouertoppe his owne; the other was, vnder opinion of iustice, to encrease his treasure out of the common purses, whereby he seemed onerous to many, & somewhat obscured the brightness of his former glory, at leastwise diminished his opinion with the generality. Concerning his courtes holden with his wiues kindred, (the laterall issues and staddles of the Plantagenets) it fell out thus; which (by * occasion of the accidental landing of Philip King of Spain at this time, whereby the * Earle of Suffolke taking was procured) we thought it best to handle here together. Edmund de la Pole * Earle of Suffolke (Sonner to John Duke of Suffolke, and of Elizabeth sister to King Edward the fourth) in the sixteenth yeere of King Henrie raigne, wilfully slew a common person in his furie. Henry not sorry to haue occasion of encreasing his popularity, by presenting fo great a person to exemplary iustice, and in the same act to blemish the honour of a man, whose quality was to him suspected, caused him for the same to be arraigned. The fact hee was perfwaded to confesse, and therupon had pardon. The Earle neuertheless, as a Prince of the blood, holding himselfe disgraced, by hauing been seene a Prisoner at the Kings Bench Barre, fled the land discontented, and went to his Aunt the Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie; but within a while after, being fairly reconciled, hee returned. After which, notwithstanding, whether it were by reason of debt (the certaine attendant of vaine-spirited, and base-braued Courriers) wherinto hee had deeply thrown himself for his furniture, at the celebration of his cousin Prince Arthurs marriage, or for that the restlesse spirit of enuie in the Dutchesse had preuailed, hee taking his brother with him, fledde againe the next yeere after. The King who had pardoned his life, seemed now to repent his clemency, * though it is plaine, hee spared him of purpose, till hee might discover more of a conspiracy which hee knew was in hammering; but his flight troubled him not a litle, knowing the violent humor of that Lord, and remembering to what a dangerous & bloudy issue his brother the Earle of Lincolne had once already brought things at the battell of Stoke in the beginning of his raigne.

(67) For remedy, hee betakes himselfe to his wonted arts, and therefore to learne the secrets of the enemy, Sir Robert Curson Knight (Captaine of the Castell of Hammer by Calce) faimes himselfe a friend to the Earle, and flies from his charge vnto him. An office vnworthy of Knighthood; neither can any good spirit in the world stoop to leise to such double faced employment, which belides the treacherous dissimulations thereof, cannot but bee accompanied with wilfull impieties. For who is admitted to trust vpon a contrary side, without inuocations of Gods holy name, protestations, adiurations, oathes, the vrmost assurances which man can giue to man, to beget a conuenient affiance in his sincerity? but by this stratagem the king ranckes the bolomes and cabinets of his aduersaries, discovering their designs and hopes. Whereupon, William Courtney Earle of Deuonshire (being most nobly defended, and hauing to his wife the Lady Katherine, one of the daughters of K. Edward the fourth, and sister to Queene Elizabeth wife of King Henry) William de la Pole brother to the said Edmund Earle of Suffolke, Sir James Tyrrel, Sir John Windham Knights, with other, were attached, and committed to custodie, and afterward also * George Nevill Lord Abergone, and Sir Thomas Greene Knight, were likewise apprehended, but were soone deliuered. The Earle of Deuonshire, though innocent (for it is the misery of such great men, that their owne innocency cannot alwayes procure their owne safety; but their birth-right many times, and often other mens designations without their least priuity, is enough to hazard them, yea it is in the power of any conspirator by bare nomination, to doe as much, so that it concerns them to haue an eye not to their owne onely, but to the behaviour also of their whole Alliances and dependencies) this Earle (I say) though innocent, remained Prisoner during this Kings life, and some yeeres of his sonnes raigne, who set him at liberty. The other, William the Earle of Suffolkes brother, had not so strict an hand holden ouer him. But Sir James Tyrrell, Lieutenant of Guines Castell, and Sir John Wyndham, Welbourn, servant to Sir James Tyrrell, Curson a Pursuuant, Mathew Iones yeoman, and a Shipman were condemned of treason for aiding the Earle of Suffolke. The * two Knights were beheaded at Tower hill. The Shipman quartered at Tiburne: * Curson and Iones suffered death at Guines.

(68) This round and quicke dealing with the Earles complices and fauourers, startled his shallow and raw inuentions, and made their whole bulke to swarue and splinter; but the King rested not so; for vpon the Sunday before the feast of SS. Simon and

Iude, in the same yeete, of the said executions, there was published at Pauls Crosse, by the Kings procurement from Pope Alexander the sixth, a Bull of * Excommunication and curse against the said Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Curson, and five other persons by speciall name, and generally all other which aided the Earle against the King to the disturbance of the Kingdom. Thus did the most prudent Henrie pursue his enemies, not onely with secret countermines and open weapons of Law, before they could assemble to make any shew, but also with spirituall lightning; which doubtlesse, had they bene vpon iust cause, and by lawful authority fulminated, ought infinitely to bee dreaded of good Christians, because (as Saint Paul saith) they deliuer ouer to Satan. Sir Robert Curson was named, of purpose, to make the Earle secure of him; which may well be called a perillous, if not a prophane deuile, though his Holiness were made the instrument thereof. Neither did the King leaue here, for by his letters and messengers he so preuailed with Pope Alexander, as hee decreed by his Bull, That no person should afterward haue priuiledge of Sanctuary, who had once taken the same, and come forth againe: and that, * if any Sanctuary-man should afterward commit any murder, robbery, sacrilege, treasons, &c. he should by law force bee drawne thence to suffer due punishment. This was of great vte to the King, and preferred many subjects from precipitation, for the abuse of Sanctuaries had bene an efficient of many troubles. But the same Pope (hauing sent John Gighis his Receiver, to gather mony in England) shewed himselfe much more fauourable to such as perpetrated those laid hainous offences, as also, Vjury, Simony, rapines, adulteries, or whatsoever offences (excepting certaine offences against the Pope and Clergy, &c.) when he sent a * Bull of pardons (for mony) to all such offenders in England; dispensing also thereby, with such, as kept away, or by any fraud had gotten the goods of other men, which they should now retaine still without scruple of conscience, so as they paid a ratable portion thereof, vnto his Holiness Receivers. Sir Robert Curson (though before accused by the Pope) returns, when he saw fit time, into England, and with all into wonted fauour with his Soueraigne. The Earle, seeing himselfe thus stript of all hope to doe much harme, wandered about Germany and France to finde repose, but in the end quite tyred, he put himselfe into the grace and protection of Philip then in Flanders who by the death of Isabella was King of Spain, in right of Joan his wife, eldest daughter of Ferdinando and Isabella; where hee remained in banishment, till King Philip was driven by tempest in the month of January into England, as hee meant to haue passed through the steele, or English Ocean, into Spain, there to take possession of that Kingdom and other the appertinances.

(70) The chiefe Ship of the Marie Roiall, wherein the King was, and two other (all the rest being scattered by the fury of the weather into seuerall places and other Ports of England) thrust into Harbour at * Falmouth. Himselfe weary and sicke with the violent tossings of the Sea (whereunto hee had neuer as yet seemed, beneued,) would needs come on shore, and refresh his spirits, though the principall men about him dissuaded that course, as foreseeing it would procure a longer stay, then the nature of the occasions would perhaps well beare. And so indeed it fell out, for being now in another Princes (though his friends) dominions, where he had no power ouer himself, nor others, & the rumor of arrual stirring the men in authority thereabout, Sir Thomas Trenchard Knight with the suddre forces of the Countrey, not knowing what the matter might bee, came thither, and vnderstanding the royall quality of the person, inuited him with all humble humanity to his house, and forthwith dispatched postes to Court; not long after Sir John Caro Knight (with a great troupe of armed men) repaired also, pursuing the like humble entreaties; which the King, fearing constraint, because they were but subjects and durst not let him passe without their Lord and Masters leaue necessarilie yeelded vnto. Vpon notice of this mightie Princes casual arrual, King Henry presently commanded the Earle of Arundel to entertaine him till himselfe could come, who very magnificently did so, with * three hundred Hories by Torch-light; and in the meane while King Henry himselfe prepares. Philip perceiving, that whatsoeuer speed his affaires required, yet now there was no remedy but to stay, thought not good to expect his approach, but to prevent it, and came vpon the spur to Windsore, that he might be gone againe the sooner, after whom Queene Ioan his wife came leasurably. The rest of this entertainment, because it hath matter of weight, and is well set downe by Polidore Vergil, it shall suffice vs to follow his footsteps. At Windsore, the two Kings, after long and seuerall discourtes, beganne to conferre about renewing their league. Henry required that Edmund Earle of Suffolke might be deliuered vp into his power, which Philip denied to be a thing that hee could doe, as holding it most vnreasonable to be the author of his death, whom he had taken into Protection: but when at the last he found, that no excuse nor reason, could suffice, for that, Henrie voluntarily offered to saue the Earles life, hee promised to doe therein what hee desired, and presently tooke order for his sending ouer. According whereunto, King Henry (to draw out the time, till he had the wished prey) conuenced King Philip to London, to shew him the head City of his kingdom, out of which after a litle stay hee reconducted him. The Earle in the meane time, who conceived horror at the first newes of King Philip landing in England, as fatal to him, and resolved that no hope was longer to be reposed in the faith of forraigne Princes, came ouer not vnwillingly, presuming that after pardon of life, hee might alio in time regaine his liberty; or if that hope failed, yet should hee at leastwise obtaine to die, and bee buried in his Countrey. But King Philip and his Queene, hauing feasted with her sister the Princessse of Wales, departed England. The Earle was brought through Flanders to Calce vpon the sixteenth of March, and landed at Douer vpon the foure and twentieth of the same, conueighed thither by Sir Henrie Wiat, and Sir John Wilsheire, with threescore men in armour of the Garrison of Calce; and at Douer Sir John Louel and others receiving him, guarded him safe to the Tower of London. King Philip, not long after his landing in Spain deceased, being not thirtie yeeres old. That tempest which draue him into England was holden by the people as prodigious; for it blew down the golden Eagle from the famous Spire of Pauls Steeple (being of Copper richly ouergilt, of fourty pounds weight, in length foure foote, and in breadth three,) which also in the fall thereof, brake and battered the signe of the Blacke Eagle, in Pauls Church-yard, in the place where now the Schoolhouse stands. This accident euen then made some coniecture, that the Emperour Maximilian (whose Imperiall Ensigne the Eagle is) should suffer some losse accordingly (saith Polydore) as indeed hee did by the death of King Philippe his sonne. Which (if any superstitious delight in Calculations of that blind nature) we may well parallell with that * lightning which stroke the letter C. out of Cesar in the inscription of Cesar Augustus his statue; wherupon it was gathered, that Augustus should liue but one hundred daies after, and then bee called a God, (Cesar the remaining syllables so signifying in the old Hetruscan tongue,) which accordingly hapned.

(69) Thus was the Earle of Suffolke brought backe, and the King anchored his quiet at the safe custody of his person within the Tower. The other wordly point wherein he chiefly bestowed his ages care, was to gather money, though by courses seeming very grieuous and full of bitterness; the too gripping gripping greedinesse, and too profuse lavishnesse of money in Princes, being both alike offensive to a well settled estate. Some excuse his doings herein (amongst whom Polydor is chiefe) as not proceeding from any depravation or vncorrected affection of his nature; but from an opinion and forecast of generall profite: because a Princes humor of gathering, tendeth, though with distast of particular men, to the good publique, whereas his profusenes, though with some particular mens profite, endeth in the impoverishment of the whole. And Henry himselfe protested (saith Polydor) hee did it not for love of money, but with a purpose to bridle the fierce minds of a nation bred up among factions: though they (saith the same author) who felt the smart, and were wounded by his Instruments, cried out they were not so much the darts of severity, which did hit them, as of avarice. Yet Polydors Apologie may be current: for it is not to be doubted, but that such vice the King might propound himselfe; and yet withall, we can hardly find any commendable root thereof, the wayes being so importune and harsh, by which hee raised money. Let vs heare in this point the obseruatione

* Knight. Of nature (saith hee) Henry coveted to accumulate treasure, which the people (into whom there is infused, for the preservation of Monarchies, a natural desire to discharge their Princes, though it bee with the unist charge of their Counsellors and Ministers) did impute unto Cardinal Morton, and Sir Reinald Bray, who (as it afterward appeared) as Counsellors of ancient authority with him, did so found his humor, as neuertheless they tempered it. Where it is truly said, it afterward appeared: for till they were gone to account to God, and his feare for the maine quite banished, the king did not looke the reines to his immoderate desire of having, which yet was not more sinfull, then the meanes vnder him practised, were odious. For

* Empton and Dudley that followed, being persons that had no reputation with him, otherwise then the servile following of his owne humors, gaue him way, and shaped him meanes to those extremities, whereby himselfe was touched with remorse at his death, and which his successor disanowed. And this we take to be a true iudgement. To be particular in the recital of things worthy to die in forgetfulnesse, is not onely to recite, but in a sort to teach them also, as some, who by broad inuectives, haue as it were read a lecture of those vices, against which they haue pretended to inuigh. But publike and shamefull Arts may more safely be deliuered. The instruments whome the King let on worke (or who perhaps for the King on worke) were * two Lawyers, Richard Empton (afterward knighted) and Edmund Dudley Elquier; their employment was to cal the richer subject into question for breach of old penall lawes, long before discontinued and forgotten, whereby they brake in vpon the people, as it were at vnaware, like a kind of authorized robbers, masked vnder the pretext of service for the King, and the names of Delators or Promoters, a familiar sicknesse in the times of ancient Tyrannies. But the courtes to execute their employment, were void of all conscience and colour. For one of them was to *outlaw persons secretly, and then to seise their estates, druing them to chargefull compositions with the King, and heauy bribes to the Authors of their trouble. More detestable was another practise of theirs. For there were false turors and ringleaders of false turors, who would neuer give any verdict against the will of their patrons, the said Empton and Dudley; so that if any durst stand out vpon triall, the destiny of their causes was squared forth by the leaden rule of those fellows consciences; which to bee a truth, the expiatory punishment which K. Henry the eight tooke of them in the first year of his raigne, doth clearly conuince. By these meanes many honest and worthy subjects were rigorously fined, imprisoned, or otherwise afflicted, which filled the land with sorrow and repinings. Among very many others thus abused, Sir William Capell Alderman of London was eminent, as from whom, in the tenth year of the kings raigne, had beene scrized, vnder the colour of mothe-eaten and vnreuiued Lawes, about sixtene hundred pounds sterling, and was now againe plaide at a fresh, and another hand drawne vpon him for two thousand pounds, which because he would not pay, hee was by Dudley commaunded prisoner to the Tower; but by the death of the King which ensued, all such prisoners were released. If any perhaps will slight the hard vtiage extended to Citizens, and to the like, they are vnwise therein, neither thinke as Patriots ought. For though it may fall out that the personall vexation of some few, merits no great pitty; yet the example is pestilent; and it is a part of the cunning, to choise out at first such for patternes, as vpon whose persons least compassion may fall, which examples may afterward be extended to whomsoever. These reuels and rages against the wealthier sort continued, till it pleased God to sting the Kings heart with iust compunction, toward the horror of his death; who had the fauour from heaven, as to lie sicke of a consuming discaie, which wasted him by such insensible degrees, as gaue him the vice of his whole selfe (as it were) till the last gaspe, whereby hee had meane to recollect himselfe, after those many foule-wounding assaults which attend regall greatness, and to submit his thoughts to such ghostly admonishments (touching another life) whereunto in dayes of health, the hearts or cares of great Princes are feldome attentive.

(71) About the yeere of his death, hauing vnderstood that Lewis King of France, despairing of issue male, had annulled the Contracts made betweene Charles King of Spaine (sonne of the late King Philip, and afterward elected Emperour by the name of Charles the fifth) and the Lady Claudia his eldest daughter, whom he newly betrothed to Francis of Valois Dolphin of France, and Duke of Angoulesme, King Henry (whose care for preferation of the common quiet, and good of his Country, by forraign alliances, was euer holy in him and awake) thought it a faire occasion for him to match his younger daughter the Lady Marie. The French King to haue the aduise of James the fourth King of Scots, in the beflowing the said Madam Claudia his eldest daughter, had before sent Bernard Steward Lord Dobignie, and the President of Tholoux, Ambassadors for that purpose, who finally in effect receiued this answer: * That the said King James thought it best that his eldest daughter should be married within his owne Realme of France, for if she were married vpon any forraigne Prince, it might giue colour to claime title to the said Realme afterward. And if he did marrie her at home, rather to him the said Francis, whom he had appointed to succeede then any other. Which resolution was very acceptable to K. Lewis, because it iumped with his owne purpose, and it was followed accordingly. King Henry therefore hearing that King Charles might be obtained, so pursued the point * by the prudent managing of Richard Fox (now Bishoppe of Winchester) his Ambassadour, that King Charles his Ambassadors coming out of Flanders, where hee was educated, and meeting him at Calais, the affaire was opened, disputed, concluded, and the Lady Mary then about ten yeeres of age (as King Charles himselfe) was by solemne contract assured to him for wife.

(72) Now therefore his sonne Henrie Prince of Wales, being heire of the Crowne, and married; his eldest daughter, the Lady Margaret, Queene of Scotland; the Lady Mary his youngest, prouided for so highly (though in the end it came to nothing) all likelihood of perill by competitors, or busie Factionists, buried in the Tower, by the emprisonment of Edmund Earle of Suffolke; his people tractable and calme; his coffers full, and the state of things ripe for a successe: death (the executioner of the Almighties sentence,) was ready to discharge him of the prison of his flesh. Before he departed, * well disposed persons tendering the health of his soule, did both in forme, and otherwise, informe him of the exclamation against informers; Wherefore he of his blessed disposition, granted to all men generall pardons, certayne onely excepted. In his life time hee founded the goodly Hospital of the Sauey, built sixe religious Houses for Franciscan Friars, three of them for Observants; and the other three for Conuents. Of his building also was Richmond Pallace, and that most beautiful peece, the Chappell at Westminster, the one the place of his death, and the other of his buriall: which formes of more curious and exquisite building, he and Bishoppe Foxe, first (as is reported) learned in France, and thence brought with them into England. He died about the age of fiftie two yeeres, vpon the two and twentieth of * April hauing reigned twenty three yeeres and eight moneths. A right noble, wise, victorious and renowned King, and one whose piety would haue bene farre more eminent, then all his other vertues, if from the beginning the malignant quality of the times, would haue permitted him to liue in quiet. He specially honoured the remembrance of that Saint-like Man, Henry the sixth, the founder of his Family, and Prophetically fore-teller of that fortune which now hee died seized of, whom also he laboured to haue * Canonized for a Saint; but that Pope Iulius held that honour at two high a rate. It is reckoned by some writers * of that age among his principall glories, that three Popes, Alexander the sixth, Pius the third, and Iulius the second, did in their severall times, with authority and consent of the Cardinals, elect and chose him for chiefe defender of Christs Church, before all other Christian Princes. In his last will and Testament, after the disposition of his soule and body, hee deuised and willed Restitution should be made of all such monies, as had vniuistly bene leuied by his officers. A most pious and truly Christian care, whereby also appeareth, that hee hoped the wrongs done vnder him were not so enormous nor innumerable, but that they might fall within the possibility of redresse. The description of his whole man, is had in the beginning of his life, and the course thereof described in his Actions. There remaine of his wisdom many effects, and those as his fame likely to continue for euer.

His Wife.

(71) Elizabeth the first Child Legitimate, and eldest daughter of King Edward the fourth, was at the age of nineteene vpon the eighteenth of Ianuarie and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1485. married vnto King Henry the fourth, whereby was vntied the long contending Families of Lancaster and Yorke, and the Roses red and White ioined into one, to the greatiory of the English Subjects. Shee was crowned at Westminster vpon the five and twentieth of Nouember, the third of her husbands Raigne, and of Grace 1487. Shee was his wife eightene yeeres and twenty foure daies, and died in childbed in the Tower of London, the eleuenth of February, euen the day of her owne Natiuitie, the eighteenth of her husbands Raigne, and yeere of our Saluation, 1503. and is buried at Westminster in the most magnificent Chappell and rich Monument of Copper and gilt where shee with her husband lie entombed.

His Issue.

(72) Arthur the eldest sonne of King Henrie the seauenth and of Queene Elizabeth his wife was borne at Winchester the twentieth day of September, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred eighty fixe, and the second of his Fathers raigne. In whole fifth yeere he was created Prince of Wales; Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Chester; and at the age of fiftene yeeres, one month and twenty five daies, vpon the fourteenth of Nouember, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and one, espoused the Lady Katherine daughter to Ferdinand King of Spaine, shee being then about eightene yeeres of age, in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, London; and presently sent into Wales the better to gouerne that principality by his owne Prefence, enjoyed his marriage bed onely foure moneths and nineteene daies, departing this life at Ludlow the second of April, the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and two, of his Fathers raigne fiftene; and of his owne age fiftene yeeres, sixe moneths and thirteene daies. His body with all due funeral solemnitie, was buried in the Cathedral Church of Saint Maries in Worcester, where, in the South side of the Quire he remaineth entombed in Touch, or Lette, without any remembrance of him by picture.

(73) Henrie the second sonne of King Henrie the seuenth and of Queene Elizabeth was borne at Greenwich in the Countie of Kent, the two and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninety and one, being the seuenth of his Fathers raigne. In his Infancy hee was created Duke of Yorke and Marshall of England, and so trained vp in his youth to literature as hee was rightly accounted the best learned Prince in Europe, and by the death of his brother succeeded his Father in all his Dominions; whose Raigne and Acts are presently to be related.

(74) Edmund the third sonne of King Henry and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne in the yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninetie five, and in his young yeeres was created Duke of Sommerfet, which Title hee no long time enjoyed, being taken away by death at Bishopps Hatfield before hee attained fully to five yeeres of age, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and five, and fiftenth of his Fathers Raigne; and his body lieth interred at Saint Peters in Westminster.

(75) Margaret the eldest daughter of King Henrie and of Lady Elizabeth his Queene, was born the nine and twentieth day of Nouember the yeere of Christ 1489. and fifth of her fathers raigne; shee at the age of foureteeene was married vnto James the fourth King of Scotland, the yeere of our Lord one thousand five hundred and three, vnto whom shee bare James the fifth, Arthur and Alexander and a Daughter: which last three, died all of them young; and after the death of King James (being slaine at Flodden Field in fight against the English), shee was remarried vnto Archibald Douglas Earle of Anguiffe, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and foureteeene, vnto whom shee bare Margaret, afterward espoused vnto Matthew Earle of Lennox, Father by her of the Lord Henrie, who died at the age of nine moneths, and lyeth interred in the vpper end of the Chancell in the Parish Church of Stepyne nere London, vpon whose Graue is engrauen in brasie, as followeth:

Heere lieth Henry Steward Lord Darle of the age of three quarters of a yeere, late Sonne and Heire of Mathew Steward Earle of Lennox; and Lady Margaret his wife, which Henrie deceased the XXV III. day of Nouember in the yeere of our Lord God. 1545: whose Soule Iesus pardon.

Her second sonne was Henrie Lord Dornley a Noble Prince; and reputed for person one of the goodliest Gentles.

Gentlemen of Europe, who married Marie Queene of Scotland, the royall Parents of the most roiall Monarch James the first King of great Britaine, and of the Britaine World. And her third sonne was Charles Earle of Lennox father vnto Lady Arbella.

(76) Elizabeth the second daughter of King Henry and Lady Elizabeth his Queene was borne the second day of Iuly, one thousand foure hundred ninety two, and died the foureteenth of September and yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninetie five, and is interred at Westminster.

(77) Mary the third blossome of the Imperiall

Rose-tree of England, was first wife to Lewis King of France, who liued not long after, and died without issue by her. Her second husband was that Martiall and pompous Gentleman, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

(78) Katherine fourth daughter of this seventh Henry and of Elizabeth his Queene, was borne vpon Candlemas day, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and three, and in the eighteenth yeere of her fathers raigne, who was called to her part in a far better Kingdome within a short while after.

HENRIE THE EIGHT OF THAT NAME, KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE FIFTIE EIGHT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXI.

He rich and wise King Henry the seventh) gone (as is said) the way of all flesh, his sonne bearing the same name, a most magnanimous & heroicall Prince, succeeded in his Throne ouer all his dominions, as the only true heir vnto the Crowne, by both the houses of Lancaster and Yorke. His birth was at Greenwich in the yeere of Grace, 1491. the twentieth two of Iune: and his youth so trained vp in literature, that he was accounted the most learned Prince of all Christendome, indued with parts most befitting a King, both in lineaments of body, and liberality of minde, besides his ripe knowledge in politicke affaires, and was made the more agreeable to the affections of men, by the consideration of his flourishing age, as hauing not attained vnto nineteen at his fathers death. In his infancy hee was created Duke of Yorke; at twelue yeeres (his brother deceased) Prince of Wales, and at eightene became sole Monarch of the land, when at Westminster vpon Sunday the twenty fifth of Iune, euen the festiual of Saint Iohn Baptist, and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1509. hee with his beauteous Queene Katherine receiued their Crowns at the hands of William Warham Archbishoppe of Canterbury, no Prince giuing better hopes vnto iustice, or seeking the wealth of his subjects more then himselfe.

uince, and the wisest Nobility, with whom hee not only often sat, to the great increase of his politike experience; but would also yield his authority to their graue and faire seeing wilddomes: Of whom the plaints of Petitioners were so mouingly regarded, that Proclamations went forth, with promise of restitution, to them that had bene wronged by Dudley or Empson, two persons that had abused the authority of K. Henrie his Father, by enriching their owne coffers, with the vtter vndoing of many better Subjects. These men, King Henry the seventh had made his Instruments for the finding out of offenders in his penall Statutes, themselves being learned in the lawes, and apt enough to execute their Commissions to the full: for, by their daily informations and recouering of fines, they digged and brought a siluer Mine into the Kings Exchequer, some veins whereof by the way, ranne also into their owne coffers, to the great vexation of all, and vtter vndoing of many; whereat the Noblemen grudged, the Gentility repined, the Commons lamented, and all of them felt the teeth of these rauening Wolues: But the father King departed, and his sonne set on his throne; the complaines of the oppressed loe oppressed the King and his Council, that Dudley and Empson were sent prisoners to the Tower, and both of them by Parliament attainted of Treason.

(1) Edmund Dudley by descent was a Gentleman, and by profession a Lawyer, hauing both wit and wordesat will, had hee not abused both to his own destruction. Richard Empson his inferior by birth, was the sonne of a poore Siewe-maker, but yet had hee stepped before him to the degree of a Knight: These night-sprung Mulgrumps that sucked the earthes fannesse, from far better plants than themselves, saw not the many hands ready to plucke vp them by the rootes, when the season should serue to cleare the land of such weeds: for albeit they had their discharge vnder the Kings owne hand to doe what they did, and their seruice knowne Crowne seruice, a matter impugnable, yet no sooner were they left to stand vpon their owne basis, but that they felt the weight of their done wrongs too importunate for them any longer to beare; for so importune were all degrees against them, that Dudley forthwith in Guild-hall London was arraigned and condemned to die: and King Henry in progresse, (through the cry of the people) could take no pleasure, till he had sent for Empson into Northamptonshire, where among them hee was arraigned, and receiued sentence of death, which was so desired and followed, as to satisfie his Subjects, the King sent a speciall writ for their executions, which with great joy of all was performed vpon Tower hill, by taking from them their heades; when they left their riches to be spent by others, and their names to remaine vpon Record for the Caterpillers of those times: whose like if any such live, shall leaue their hateful remembrance to the like stains of reprochfull infamy, how pleasing soeuer the promotion so gotten in their owne eyes shall seeme, or the employments in their selfe conceites accounted profitable to the State.

(4) This iustice of King Henry wanne him great praise of his people, and his charity extended towards London, when that City was sore distressed with famine, by sending sixe hundred quarters of corne, great loue; so that neuer any King entred his raigne with better hopes than himselfe. That his person was tall, is not to bee doubted, though not like vnto Saul, as some haue alleaged, whose report is, that at the siege of Baillogne, he was higher by the head than any in his Campe, and euery ioint proportionable to so royall a stature: but that hee was strong, his many Iuts and Tilts, and fights at Turnay (most dangerously performed) was manifested vpon them that vnderwent his heauy hand: for at Tilt hee bare downe a man at Armes both horie and all, and threw Sir William Kingston a Knight of great strength to the ground at Barryers; with battell-axe hee combated against one Gior a Germane very strong and tall, and lent him better blowes then he could againe repay.

(5) His glorie thus mounted the Trophee of fame, and young Henry the onely morning starre in this Western Orb, Pope Iulius the second, fearing the further incroch of the French, who then had entred into some part of Italy, thought this Prince the strongest pillar whereunto to trust, and the fittest Carde to trumpe the French King, well knowing the Title that the English Kings had vnto France, and the readinesse of his Subjects to forward that way: whereupon writing his letters vnto King Henry, complained against Lewis the French King, and twelfth of that name, who neither (as hee alleaged) effecting of God, good fame, nor conscience, detained the reuenues of the Clergy, supported the Cardinal William to aspire the Papacy, aided in the siege of Bonon, Alonso of Ferrara, and the Bentenuly, both traitors to the Papal Sea, where hee intended to lay the foundation of his Empire, to vsurpe all Italy, besought him for the pity of our Saviour, and by the vertue of his famous ancestors, (for I vlt the words of the Popes briefe) that neuer forsooke the Church of God in distresse, and by the fillall obedience, the strongest bond, to enter into the holy league, they hauing elected him against Lewis, Caput fœderis Italiani.

(6) And indeed to speake as it was, Lewis much emulated King Henric greatness, fearing that fortune would giue him occasions to make his claime by sword vnto the Kingdome of France; which the sooner hee did by this holy fathers intigations, and by his Herald Clarencius roughly demanded, the Dutchie of Normandy, Guyen, Arnon and Alsaine, and with them also the Crowne that King Lewis ware. The Scottish king likewise, in case of Andrew Barton slaine in his Piracies (as the English alleaged) by the Admirall of England, accounted the truce broken, and fought the reuenge vpon the Borders adjoining. Against these two nations young Henry at once prepared, and happily obtained faire victories against both: but the successe of the one, (though not following precisely the time) we meane to relate before we enter discoure of the other.

(7) The enterprise great which K. Henry meant to vndergoe, hee thought it good wilddome to ioyne amity with Maximilian the Emperour, Ferdinando King of Spain, and many other Princes, holding also correspondency with Pope Iulius the second, that busie Pontificall Prelate of Rome: then propounding his purposes in Parliament, sent ouer certaine Nobles before him into France, and afterward followed them himselfe, pitching downe his Tents before the Towne of Teruine, where he raised his royall Standard of the Red-dragon, and begirt the Citie with a strait siege.

(8) To this place Maximilian the Emperour repaired, and to the great honour of Henry entred into his pay, wearing the Croffe of Saint George, with a rose (the Kings badge) as his faithfull Souldier, and receiued wages by day for euery of his, according to their degree: The French seeing the Towne in distresse, fought the reliefe with victuals, and men, but were so encountered by the king and his company, as that many of their chieftest Captaines were taken, and sixe of their Standards wonne, the rest for safeguard of life so posted away, that this conflict was called the battell of Spoires.

(9) Then was the battery brought so neer their wals, that many breaches were therein made, and the Towne by composition yielded vnto the King; whereupon the Earle of Shrewsbury was sent to see all things safe, who sturke vpon the highest Turret the Banner of Saint George, and took the oath of allegiance of all the French Citizens, to acknowledge King Henry their supreme Lord: This done, the King as a Conquerour entred Teruine, sent thence their their Ordinance, dismounted the Turrets, cast downe the walles, filled vp the ditches, and fired the Towne, excepting onely the Cathedral Church and Bishops Pallace.

(10) Then was the siege remoued vnto Turnay: about which City King Henry commanded diuers Trenches to bee cast, and placed his Ordinance to such advantage, that none might enter in, or come out of the same. Into this Towne a great number of the French from the Countie adjoining had lately fled, relying much vpon the strength and safety of the place, which indeed had euer bene accounted so inuincible, that this sentence was engraued ouer one of the gates. Iannes to some a perdition pucelage, thou hast neuer lost thy maiden-head: Notwithstanding, it was yielded vp vnto Henry with ten thousand pounds sterling for the Citizens redemption, who to the number of fourescore thousand, then tooke their oathes to become his true Subjects, and foure of their principall bare vp the Canopie vnder which the King in triumph-wile entred, hauing born before him his sword, axe, spear, and other habiliments of warre, euery Citizen holding a staffe-Torch for his light. The safe keeping of this City, the King committed to Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Order of the Garter, whom hee theremade his Lieutenant, and ordained Thomas Wolsey his Almoner the Bishoppe of Turnay. The yeere now spent, and season vnto the feilde, a successe from warre was determined vntill the next spring; whereupon all were shipped for England with full payment, and praise, but Teruine and Turnay sturke heauily vpon the French mens hearts.

(11) King Lewis thus endamaged in his owne Dominions, thought it best policy to pay like for like, to which end at the first attempts against Teruine hee solicited James the fourth of that name, King of Scotland (though brother by marriage vnto King Henry of England) to disturbe the peace of his Subjects, that so hee might bee drawne out of France; which James for his part put presently in practise: for writing his letters to Henry in the French Kings behalfe, charged him with breach of Truce; both in the case of his Scots slaine at the sea, as also against his Confederates the Duke of Gelder, and King of France, against which last he desired him to desist, otherwife hee should bee forced to reuenge the Frenches wrongs vpon his English: and to giue letters of Mart to recouer the losses of his Subjects.

(12) King Henry a Prince of a Maiesticall spirit, most highly offended at these his brothers requests, and threats, was so farre ouergone with fury and rage, that Lions King at Armes the bringer, was thereby somewhat daunted at his present answer, which he desired might be sent in writing, refusing to carry in words his reply to his Soueraigne. This Heralds wife and weighty request, was forthwith granted, and letters framed to King James demands, answering those imputations with rough and round words, which notwithstanding hee neuer read or saw, being slaine in the battell of Flodden, before that Lions could come to deliuer the same.

(13) For James King of Scots preparing for war, had in the meane while entred the borders, and with his Ordinance battered and wonne the Castell of Norham; making still forward vpon the English. Against whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey made the Kings Lieutenant of the North, at his going into France, assembled an Army of twenty fixe thousand strong, vnto whom came his sonne the Lord Admirall of England, with a great supply of good souldiers well appointed for warre. The Earle from Newcastell came vnto the water of Till, and pitched his battell besides a little Towne called Brankston, vnder Flodden hill, a mountaine lying in the North of Northumberland, betwixt the riuers of Till and Tweed, where vpon a rising banke, the Scottish hoast had taken the aduantage of the ground: vnto King James, Thomas Earle of Surrey sent Rouge Croffe a Purleuant at Armes, with proffer of battell to bee done vpon Friday the ninth of September; if so it pleased his Highnesse, who withall caried this message from the L. Admirall, that he was come in person to iustifie his A& against Andrew Barton, and would abide the last drop of his blood in the Vant-gard of the field.

(14) King James most readily accepted the offer; and by his Herald Hay sent the Earle word, that if he were as then in Edenborough, yet would hee most gladly come to fulfill his desire; and withall sent his letters for the iust occasions giuen him to invade England as hee did. The day approached, and the Scots keeping the higher ground, the Earle marched vpward along the riuier, and by two Bridges passed ouer with his hoast; making still forward, as though he ment either to haue taken into Scotland, or else to circumcut K. James his returne, which hee perceiving, halted downe the hill, putting from him his horse, raised his roiall Standard, and as a most valiant Chieftaine encouraged his Souldiers to the fight.

(15) The Scottish Ordinance discharged from above, ouershot the English with very small damage, and the ground of no difficult ascent, gaue them the easier access, so that Sir Edmund Howard, who lead a wing to the Vant-gard (whereof his brother the Admirall was Captain) got almost to the height; against whom the Earles of Lennox and Argile, with their Battels of Spares on foot so violently encountered, that they beat down, and brake the wing of the English, wherein many were slaine, and the horsemen disbanded, and put to flight; but presently recalled, ioynd themselves againe to the great battell, which by this time had attained to the toppe of the hill. King James that saw this first brunt performed, made full account that the day was his owne, supposing verily the English had fled, and therefore most valiantly hee aduanced forward, not staying for the reregard to second his battell, and encountering the Earles Battalion, a bloody fight was performed, with the losse and life of many a man: but strength neere spent, and the Scottish somewhat disioyned, through force of a great shoure of arrowes falling among them; Sir Edward Stanley hauing three bands refrused for the like purpose, with a fresh onset invaded the open sides of the enemy, whose force was so violent, that the Scots no longer were able to stand, but tooke downe the hill vnto flight, which the Earles of Lennox and Argile perceiving, did their best to stay them, and fighting most valiantly, themselves were slaine in the same place.

(16) King James then perceiving the wings of his Battell distressed and gone, and that the enemy began to enclose him about; with a stout resolution encouraged his men, willing the to regard the person of their King, their own honor, their valiant Ancestors, and now their present impleiments; that their blood might bee bought deare to the English, and the Scottish valours recorded for euer in the volumes of fame for this their one daies work; & thereupon rushing among the thickest began a most eager & bloody battell, and piercing through with a strong hand went so far, that hee had almost ouerthrowne the Earles Standard: thus buffed in doubtfull chance, the Lord Howard and Sir Edward Stanley hauing discomfited the enemy in either wing, returned in the face of the maine battell, and the Lord Darres with his Horse-men came vpon their backs, so that the Scottish were forced to fight in a round compass, but being ouer-laid, the Kings Standard was stricken downe, and himselfe most valiantly fighting slaine in the middelt of his enemies: with whom died three Bishops, whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrews the Kings bafe sonne, two Abbots, twelue Earles, and seuentene Lords, X x x x x Knights

(17) The next day when the Scouts had found the field cleared of enemies, and the English bled to burie their dead: the body of King James was found flaine among the rest, hauing received many bloody wounds, and most of them deadly: for his sides were flucke thicke with sharpe arrowes, his necke cut into the middest, and his left hand in two places almost cut quite off. These wounds notwithstanding he was delivered, and knowne by the Lord Daeres and others to bee the King: and thereupon his body bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in lead, was solemnly brought vnto the Monastery of Shine in Surrey, where no doubt it was honourably entered: but at the dissolution of that House, in the daies of King Edward the sixth, it was (as almost all other Monuments were) disturbed of rest, and throwne into a waste roome among old timber, stone and lead, which John Stowe the Relater saith, himselfe so saw: and further declareth (let him bee the Author) that the seruants of Launcelot Young Glazier to the late Queene, being at Shine in new glazing the windowes, either vpon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest: but smelling the sweet perfumes of the balmes, gaue it to their Master, who opening the lead found there in the Head of a man retaining fauour, though the moisture were cleane dried vp, whose haire both of Head and Beard was redde, which after he had well viewed, and a while kept, he caused to bee buried in Saint Michaels at Woodstreet London, the Church of the Parish wherein himselfe dwelled.

(18) Notwithstanding this faire tale of John Stowe, John Lesby Bishop of Rosse affirmeth, that it was held for certaine, the body thus found, was the body of the Laird Bonchard then slain in the battell: and that K. James was scene alive the same night at Kelfo, whence he passed vnto Ierusalem and there spent the rest of his daies in holie contemplation: but howsoever it is (laith he) he neuer was scene any more in Scotland, no more then Charles Duke of Burgundy was in his Country after the Battell of Nanze: howbeit his people held a vaine opinion that hee escaped, and would againe shortly returne. This battell was fought vpon the ninth of September, the yeere 1513, and is commonly called the battell of Flodden or Flodden Field: whence with victory, the Earle Generall departed, with the embalmed Body of King James, whom hee presented vnto Queene Katherine, who with the Gauntler of the flaine King sent the newes of the victorie vnto her Lord King Henrie, then lying in his siege before the Towne Ternue.

(19) But as these his proceedings went prosperously forward, and his fame daily spread in further parts, so the Flemmings (who hitherto had held side with his failes) began to fall off suddenly, & vpon the occasion as followeth. It had beene concluded betwixt King Henrie the seventh, and Philip King of Spaine, that Charles his eldest sonne should marry Marie the younger daughter of the English King, with a Princely Dowry agreed vpon, but shee being young, and not tenn yeeres of age, and the Castilian vnabie to giue assurance of her pension assigned, that match went not forward during the life of her father, howbeit King Henrie her brother regarding greatly her honour, provided for the marriage, and signified so much to the Counsell of Flanders: who dallied him off with many excuses, & lastly sent him word they could not receiue her that yeare.

(20) This therefore gaue Lewis King of France occasion to hammer at a peace, and making Pope Leo his, they both together put in practise, the reader was Henry to listen thereunto, both for the loue he bore to his sister, and for the great regard he held of the Apostolike See, whence Iulius the second, and this Popes Predecessor had lately sent him a Cappe of maintenance and sword, and by decree of Councel giuen him the Title Christianissimo; which were received with great thanks, and solemnities. The French Kings desire was to marry the said Lady Mary, whose dowrie hee assigned to bee thirty two thousand Crownes by yeere, during her natural life, covenantring further to pay vnto King Henrie her brother, the summe of one hundred thousand Crownes annually for five yeeres continuance.

(21) Peace thus concluded, the Lady Mary with an honourable Company was shipped at Douer, the Duke of Sorfolk, the Marquesse Dorset, and the Earle of Salisbury, being her chief conductors: whose fleet had not passed two leagues at Seas, but that a sudden tempest arose, and so violently raised the waues, as their Ships were seuered each from others, some into Flanders, some into Callis, and hers with great difficulty stricken in at Bullen, where by Boates her traine was landed, and her selfe borne to the shore in the armes of a Knight. Thence with thirty six Ladies all their Palfrises trapped in crimson Velvet, embroidered with gold, her selfe all in Cloth of silver, her horses and Chariots in Tissue-cloth of Gold, and Crimson velvet set with Goldsmiths worke, morelike an Angell then a humane Creature, mette with King Lewis at Abuile, and there the ninth of October the marriage was solemnized; where the French so gazed at the new Queenes beauty, as they could not cast their eyes from her attractive raies, nor the iusurme King bee satisfied with any other obiect whilst shee was in presence; for (so saith Guichardine) hee gaue him selfe ouer to much to behold her most excellent beauty, not considering her young yeeres, being not yet eigheteene, with the inequality of his owne expired; nor the constitution of his weake decayed body. For hauing bene sicke before this his marriage, and not well recovered of his lingering disease, (though he set the fairest shew outward) liued with this his faire Queene only eighty two daies, and then by his death left her to choose another husband to her beliking, which shee shortly did in her second match.

(22) For thus left a stranger in the French Court, and desirous to returne againe into England; King Henrie her brother, sent Charles Brandon the new made Duke of Sorfolk, to conduct the young Queene out of France. This Duke a gallant, and of a goodly presence, so courted his Charge, and carried himselfe in the eie of her melting affections, as his loue entred deeply into her tender heart: which thing indeed King Henrie perceived before, for which cause, as was thought, hee raised him to the grace of a Duke; howsoever the Gemme thus got, and too precious to bee lost, hee made her his owne, by celebration of marriage, before hee past Callis, and thence sent to intreate his Soueraignes consent, who seeing it was bootlesse to vndoe what was done, with a light touch of reproofe allowed their nuptials. But her dowrie kept backe by the French, and other grieuances complained of, caused no little troubles betwixt the two Realmes as shall be related in place conuenient. In the meane while let it not seeme our tedious if we briefly runne ouer the rising and height of Thomas Wolsey, that pontifical Priest, seeing that many dependances of Storie had their euent in the Acts of this man, who with the King reigned together as King, if not before him in managing the State.

(23) His birth was at Ipswich in the County of Suffolke, his parents poore, but of an honest report, and himselfe a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit: his education in youth was at Oxford in Maudlin Colledge, and his first preferment from the Lord Marquesse Dorset, who bestowed vpon him a benefice in his gift, in regard that hee was tutor vnto his sonnes, which Sir Amias Paulet so crost him in, that hee tied Wolsey by the feete in the Stockes though afterward hee put this his Act among other his deedes, whereof hee had iust cause to repent: for for the Schoolemaster no sooner was mounted into the Chancellorshippe of England, but that hee laid his command vpon Paulet, and retained him as Prisoner in the Middle Temple the space of 6. yeeres: but in the meane time Marquesse Dorset dying, left Wolsey pillar of hope altogether vnpolished, and the base thereof it selfe vnstered vpon any firme ground: so that Wolsey now sought his fortune in France; who comming to Calles, became seruant to Sir John Naphant the Treasurer of that Towne, where hee carried himselfe with so great discretion, as shortly his master preferred him to the King.

(24) This Scholler hauing thus cast Anchor at Court, the haue of hope, was more then double diligent in the Kings eye, and very seruicable also both to Doct^r Fox Bishoppe of Winchester, Secretary, and Lord Pruiue Seale, as also to Sir Thomas Louell Master of the Warder, and Constable of the Tower: but most of all vnto Fortune, that now fitted occasion to make her selfe famous in this poore Butchersonne. For King Henrie hauing vrgent business with Maximilian the Emperour, sent this his Chaplen vnto him in Post, who posted againe before hee was thought to bee gone, and withal concluded some points forgor in his directions, to the high content of his Soueraigne Lord the King: for the which hee bestowed vpon him the Dearie of Lincolne, the worthiest promotion vnder the degree of a Bishoppe: then was hee made the Kings Almoner, and presently following one of the Priuy Counsell: wherein his aduise was so wise, and his perfwalions so weighty, that hee was continually employed to be their expostitor to the King, alwayes carrying a most speciall regard, to preferre his Maieities will howsoever it went; so that his mouth was the only Organ that euer sounded his pleasure, and freedome from troubles of all State affaires.

(25) But warres hauing bene commenced betwixt England and France, and Turnay lost from the obedience of Lewes, King Henrie gaue his Almoner the Bishopricke thereof, and changed his Deane of Lincolns into the Bishopricke of the same Diocesse, and not long after set also the Miter of Torke vpon Wolsey Wife-head: whereby hee became (as it were) three Bishoppes at once, and now being Primas Anglia, carried himselfe accordingly, by erecting his Crosse in the Kings Court, albeit it were within the Iurisdiction of Canterbury, which seemed vnseuerable; the dignity of the Church held then much by Precedency of place, and the giuing way to inferiours, accounted the infringing of all religious liberties: Wherefore William Archbishoppe of Canterbury found himselfe fore agreed to haue the Crosse of Torke (which owed him obedience) aduanced with his, and that in his presence, for which hee greatly checked the presumption of this proud Prelate.

(26) But Wolsey not wanting wherewithall to mate him by the intigations of the Kings, both of England and France; obtained to bee made Priest, Cardinal, and Legatus de Latere, vnto whom Pope Leo sent a Cardinals hatte, with bulles of authority in that behalfe, yet were these high Presents brought in no better a case, then in a mean budget, which seemeth somewhat disgracefull in the new Cardinals eye; wherefore hee commanded a stay to bee made of the bringers approach, and for the greater honour to this honourable present, arrayed him in most costly silkes, beseeeming so great an Ambassador, who aduancing forward, hee caused to be encountered by a number of gallant Gentlewomen, and a great assembly of Prelates vpon Blacke-heath, by whom hee was conducted with much honour through the City of London, and his Present deliuered at Westminster, attended by many mitred Bishoppes and Abbots, with a rich shew of Copes, as if it had beene a Kings Coronation.

(27) Thus got before Canterbury by his power Legatus, to weare now his hatte without controll of an equal, hee obtained the purse with the broad Seale of England, which Archbishoppe Warham had enjoyed long before the death of King Henrie the seventh, and was made Lord Chancellour in his roomes: so that besides the purse and mace of that honourable Office, hee had two Crosse and two Pillars, borne euer before him by the tallest Priests that were to bee found in the Realme. To the better maintenance of his chargeable estate, the King bestowed on him the Bishopricke of Winchester, and in Commendam the Abbey of Saint Albanes, and with them hee held in Farme, the Bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, enioyed by strangers incumbents, not residing in the Realm, so that now seeming a monster with seuen heads, and each of them crowned with the Miter of a Bishoppe, let vs thus leaue him dandled in Dame Fortunes lap, till surfered with dalliance hee cast him from thence.

(28) But the state of Londons Tradesmen prospered vnder his greatness nothing so well, for such was the concourse of strangers, and so much were they borne with, by the superiors, that they abused the English, openly in the markets, kept from a Citizen his owne wife with his plate, yea, and past with a small pennance for killing an Englishman. These first were complained of in a Sermon at Saint Maries Spittle, and afterwards assaulted, and much hurt done to their substance and houses, for which riotous offence John Lincolne the only initiator was hanged; and four hundred men, boyes, and e-leuen women led in ropes along the City in their shirts, and halters about their neckes to the Kings Hall at Westminster, where his Maiesty sitting vnder a cloath of estate, pardoned the offences to the great reioicing of the Londoners.

(29) But the losse of Turney sticking fore vpon the stomacke of the French King, hee sought to redreeme it againe with money, and to that end sent his Ambassadors into England, where it was concluded, that the City should bee deliuered vnto Frances Valois then King of France, paying for the same vnto Henry sixe hundred thousand Crownes in twelue yeeres continuance, that is to say, fifty thousand Crownes a yeere, that the Duke of Albanie should be recalled out of Scotland, and that the Daulphin should marry the Lady Mary King Henries young daughter, which marriage if so it happened not to take effect at the yeeres of content, then Turnay should be redeliuered to the English; neither was this forgotten, that the Cardinal should receiue a thousand markes yearly for the renewences of the said Bishopricke, and vpon these Covenants were hostages for further assurance deliuered.

(30) But peace much affected among Christian Princes, and daily increased of most potent Estates, was very much feared would worke alteration in the authority, abuse, and great riches of the Clergy, if Kings might haue leasure to looke into their own charges at home. To busie their heads therefore from all suspicion or ialousies, Pope Leo the tenth deuised the means, by a preparation intended for the holy lands warres; a subiect in few very religious, howsoever the former successes had proued it not pleasing to God, when to recover the City once holy, and to build vp that which Christ by prophesie had cast downe, as much Christian blood was spilt to raise those ruinous walls, as there was mortar laid to sauen the stones of their first building.

(31) To this end therefore three Legates were sent from the holy See of Rome, one into France, another into Germany, and Cardinal Campus into England, with whom was ioyned Wolsey in Commission, who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow Cardinal, sent store of red cloth vnto Calles, to make them meet followers of so great a Lord; and Campus landed at Douer, Wolsey caused the Townes thorough which he should passe, to receive him with procession: and so being brought by the Gentility of Wolsey made his Chancellour of England.

Kent vnto Black-heath neere vnto Greenwich, was there mette and receiued by the Duke of Norfolk, many Knights, but many more Prelates, where in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, he shifted himselfe into his Cardinall Robes, which was edged about with most rich Ermine, and thence rode to London, in more pompe and estate then Christ did to Ierusalem when Hofanna was sung.

(32) Eight Mules hee had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Wolfeies eyes, therefore twelue more hee sent him to furnish his Pageants through the streets of London, these either wanton, or alhamed to bee wondered at, plaied the skittish lades indeed: For in Cheape-side, as this Triumph fourth passed, these beautes by breaking their Collers and elcaping their Leaders, cast their Carriages and Coffers vpon the cold ground; whose lids flying open laid most of their riches to the sight of the people. For, from some of them fell olde Breaches, Bootes and broken shoes, from others torne stockings tortered ragges, olde Iron and horse shoes, and for fainting by the way therein was belowed, and now cast abroad, broken meate, many bones, roasted egges, and cruets of bread, ywisle worth the keeping: this Shipwrack made vpon the Shelves of Cheape-side, no need it was to bid the mulcters to bestirre them, who like good thrifty mariners faued from spoile as much as they could, and trussing vp their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinall, who (good man) was logging on afore with his Crosses, pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, vnto Pauls Church, where hee was mette with many mitred Bishops, and attended vpon to Bath place, where we will leaue him, and returne to the place where wee left.

(33) The vnity agreed vpon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that ende great preparation made as well of the one as of the other. But in the heate of this businesse, King Henry had word that Charles, his Queenes Nephew, and new made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly hee did, accompanied with the Queene of Arragon, and a most Royall Train, and was as Roiallie entertained by King Henry: the cause of his coming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although, this Emperour were young, and but newly established, yet was hee wife and well forefawe the hurt that this amity with France, would bring him, and therefore came in person of purpose to disswade the Kings mind and to stay his entrance with the French if he could, but finding Henry so forward in those proceeds, hee baited his hooks with golden gifts to the Cardinall, and wanne him wholly to his deuotion.

(34) King Henry passing the Seas vnto Callis, met with King Frances at a place appointed, and for that purpose newly built betwixt the Townes of Guisnes, and Arde: where to describe the lusts, Banquets, and Maskes were to fill vp (with Hall, Grafton and Holinshed) whole sides of excessive great Cost. At Callis also the same time the Emperour, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Sawoy landed, whither King Henry and his Queene repaired, to the no little grudge of the French King, though he kept it to himselfe, and contented vnto the ancient league tripartite betwixt these three Monarches, which done the Kings returned into their owne Realmes.

(35) Displeasures shortly arising betwixt the Emperour and the French King, King Henry assaied to bring the to peace, but that failing, fell himselfe from the French, imputing the fault vnto Frances for suborning the Scots against him, and King Frances againe laid all the blame in the Cardinall, accusing him of dissimulation, abhorred practises and what not: but wherefoeuer lay the defect, the Duke of Albany was sent into Scotland, the French followed a Spanish ship fraught with the goods of English Merchants vnto Margate, and tooke her euen in the Kings streams, in both which King Frances excusing himselfe with ignorance, alleaged no breach of truce broken by him.

(36) Then was it thought best by the Cardinals aduice to repay like with like, and therefore counselled his King, to reare Charles Duke of Burbon against France and to perswade him to inuade the very heart thereof, encouraging him with sufficient pay, and making him his Champion general of the Field; whilest the Emperour likewise held him play against Milan. And to that end was sent in way of loane to the Emperour a great summe of money, and forreine Princes solicited to take armes against France, for effecting which King Henry sent his Ambassadors to the States of Venice and Swislers with these instructions as followeth.

(37) That whereas in a treatie of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperour, King Henry, and Frances the French King, that if any Controversies should arise betwixt any two, the Prince not inuading should giue aide and assistance against the invader: but now the Emperour being inuaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Navarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la Marche, and others by his procurement, and our King (said they) being often called vpon by the Emperour, hath often entreated the French King to successe, but hath nothing obtained besides faire words and detraction of promises. Complaining likewise that in the intercourse of these busineses, the French King contrary to his Oath had sent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the young Kings death or deposition, he being the next in blood to succeed, and to the dishonour of the Queene mother, had caused a separation betwixt her and her lawfull husband the Earle of Angus. That the French King had detained the payment compounded for the deliury of Turnay, and kept backe the dowry of his sister Queene Dowager of France, that hee had entertained the rebellious Subjects of King Henry, and spoiled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was vnremembered the danger that the Venetians stood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Seignories of Teans, and Milan were lost from the Empire. These therefore seemed faire proiects vnto King Henry for him to warre against France, and to that end, a generall Muster by Commission was taken of all able men from fixteene yeeres and upward, of euery Hamlet, Village, Burrough, Citie, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which seemed to many another Domesday Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre against France.

(38) In this great and hasty preparation, Charles the Emperour, as he passed toward Spaine, landed at Douer, where King Henrie mette him, and in great estate brought him to London, which was so prepared with Ornaments and Pageants, as if it had been the Kings Coronation, and in the Blacke-friers the Emperour was lodged in a most Princely Palace new built by the King; then was hee feasted at Windsor, where hee ate in his state, in his Mantle and Garter, and by receiving the Sacrament these two Potent Monarches took their Corporal Oathes to obserue the Couenants concluded betwixt them: whereof one was, that the Emperour Charles agreed to stay for, and take to wife the young Princeesse Lady Marie, King Henrie then onely daughter, and in such golden bands of loue, Charles and Henrie, seemed to be linked, as in London this sentence was set vp in the Guild-hall ouer the doore of the Counsell Chamber, where it still remaineth.

is no maruell; for Charles chosen Emperour, was scarcely confirmed, but to purchase the Popes fauor, he directed forth a solemne Writ of Out-lawry against Martin Luther, who then had giuen a great blow to the Papall Crowne. And King Henry likewise was renowned in Rome, for writing a booke against the said Luther: vnderdropping the tottering or downe-cast countenance of the Popes pardons; which Luther shrewdly had shaken; the Pope therefore to shew himselfe a kind father vnto those his sonnes, gaue them these Titles; which in truth were none other, then the same which they sware vnto, when the Crownes of their Empire were first set vpon their heads. But with what acceptance his Holinesse receiued King Henries booke, his owne Oration tolemlie made at the deliury thereof vnto M. John Clarke the prefenter and Kings Ambassador, in his Consistory, and in presence of his Cardinals sufficiently doth shew, the translation whereof we haue inserted as we finde it in the Originall itselfe.

"Wee doe receiue this booke with all alacritie; it is indeede such as there could not bee any thing sent vs, and our venerable brethren, more acceptable then it is. For the King himselfe, a most mighty, most prudent, and most truly Christian Prince, we know not whether wee may more prayse or admire, being the first that by warre with happy successe hath subdued the enemies of the Church of Christ, that seeke to rend Christs coat, and at last overcoming the enemies, hath restored peace to the Church of God, and to this holy See. But now against to soule a Monster, both to vnderstand, to be able, and willing to write this booke, he hath shewed himselfe no more admirable to the whole world for his elegant style, then for his wit. We humbly giue thanks to our Creator for giuing such a Prince to defend his Church, and this holy See, desiring the same God to grant to this his King a happy life, and all his desires, and after this life in his heavenly Kingdome, to keepe for him an euerglasting Crowne. And we so farre as we are able to entreat of God, will neuer bee wanting to the said most wise King in the faculties granted to vs of God.

(40) To manifest which his readinesse, himselfe among his Cardinals decreed an augmentation vnto King Henries royall Stile to bee annexed vnto his others; confirming the same by his Bull, which that it perih not by the deuouring teeth of Time, wee haue here published from the originall Parchment, and leadeen scale it selfe, as followeth.

(41) Leo Episcopus seruus seruorum Dei, &c. Leo Bishop seruant of the seruants of God; to our most dearely beloued Sonne in Christ, Henry King of England defender of the Faith, health and Apostolical Benediction. Wee by diuine permission, the chiefe ouersee for the government of the vniuersall Church, though vn sufficient for so great a worke, doe poure forth the cogitations of our heart, that the Catholike faith without which no man can attaine to saluation, may receiue continuall increase, and that those good lawes and constitutions decreed by the wisdom and learning of such as are in authority, especially the faithfull in Christ, for restraining the attempts of all that labour to oppress the same, or by wicked lyes & fictions seeke to pervert and obscure it, may prosper with perpetuall increase, doe bestow our paines and utmost endeuour in our office and Ministry. And like as the Romane Bishops our Predecessors, were wont to shew especiall fauour to Catholike Princes (according as the quality of matters and times required) especially to them that in troublesome times, when the madnesse and perfidious dealing of Schismatikes and heretikes most of all abound, did abide constant and vnmoueable, not onely in soundnesse of faith and pure deuotion to the holy Romane Church, but also as the most legitimate Towner and valiant Champions of the same, opposed themselves both with mind and body against the furious madnes of Schismatikes and heretikes: so likewise also doe wee desire to extoll your Maiesty with worthy and immortal praies, for your high and immortal deuits and labours towards vs, and this holy See, wherein by Gods permission wee sit, to grant vnto it those things for which it ought to watch, and drine away the vices from the Lords flocke, and to cut off with the material sword rotten members, which infect the mysticall body of Christ; and to confirme the hearts of the faithfull in soundnesse of belief. Now where of late our beloued Sonne John Clarke your Maiesties Orator with vs, being in our Consistory before our venerable brethren of the holy Romane Church, the Cardinals and many other Prelates of the same, exhibited a booke vnto vs to bee examined and allowed of vs, which booke your Maiesties selfe (who doth all things with diligence and nothing amisse) enflamed with charity and zeale to the Catholike faith, and with ardent deuotion towards vs and this holy See, hath composed, as a most worthy and soueraine Antidote against the errors of diuers heretikes, often condemned by this holy See, and of late stirred up and brought in by Martin Luther: And your said Orator hath also largely declared vnto vs, that your Maiesty is ready, and purposeth, like as you haue confuted the notorious errors of the said Martin, by true reason and inuincible authorities of sacred Scripture, and ancient fathers, so you will punish to the uttermost of your power, all those of your whole Kingdome, that shall presume to follow, or defend them: and we haue diligently and exactly perused and viewed the admirable doctrine of your said booke, watered with the dew of heavenly Grace, and doe heartily thanke Almighty God, from whom euery good and perfect gift doth come, who hath vouchsafed to inspire your Noble mind, inclined to euery good thing, and to endue you with so great Grace from heauen, as to write those things, whereby you are able to defend his holy faith, against such a new Innouator of damned errors, and also incite by your example all other Christian Kings and Princes, to be willing to fauour and further with all their best aides the Orthodoxall faith, and Evangelicall truth, whensoever it bee brought into danger or doubt. And wee thinke it also meete, that they who haue undertaken such godly labours for the defence of the faith of Christ, should haue all prayse and honour of vs; and wee are desirous, that not onely the things themselves which your Maiesty hath written, being both of most sound doctrine, and no lesse eloquence, should bee extolled and magnified with condigne commendations, and allowed and confirmed by our authority; but also that your Maiesty should bee graced with such an honour, and such a Title, as that both for our time and euery hereafter all men might perceiue how gratefull and acceptable this gift of your Maiesties hath bene vnto vs, especially offered vnto vs now at this time. Wee, who be the true successors of Peter, whom Christ at his ascension into heauen left his Vicar on earth, and to whom hee committed the care of his flocke: Wee say, who sit in this holy seate, from which all dignities and titles do flow, vpon mature deliberation had with our said brethren about these things, haue by the generall agreement, and consent of them decreed, to bestow vpon your Maiesty this title, namely, THE DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And accordingly by these Presents doe insitle you with such a title, commanding all faithfull Christians, that they name your Maiesty with this Title, and when they write to you, that after the Word KING, they adioine DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And truly wee diligently considering and weighing your singular merits, were not able to bethinke vs of a name more worthy and conuenient for your Maiesty, then the excellency and dignity of this Title, which so often as you shall heare and reade. So often you may call to mind this your singular vertue and great desert, nor may you by this Title puffe up your self in pride, but according to your wonted prudence become more humble, and bee more valiant and constant in the faith of Christ, and in deuotion to this holy See, by which you haue bene exalted, reioicing in the Lord the giuer of all good things, leauing this as a perpetuall and immortal monument of your glory to your children, shewing them the way vnto the like, that if they shall desire to be graced

Kent vnto Black-heath neere vnto Greenwich, was there mette and receiued by the Duke of Norfolk, many Knights, but many more Prelates, where in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, he shifted himselfe into his Cardinall Robes, which was edged about with most rich Ermine, and thence rode to London, in more pompe and estate then Christ did to Ierusalem when Hofanna was sung.

(32) Eight Mules hee had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Wolfeis eyes, therefore twelue more hee sent him to furnish his Pageants through the streets of London, these either wanton, or ashamed to bee wondrous at, plaid the skittish lades indeed: For in Cheape-side, as this Triumph fourth passed, these beasts by breaking their Collers and eia-ping their Leaders, cast their Carriages and Coffers vpon the cold ground; whose lids flying open laid most of their riches to the sight of the people. For, from some of them fell olde Breaches, Bootes and broken shooes, from others torne stockings tottered ragges, olde Iron and horse shooes, and for fainting by the way therein was bestowed, and now cast abroad, broken meate, many bones, roasted egges, and crufts of bread, ywisfe worth the keeping: this Shipwrack made vpon the Shelves of Cheape-side, no need it was to bid the muliters to bestirre them, who like good thrifty mariners saued from spoile as much as they could, and trussing vp their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinal, who (good man) was iogging on afore with his Crofles, Pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, vnto Pauls Church, where hee was mette with many mitred Bishops, and attended vpon to Bath place, where we will leaue him, and returne to the place where wee left.

(33) The vnity agreed vpon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that ende great preparation made as well of the one as of the other. But in the heate of this businesse, King Henry had word that Charles, his Queenes Nephew, and new made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly hee did, accompanied with the Queene of Arragon, and a most Royall Train, and was as Roiallie entertained by King Henry: the cause of his comming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although, this Emperour were young, and but newly established; yet was hee wife and well forefawe the hurt that this amity with France, would bring him, and therefore came in perfon of purpose to disswade the Kings mind and to stay his entrance with the French if he could, but finding Henry fo forward in those proceeds, hee baited his hooks with golden gifts to the Cardinall, and wanne him wholly to his deuotion.

(34) King Henry passing the Seas vnto Callis, met with King Frances at a place appointed, and for that purpose newly built betwixt the Townes of Guisnes, and Arde: whereto describe the Iusts, Banquets, and Maskes were to fill vp (with Hall, Grafton and Holinshed) whole sides of excefliue great Cost. At Callis also the same time the Emperour, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Sawoy landed, whither King Henry and his Queene repaired, to the no little grudge of the French King, though he kept it to himselfe, and consented vnto the ancient league triperite betwixt these three Monarches, which done the Kings returned into their owne Realmes.

(35) Displeasures shortly arising betwixt the Emperour and the French King, King Henry assaied to bring the to peace, but that failing, fell himselfe from the French, imputing the fault vnto Frances for suborning the Scots against him, and King Frances againe laid all the blame in the Cardinall, accusing him of dissimulation, abhorred practices and what not: but wherefoer lay the defect, the Duke of Albany was sent into Scotland; the French followed a Spanish ship fraught with the goods of English Merchants vnto Margate, and tooke her cuen in the Kings streams, in both which King Frances excusing himselfe with ignorance, alleged no breach of truce broken by him.

(36) Then was it thought best by the Cardinals aduice to repay like with like, and therefore counselled his King, to reare Charles Duke of Burbon against France, and to perswade him to invade the very heart thereof, incouraging him with sufficient pay, and making him his Champion general of the Field; whilst the Emperour likewise held him play against Milan. And to that end was sent in way of loane to the Emperour a great summe of money, and forreine Princes solicited to take armes against France, for effecting which, King Henry sent his Ambassadors to the States of Venice and Switzers with these instructions as followeth.

(37) That whereas in a treatie of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperour, King Henry, and Frances the French King, that if any Controuersies should arise betwixt any two, the Prince not invading should giue aide and assistance against the invader: but now the Emperour being invaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Navarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la Mare, and others by his procurement, and our king (said they) being often called vpon by the Emperour, hath often entreated the French King to succaile, but hath nothing obtained besides faire words and detraction of promises. Complaining likewise that in the intercoure of these busineses, the French King contrary to his Oath had sent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the young Kings death or depofition, he being the next in blood to succeed, and to the dishonour of the Queene mother, had caused a separation betwixt her and her lawfull husband the Earle of Angus. That the French King had detained the payment compounded for the deliuey of Turnay, and kept backe the dowry of his sister, Queene Dowager of France, that hee had entertained rebellious Subjects of King Henry, and spoiled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was vnremembered the danger that the Venetians stood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Seigniories of Ieans, and Millane were lost from the Empire. These therefore seemed faire proiects vnto King Henry for him to warre against France, and to that end, a generall Muster by Commission was taken of able men from sixteen yeers and vpward, of euery Hamlet, Village, Burrough, Citie, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which seemed to many another Domefday Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre against France.

(38) In this great and hasty preparation, Charles the Emperour, as hee passed toward Spaine, landed at Dover, where King Henric mette him, and in great estate brought him to London; which was so prepared with Ornaments and Pageants, as if it had been the Kings Coronation, and in the Blacke-frices the Emperour was lodged in a most Princely Palace new built by the King; then was hee seated at Windsor, where hee sat in his state, in his Mantle and Garter, and by receiving the Sacrament these two Potent Monarches tooketheir Corporal Oathes to obferue the Couenants concluded betwixt them: whereof one was, that the Emperour Charles agreed to stay for, and take to wife the young Princesse Lady Marie, King Henric then onely daughter; and in such golden bands of loue, Charles and Henric, seemed to be linked, as in London this sentence was set vp in the Guild-hall ouer the doore of the Counsell Chamber, where it still remaineth.

(42) But from these Priestly and Papall gratulations, let vs returne to leade our Story vnto temporall Princes affaires. How the Emperour Charles had bene entertained in King Henries Court, wee haue said, and now ready to depart with many rich gifts, hee repaired to Southampton, where hee tooke his shippes for Spaine, whose conductor through the narrow Seas was Thomas Earle of Surrey, Lord high Admirall of England, who hauing waited him vnto Biscay with a gallant crew of Gentlemen, made thence saile into France, and in Britaine besieged & wonne the strong Towne Morleis, and with the Garrison Souldiers of the Marches dayly bickered with the heart-burning French, and dayly went away with the better, but new stirres areared by the Scots, the Lord Admirall was recalled, and came to the Court, where hee declared to his Highnesse what hee had done in Britaine.

(43) King Henries businesse thus on foot in France, hee thought to pursue it with all the advantage hee could, and first to find the Scots play, who were euer fast friends to the French, hee sent the Lords Rosse and Dacres to secure the North-borders, appointing for his Lieutenant in those partes the Earle of Shrewsbury, and sent the Lord Admirall of England againe into France, who diuided his Army into three Battalions, the first wherof, was led by Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater; the Middle, the Earle conducted himselfe, with the assistance of his brother Lord Edmund Howard, and the Rereward was gouerned by Sir William Sands, and Sir Richard Wingfield both of them Knights of the Order, the Colonell of the horse was Sir Eynard Guilford.

(44) Thefein September entred into the French Pale, and made toward the Castell of Heding, vnto whom joined the Burgundians, sent from the Lady Margaret then Regent of Flanders, vnder whose colours serued many Spaniards; Surrey thus set forward, burned all things where he came, demolishing the Castles and Townes of Sellis, Brumbridge, Senckerk, Botingham, Mansier, Nerbins, Dauerne, Cumberge and Fringes the Townes and Churches fortified of Boards, Vaus, and Saint Mary de Bois: but laying his siege against Heding was forced for want of battering peeces, to breake vp againe and depart: In whose returne hee burnt the Townes and Castles of Dorlens and Darrier, and comming to Calles, set saile for England with a wonderfull great Booty.

(45) In this while the Duke of Albanie being made Gouverneur of Scotland with an Armie of fourescore thousand drew vnto the Borders, whence hee sent into France for six thousand Almaines, which were promised, and daily expected though in vain, for none came at all. The Earle of Shrewsbury with eight and twenty thousand strong, drew likewise towards the Borders, but the Scots lying still, without further inuasion, an abstinenace from warre was betwixt them concluded, which how the English kept, the sequell well shewed for the King ordaining Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the whole Marches, hee either refrained to impeach his honor by breach of truce, or else loth to be disquieted of his host rest, made meane to the King, to bee discharged of the office, which was forthwith bestowed (and thankfully accepted) vpon Thomas Earle of Surrey lately returned out of France, who deliuered the charge of the East & Middle Marches vnto the Lord Marquess Dorset, and the West vnto the Lord Dacres, who presently made a road into Scotland, and returned with booty.

(46) France and Scotland thus assailed at once, a Parliament was assembled at Blakes-Fryers in London, wherein Cardinall Wolsey moued, and with much adoe obtained, the halfe of the ycerely reuenues of all spirituall liuings, to bee paid for five yeeres continuance, and the tenth part of all temporall substance to maintain this great charge of the King, for the exact collection wherof the Cardinall was so forward, as he moued, and would haue had every man sworn for his wealth, had not the Citizens of London vterly refused it, which when the King heard of, hee was highly displeased with Wolsey, and said, that ere long hee would looke to chinges himselfe without any Substitute.

(47) Among other great esteeme of this magnanimous Monarch, it was not the least that the Emperour in person had twice come into England to visite him, and euen at this time Christian King of Denmarke with his Queene, vnto whom Queene Katherine was Aunt, landed at Dover, and was honourably brought vnto London, where they were royally feasted, and after two and twenty dayes intertainment, receiuing great gifts of the King and Queene, they returned to Flanders, where hee remained as a banished man out of his owne Country.

(48) King Henry purposing his further pursuits, sent a great Army into France, vnder the leading of the Duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon, attended vpon by the Lords Montacute, Herbert, Ferrers, Marneis, Sands, Barkley and Powis, nineteen Knights, six hundred demi-lances, two hundred Archers horsed, three thousand more of them on foot, five thousand Bill-men, and seauenteene hundred Garrison Souldiers, with onethousand five hundred labourers and Pioners. These departing Calles, first besieged, and won Bell-Castell, and then entering Picardy, there ioyned vnto him three thousand foot, and five hundred horse of Almans and Spaniards; with these hee assailed, and tooke the Castell of Bounegard, wherein hee put Cardinal, wanne Braye, Roie, Libome, Montedier and Boghan: but the winter come on, & the weather extrem in wets and frosts, besides other wants euer following the Winters Warriors, the Duke was enforced to breake vppe Campe; and from Calles came safely to the Court, where, vnto King Henry hee was very welcome, but much more vnto the French Queen his wife.

(49) The Scottish (as we haue said) keeping the Borders, and the English making inroades, where the places were weakest, the stirres betwixt them began daily to increase. In so much as the Duke of Albanie sent a Herald vnto the Earle of Surrey the Kings Lieutenant of the North, to offer him Battell, promising on his honour if hee tooke him Prisoner, his ranfome should be easie, and his person courteously dealt with; who returned as rough an answer, as the offer was kinde, saying hee would abide Battell if hee durst giue it, and if the Duke were taken either by him or his, hee would strike off his head and send it for a present to his Maister the King of England. So nettled was the Earle against the French, that had raised Albany thus against England, and King Henry (as Bishop Lely reporteth) tooke from the Scots inhabiting England all their goods, sending them into their Country on foote, with white Crosses sewed vpon their vppermost Garments by which they were knowne and suffered to passe. The Scots vpon the Earles answer were wonderfully enraged, and seeking the reuenge, some of them passed ouer the water, and horly besieged the Castell of Warke, which the Englishmen as valiantly defended, and in their resistance slew almost three hundred of their French Souldiers, the Scots retrying againe to their Campe.

(50) The Regent not able to digest the Earles pill, commanded his Armie to march forward into the English Marches, wherewith the common Souldiers much reioiced, but the wiser of the Nobility vrged this in their Counsell, that hauing displaced in warlike manner, their Banners vpon the Verge of the Borders, and defended their Country from the spoile, they law no great reason further to proceed, no necessity or cause mouing, besides the Quarrell of the French: and therupon repaying to the Regent, they demanded why they should proceed further, alleging that at his commandement (yea and that willingly) they had so farre passed, for the defence of their Country, which was sufficient without further inuasion of the others, the time so conuenient in the nonage of their young King, and the action so dangerous, wherein all the Peeres of Scotland were assembled, to attend and suffer the doubtfull issue of warre, which euer is vncertaine, and more losse in one battell many times suffered, then gaine can be gotten in manie: whereof too too lamentable experience (said they) we haue had by King James, that by peace and life, brought Scotland to her best, but by his warre and death almost to the worst, therefore would we know (said the Nobilitie) whether this your intent stands with the weale of the King and vs, or else is prosecuted in the cause of your selfe and the French.

(51) The Duke making some pause, lastly replied and said, "This question would haue bene demanded ere now: for well you know, that from Scotland I beare my name, honour and lineage, haue passed the Seas from the noble Realme of France, for the loue of my Country, to set you in amity which were at dissention, by whose diuision your Realm lay prostrate to destruction and Conquest, for whose aid you see I haue procured the French to ioine with you against the English. And gaine, when these warres were determined by Parliament, you made me your Capitaine, authorizing me to inuade England with Banner displayed, then was no question or demand of the cause; neither haue I entered the quarrell without your agreement; and therefore may I iustifie my present doings, and yet to me it seemeth there is cause sufficient, with fire, sword and blood, to enter England, if we be not too forgetfull, and will submit our selues to dishonour and reproach: for we all know that the Realme of Scotland is ours by inheritance, and that portion of the world allowed to our Nation to enioy; how can we warre better, then to maintaine our naturall inheritance, against which the English giue daily attempts, with manslaughter, murders, thefts and spoiles: haue we not then (thinke you) iust cause to make warre? The defence of a kingdom, is the office of a King, the honour of the Noble, the seruice of the Souldier, and the duty of a naturall Subject. But be it as you will, yet hauing so puissant an armie to aide our owne reproach, and encouragement of the Enemy, let vs campe here still on the Borders till we "see what the English men intend.

(52) But Margaret Queene of Scots soliciting her brother for a peace, these stirres brake vp for a time, as those in France did shortly after, by the working wit of Cardinall Wolsey, who in the State affaires was euer one, which made him the more emulated, and the grievances of the commons euer cast vpon him; in so much that it was commonly spoken hee was the causer of the heauy imposition granted to maintaine the kings warres, which was so importable to the poorer sort of Subjects, as the payment thereof was vterly denied to the appointed Collectors, with weepings, Curfings, and great acclamations, yea and almost grew to an open rebellion: for Kent denied it to the Lord Cobham; Essex refused to commune with the commissioners; Huntingtonshire resisted, and would not heare them; London would be taxed by none but their Aldermen; and Suffolke rose vp in Armes, making pouerty their Capitaine. Of these stirres when King Henry heard, hee had great indignation, blaming the Counsellors, and wrote his letters vnto every Contry, that no such demands should be paid: and the Cardinall to curry fauours with the Commons gaue it forth sooth, that at his intercession the Offenders were pardoned, and the money remitted.

(53) And now more to shew his owne power, then any great cause, hee beganne to alienate the heart of King Henry against his Nephew the Emperour, and caused him to withhold pay from the Duke of Burbon his late made General: which was the cause of the French Kings Captiuitie. For Burbon incamped within the Towne of Paula, and besieged by the French in most warlike manner, was for want of his said pay so desperate of life, that hee attempted a most dangerous escape. In the dead of the night he set a part of his Company to assaile the enemy on that side of the Towne which was left strong, himselfe issuing secretly out of a Posterne on the contrary side: The watch but slender and the Souldiers asleepe, a great terror arose, in which the besieger turned their Ordinance to the place of the crie, when as suddenly Burbon was at their backs, and winning their Ordinance discharged them against their owners, slew their souldiers, cut downe their Tents, and by the Vice-roy of Naples was the French King taken prisoner in the Field.

(54) This fortunate successe made these Almaines more bolde, who presently with the Imperiall Ensignes marched towards Florence, and thence to Rome, vnto whose walles in one day they gaue three assaults, in the last wherof Charles Duke of Burbon their General was slaine; notwithstanding the City was taken and sacked; Pope Clement in the meane while, to make all sure as he thought, thundered out his Curfes, and with Bell, Booke and Candle, committed those Lutherans to Hell, who neuertheless broke down that windy Bulwarke, and with great laughter forced him with twelue three Cardinals, into the Castell of Saint Angelo, where they kept them besieged from the six of May, vnto the tenth of December: in which time, in mocking of the Pope the Souldiers to make solace, would apparell one in Pontificall attire, who sometime should beseech them, and sometime accurse them, and riding on Horse-backe with a Whore set behind him should so passe the streets, that the Pope and Cardinals might see him. These contumelies and Papall Captiuities were grievously taken by many Christian Princes, inso much that Caesar in Spaine forbade all Enterludes to be plaid, and Pagantes prepared for ioy of the birth of his sonne, Prince Phillip, to be pulled downe. In France by the Court of Parliament the Duke of Burbon was condemned of Treason, his name and memoriall accursed, his Armes pulled downe, and his Lands and goods confiscated; neither would King Henrie of England answer the Emperours letters, wherein hee excused himselfe from hauing any hand in the action.

Counsell Table
against Kildare.

(55) Whilest these things were in working at Rome, arose great troubles in Ireland, the Kernes calling off all obedience, and killing the Kings subjects where they found them: against whom Thomas Howard, Earle of Surry, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom, made forth his power, and followed them himselfe with such danger of life, that the valor of his Helmet was shot off, as hee pursued the enemy through the desert woods: but these Rebels cut off by his high valour, and warres proclaimed at one time against Scotland and France, the Lord Lieutenant was recalled into England; and Piers Butler Earle of Ossory made Deputie of Ireland in his stead; betwixt whom, and Gerald Fitz-Gerald, Earle of Kildare, whose sister hee had married, arose no little strife and debate, which grew to that height as King Henry sent Commissioners to trie and examine the differences, which was so cleared on Kildares behalfe, that Ossory was discharged of his Office, and the Lord Fitz-Gerald (whose deputy in his place, whereat Cardinal Wolsey (whose hand chiefly steered all states affaires, a deadly enemy to the Earle of Kildare) was highly offended, and to undermine the foundations of this his new Government, gave care unto Ossory, who accused the new deputie of many mild manners, among which these were the principall; that he winked at Desmonds escape whom he should have attached by order from the King: that he grew over familiar with the native Irish; and that he put to death the Kings best subjects: for these the Lord Deputie was commanded into England, in whose absence Ossory his enemy was againe chosen Lord Deputie by the Kings Counsell, but himselfe none of the wisest for politike Government, was altogether therein ruled by his wife, and shee made it no courtlesse to abuse her husbands honour against her natural brothers folly: who now in England must answer his demeanour before the Lords of the Counsell, and to their Table was hee brought, where the Cardinal Lord Chaucellor made his faults nothing lesse, and thus addressed himselfe against the Earle of Kildare.

(56) "I wor well (my Lord) that I am not the meekest at this boord to charge you with these treasons, because it hath pleased some of your Pew-fellows to report, that I am a professed enemy to all Nobilitie, and namely to the Giraldines: but seeing every shrewd boy can say as much when he is controuled, and these points so weighty, that they should not be diflembed of vs; and so apparent, that they cannot be denied of you: I must have leave (notwithstanding your stale slander) to be the mouth of these honourable Lords at this present, and to trump your treasons in your way, howsoever you take me. First you remember, how the lewde Earle of Desmond your kinsman (who passeth not whom he serveth might he change his Master) sent his Confederates with letters of credence unto Francis the French King: and hauing but cold comfort there, went to Charles the Emperour proffering the helpe of Munster, and Connaught, towards the Conquest of Ireland, if either of them would helpe to win it from our King. How many letters, what precepts, what messages, what threats, haue bene sent you to apprehend him and yet not done? Why so? Forsooth I could not catch him! Nay, say Earle, forsooth you would not watch him: If hee bee iustly suspected, why are you partiall in so great a charge? If not, why are you fearefull to haue him tried? Yea, for it will bee sworne and deposed to your face, that for feare of meeting him, you haue winked wilfully, thunned his sight, altered your course, warned your friends, stopped both eares and eyes, against his detectors, and whensoever you took vpon you to hunt him out, then was he sure afore hand to be out of your walke. Surely, this iugling and false play, little became either an honest man called to such honour, or a Noble man put in so great trust:

"had you lost but a Cow or a Horfe of your own, two hundred of your retainers would haue come at your Whistle to rescue the prey from the uttermost edge of ysser: all the Irish in Ireland must haue giuen you the way. But in pursuing to needfull a matter as this was; mercifull God, how nice, how dangerous, how wayward haue you bene? One while hee is from home, and another while hee keepeth home, sometimes fled, sometimes in the Borders, where you dare not venture. Ywis, my Lord, there bee shrewd bugges in the borders, for the Earle of Kildare to feare; the Earle, nay the King of Kildare: for when you are disposed, you raigne more like then rule in the land: where you are pleased the Irish for standeth for a iust Subject: hearts and hands, liues and lands are all at your courtlesse: who fawneeth not thereon, cannot rest within your smel, and your smell so rancke, that you tracke them out at pleasure. Whilest the Cardinall was speaking, the Earle chafed and changed colour & at last brake out, and interrupted him thus.

(57) "My Lord Chaucellor I beseech you pardon me, I am frownted, and you I percieue intend a long tale: if you proceed in this order, half my purgation will be lost for lack of carriage: I haue no Schoole trickes, nor art of memory: except you heare me while I remember your words, your second proceffe will hammer out the former. The Lords assaile, who for the most part tenderly loved Kildare, and knew the Cardinall his manner of taunts so ready being inured therewith many yeeres together, humble besought his grace to charge him directlie with particulars, and to dwell in some one matter vntill it were examined thoroughly.

(58) That granted: It is good reason (quoth the Earle) that your Grace beare the mouth of this boord: but my Lord, those mouthes that put these things into your mouth, are very wide mouthes: such indeed as haue gaped long for my wracke: and now at length for want of better lustre, are faine to fill their mouths with smoake: what my Cousen Desmond hath compassed, as I know not, I beslew his naked heart for holding out so long. If he can be taken by mine agents that presently wait for him, then haue mine aduersaries bewraied their malice: and this heape of heinous wordes shall resemble a scarre-Crow, or a man of straw that seemeth at a bluth to carry some proportion, but when it is felt and prized, discovereth a vanity: ifeering onely to feare Crows: and I verily trust your honours shall see the prooffe by the thing itselfe, within these few daies. But goe to: suppose he neuer be had? What is Kildare to blame for it more then my good brother of Ossory, who, notwithstanding his high promises, hauing also the Kings power, is yet content to bring him in at least? Cannot the Earle of Desmond shift but I must be of Counsell? Cannot hee hide him except I wink? If he be close am I his mate? If he be fringed am I a traitor? This is a doubtie kind of accusation which they vrge against me, wherein they are stabelled and mired at my first deniall. You would not see him (say they): who made them so familiar with mine eie-sight? Or when was the Earle within my view? Or who stood by when I let him slip? Or where are the tokens of my willfull hudwinke? But you sent him word to beware of you: who was the messenger? Where are the letters? Conuince my negatues, see how loose this idle gear hangeth together. Desmond is not taken: well, you are in fault: why? Because you are who proueth it? No body: What Coniectures? So it seemeth: To whom? To your enemies. Who told it them? They will swear it. What other ground? None: Will they swear it my Lord? why then of like they know it, either they haue mine hand to shew, or can bring forth the messenger, or were present at a Conference, or pri-

"uic to Desmond, or some body bewraied it to them, or they themselves were my Carriers or vicegerents therein: which of these parts will they choofe, for I know them too well: To reckon my selfe conuict by their bare wordes, or headlesse sayings, or franckie oathes, were but meere mockerie. My letters were soone read, were any such writing extant, my seruants, and friends are ready to be sited: of my Cousen of Desmond they may lie loudly, since no man here can well contrary them. Touching my selfe I neuer noted in them much wit, or so fast faith, that I would haue gaged on their silence the life of a good hound, much lesse mine owne: I doubt not, may it please your honours to appose them, how they came to the knowledge of those matters which they are so ready to depose: but you shall find their tongues chained to another mans trencher, and as it were Knights of the Post, suborned to say, I swore and swore the vttermost they can, as those that passe not what they say, nor with what face they say it, so they say no truth: but on the other side, it grieueth mee, that your good Grace, whom I take to bee wise and sharpe, and who of your blessed disposition wilth me well, should bee so farr gone in crediting these corrupt Informers that abuse the ignorance of your state and Country to my peril.
Little know you (my Lord) how necessary it is, not onely for the Governour, but also for euery Nobleman in Ireland, to hamper the vnciuill neighbourhood at discretion, wherein if they waited for proceffe of law, & had not those liues and lands you speak of within their reach, they might hap-loose their own liues & lands without law. You hear of a case, as it were in a dream, & feele not the smart that vexeth vs. In England there is not a mean Subject that dare extend his hand to filip a Peere of a realm: In Ireland except the Lord haue cunning to his strength, and strength to faue his Crowne, and sufficient authority to take theues and varlets when they stir, hee shall find them swarme so fast that it will bee too late to call for iustice. If you will haue our seruice take effect, you must not reueis alwayes to these iudiciall proceedings wherewith your Realme (thanked be God) is inured.
Touching my kingdom, I know not what your Lordshippe should mean thereby: If your Grace imagine that a Kingdom consisteth in seruing God, in obeying the Prince, in gouerning with loue the common wealth, in supporting subjects, in suppressing rebels, in executing iustice, in bride-ling blind affections, I would bee willing to bee inued with so vertuous and roial a name: but if therefore you term me a King, in that you are persuaded that I repine at the gouernment of my loueraign, or wink at malefactors, or oppress ciuill li-uers: I verily disclaime that odious term, marcelling greatly that one of your Graces profound wisdom would seeme to appropriate so sacred a name to so wicked a thing: but howsoever it bee (my Lord) I would you and I had changed Kingdomes, but for one month. I would trust to gather vppe more crummes in that space, then twice the reue-nues of my poore Earldome: but you are well and warme, and so hold you, and vpbraide not mee with such an odious terme. I flumber in a hard Cabine, when you sleepe in a soft bedde of Downe: I serue vnder the Kings Cope of heauen, when you are serued vnder a Canopie: I drinke water out of my skull when you drinke wine out of golden cups: my Courser is trained to the field, when your Gennet is taught to amble: when you are graced & belorded, & crouched and kneeled vnto, then find I small grace with our Irish borderers, except I cut them off by the knees.
At these girds the Lord Chaucellor much fretted, and finding Kildare to bee no babe, deferred the hearing of his cause, till more proofes were produced from Ireland; then in a great fume hee arose from the Counsell board, and committed the Earle vnto prison, against the minds of most at the Table, who knew well; that this his accusation was more of hatred borne by the Cardinall; then any occasion giuen by the accused late Deputy. Whereupon Thomas Duke of Norfolk slept to the King, and cra-ued that Kildare might bee his prisoner, offering to bee bound in goods and body for his forth coming, whom hee obtained, though with a great liking of the L. Chaucellor, who daily entertaine new plaints against him, till at last hee pressed him fore with letters sent to Oncale and Oconor, to encourage their rebellions against Ossory the Lord Deputy; which letters were brought them by his own daughter and their sisters, the Lady Elice Fitzgiralde wife to the Baron of Slane.

(59) This presumption being vehement, the King suspitious, the Cardinall eager, and his friends faint, Kildare was kept to the Tower, where hee committed himselfe to God, and expected dayly his death, but with such courageous resolution, as hee being in play with the Lieutenant at slide-groat; when the mandate was brought for his execution on the next morning, and seeing the Lieutenant strucke into a suddaine fadnesse; by Saint Bride, Lieutenant (quoth the Earle) there is some madde game in that scrowl; but fall how it will, this throw is for a huddle: and when the worst was told him, now I pray thee (quoth hee) doe no more but learne assuredly from the Kings owne mouth, whether his Highnesse be witting thereto or no; the Lieutenant louing his prisoner well, repaired to the King, and shewed him the Cardinals warrant, who then controuled the sawcines of the Priest (for those were his termes) and gaue the Lieutenant his Signet for a countermand, whereat the Cardinall stormed, but Kildare deliuered from his eminent death, and not long after from his imprisonment also, was sent into Ireland, where at his entrance into Dublin, hee was met with a solemne procession, and so brought into the City; so welbeloued was this Earle abroad, and at home.

(60) But the French Kings fortunes were nothing so good, who was straitly imprisoned at Madrid in Spain, and great suite made for his deliuerance, which notwithstanding would not be heard. The Queene mother then Regent of France, wife of her selfe, and forwarded by others, saw no better means to free her sonne the King, then to enter amity with England, which to accomplish, she solicited King Henry; working vpon the occasions then ministred, which was some vnkindnesse growne betwixt the English King, and the Emperour, the one of them more strange by the greatnesse of his fortunes, and the other in ialousie of lessening renowne. The sparkes of which Cinders were steared to flame, by Wolsey that cuer was in the care of the King: allad-ding his potency, so much esteemed of all Christian Princes (a sound very runable in Henries wide care) would bee less regarded by the Emperours late victory; who now beganne to carry himselfe with another respect, and neuer after that victory gotten subscribed his letters to King Henry, according to his accustomed manner, your Sonne and Cousen; but to the draught of his Secretaries, infixed his hand with the word Charles and no more.

(61) These dislikes and other intercourses of State, drew Henry shortly to a peace with France.
In the exemplification of which league the Venetians, and other Princes were left to their choise, whereof himselfe notwithstanding would bee stiled the Protector. And to his leaguer Ambassadors sent these instructions to moue the States to consider the Emperours aspired greatnesse, who now commanded the Kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie; the Duchie of Milan, the Signiorie of Iean, the Countie of Ast, and other possessions in Italie, the whole Country of Germany, being the greatest part of Christendome, already either totally in pos-possession, or facilly might bee at his command, hauing likewise the lower parts thereof, as the Countreies of Artois, Flanders, Zeland, Holland, Brabant, Henault and others; from the which also a direct passage lay vnto the Dutchie of Burgonie, Auern and Barbon, besides the Realmes of Castile, Arragon, Granate, Galice, Asturia, Perpygnon, Rusinian, and other parts of Spaine; whereupon hee with some other Princes complained, and fought the French Kings deliuerance, which when it was gotten, King Frances acknowledged Henry next vnder God to bee the onely meane: * but was so slacke in performance of Couenants, that when the Emperour sent to haue them accomplished, hee with vnprincely termes returned the answer, with challenge of combat, which when the Emperour had accepted, hee shrunke backe, and made meane of a league.

(62) But howeouer the vnconformity of our king Henry hath bene blanchd forth for not holding himselfe in his leagues or couenants of amity with other Princes, yet the cause being so as some haue obserued, there were occasions giuen aswell as opportunity taken: for Charles the Emperour contrary to couenant receiued Grancetor a traitorous rebell condemned by Parliament, whom hee refused to deliuer, though the King made earnest suit for the man. Moreouer by his Ambassadors in a Treaty of perpetual peace, holden at Windfor Castell, the nineteenth of Iune, and foureteenth of King Henries raigne; it was concluded that Charles the Emperour should contract the young Princeesse the Lady Mary, and take her to his wife, when shee came to able yeeres, which (as Holinshed saith) himselfe fought, at this being in England, promising to remaine vnmarrid, till that Princeesse had past her Minority, and againe before the battell of Pavia (the now growne vnto fixe yeeres of age) sent his Ambassadors to haue her stiled Emperesse, and to bee made Gouverneesse of the low Countreies; all this notwithstanding after that victory against the French King, hee beganne to recall, and to make small account of that match, pretending the desire of his subjects to haue an heire of his body, which for long time hee could not by Lady Mary; but rather as the English iudged, the cause was the money receiued in loane from King Henry, whereby (as hee thought) the greatest part of her portion was already paid; and the Emperours wants being great, * J. fabel the siller of Perlingall was much affected: with whom plenty of gold was expected, and great liberality offered by the Emperials in desire to haue an Emperesse of their owne Nation.

(63) Besides, against this marriage with Mary, his Countsell of Spaine also excepted, alleading her to bee begot of his brothers wife, whereby her legitimation might bee called in question, as also the issue of her body, which they in their widom thought meet to prevent; these no doubt were the causes that the negotiation of these two Potentates grew daily more desperate. And for his falling off from the French King, these occasions may well be alleaged.

(64) That whereas it had bene couenanted at the marriage of Lady Mary vnto King Lewis departed this life, one hundred thousand Crowns should bee paid to King Henry, and thirty two thousand Crownes yearly for her Dowry, during terme of life; both which notwithstanding were retained and kept backe vnpaid. 2. That the said French King had likt vnto Cardinal Poole, who was sent to him from the Pope to stirre warres against England. 3. That contrary to his Couenant hee had entred alliance with the house of Medicis, and had married his daughter Magdalen vnto James the fifth King of Scotland, then an hostile enemy vnto King Henry. 4. That hee had made suit to match his second sonne Henry Duke of Orleanes, with Lady Mary, the onely then Heire apparent of England, which when it came to conclusion, was put in suf-pence by Antonie Vesie one of his French Commissioners, who then made doubt whether the marriage of her mother being wife to the Kings owne brother, could bee dispensed with, or the Children begot in this second bed legitimate, or by law allowed to succeed in the throne.

(65) These considerations no doubt drew the King to bee vnconstant to them that were vnconstant in themselves, and the question of Lady Maries legitimation serued such doubts in his melting conscience, as neuer after could be made solid: whereof Doctor Longland his Confessor, is said to bee the first man which told the King that his marriage was vnlawfull, vnto whose opinion other great Clerkes did likewise content; whereupon a rumor ran that the King would be diuorced from the Queene, and the occasion thereof altogether cast vpon the Cardinal of Torke, in displeasure taken against the Emperour, vnto whom hee had bene suiter for the Archbishopricke of Toledo, whereof failing, hee reuenged his spleene vpon his innocent Aunt Queene Katherine, in mouing the King to cast her off, and to become Suiter vnto the Dutcheffe of Alencon, sister vnto the French King; these rumors King Henry himselfe forbad; but with no better successe then was the report of Queene Annes death, the wife of the Vsurper; both euents following before the mouthes of those relaters could be stopped; vnto which lamentable accident my penne must now enter.

(66) King Henry ouercome by the aduise of his Countsell (left to great a Dowry assigned should indamage England, if Lady Katherine of Spain married elsewhere) presently vpon the death of his father, and not fully forty dayes after he had begunne his raigne (by the dispensation of Pope Iuly the second) tooke her to wife, these hauing bene wedded and bedded with Prince Arthur his elder brother, as wee haue said.

(67) This match made by king Henry the seuenth, and Ferdinando of Spain their parents, Prince Henry hauing then attained but to tenne yeeres of age, when he came to foureteene, proscribed against it, as by a deed vnder his owne hand, I haue here inserted, the tenor thereof faithfully translated out of Latine, is thus as followeth.

In the name of God, Amen In the presence of you reuerend Father and Lord in Christ, Lord Richard by the grace of God, and See Apostolike, Bishopp of Winchester. I Henry Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester doe say, affirme, and by these Writings declare; That although in the time of my Minority, and when I was vnder yeeres of marriage, I absolutely contracted matrimony with the most vertuous Lady Katherine, daughter of the King of Spain, and although also the saide Contract by reason of my being vnder age, doth now appeare of it selfe insufficient, weak, and of no force, vigour, or efficacie: yet forasmuch as that now I am come to perfect yeeres, and that thereby the said Contract may peraduenture bee thought & seeme, by silent consent, mutual abode in one house, by giuing and receiuing gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatsoever, to bee apparently sufficient, and confirmed: Therefore I Henry Prince of Wales doe here protest, and make knowne to all men that I intend not to approue, ratifie, or confirme in any sort this pretended contract by any thing that I haue said or shall say, haue done, or shall doe: but do at this present renounce the same, freely, and of mine owne accord, vnconstrained either by force, fraude, entreaty, or any way else: and I deny it, and wholly purpose and intend, quite to relinquish this pretended contract of Matrimony by the best wayes and meanes that by law more fully, effectually, and sufficiently I may or shall bee able to doe: and expressly doe disauow the same, according as by these presents I doe disclaime it, and disauow it; and I protest that I nei-

The above written Protestation was read and made by the aforesaid Noble Prince Lord Henry, in the presence of the reuerend Father and Lord in Christ, the Lord Richard by diuine permission Bishopp of Winchester sitting iudicially in his Court; and I the Notary vnderwritten, at that time present, the writer of his Acts in this behalfe appointed, and in the presence of the vnder-named witnesses in the year of our Lord God, 1505 the eight Indiction of the most holy See, of our father and Lord in Christ, by diuine providence Pope Iulius the second, in his second yeere, and 27. of the month of Iune, in which day the saide worthy Prince was of perfect yeeres of marriage, as then he did there affirme: in a certaine outward Court within the roiall Palace of Richmond, situate in the West-part of the saide Palace: Concerning all and singular which things, the aforesaid most noble Prince instantly required and entreated me the aforesaid Notarie to frame an instrument, and likewise the witnesses vnderwritten to giue testimonie. The second protestation when he came to yeeres of marriage.

Notwithstanding this prescription foure yeeres after, and the first of his raigne, hee tooke the said Lady Katherine to wife; and without all exception enioied her nuptial society the space almost of twenty yeeres; in which time shee had borne him two sonnes, both of them in their infancy taken away by death, and one daughter Lady Mary growne now vnto tenne yeeres of age. But the scruple of Conscience increasing more tender in the Kings breast, he first refused the Queene's bed; and then mouing the doubt vnto his owne Diuines, sent for the opinions of the most Vniuersities in Europe, as to Paris, Orleanes, Bononie, Burges, Aniou, Padua, Toloux, Vincencia, Vania, Foro, Iuly, and others, which howsoever they then stood for the Pope, and hee allowing (by his Predecessors dispensation whose doing could not erre) the Matrimonie lawfull, yet these Academics concluded against it, and signified the contrary vnder most of their common Seales as the relation of the Kings Agent imploied vpon the same purpose for that of Padua doth import, which writing vnder his owne hand I haue seene, and heere will insert his words, as followeth.

Pleaseth it your Highnesse to bee aduertised, that as this day I obtained the Common Seale of the vniuersity of Padua in substantiall and good forme, for all the Doctors were assembled vpon Sunday, and the safe was amongst them, solemnly and earnestly disputed all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and this present Friday in the morning. And thereupon they concluded with your Highnesse, and desired a Notary to set his signe and hand vnto an instrument by Leonius and Simoneus deuised in Corroboration of your cause, and thereby to testify that this instrument was their deed, deuise, act and conclusion. And more credite to be giuen to the said instrument they caused the Chancellor of the Potesse here to set his hand and seale for the approbation of the Authority of the Notary: A Coppy of all the which things I send vnto your Highnesse by this Bearer, in most humble wise beseeching the same to be aduertised that the Generall of the Blacke Friers hath giuen commandement that no Blackefrier dispute the Popes Power: Notwithstanding Prior Thomas Omnibonus procureth daily new superscriptions, and will doe till the briefe of contrary commandement shall come vnto his hands. My fidelity bindeth me to aduertise your Highnesse that all Lutherans bee vnterly against your Highnesse in this cause, and hath letted as much with their wretched poore malice without reason or authority; as they could and might, as well here as in Padua and Ferrara, where bee no small company of them: I doubt not but all Christian Vniuersities if they bee well handled, will earnestly conclude with your Highnesse. And to obtaine their assent as well through Italie, France, Almaine, Austrich, Hungary and Scotland, I think it marvellous expedient for the preferment of this your most honourable and high cause.

The decree of the Lawiers in the Vniuersity of Paris.

We the Deane and Colledge of the Vniuersity of Paris, after many disputations and reasons, made vpon both sides, turning and searching of Bookes, both by the Law of God, the Popes Law and the Ciuill Law, we say, that the Pope hath no Power to dispense in this case of Matrimony. Teuen vnder the Seale of their faculty at Saint Iohn Lateranensis in Paris, May 2. 1530.

The Iudgement of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Paris.

The Deane and faculty of holy Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Paris to all them to whom this present writing shall come, wiseth safety in Christ; For the Question proposed we came together in the Church of Saint Martin, and there for the same cause had a solempne Masse of the Holy Ghost, and vpon our oathes determine, that the foresaid Marriage with the Brothers wife departing without children is so forbid by the Lawes of God and Nature, that the Pope hath no power to dispence with such Marriages, whether they be contracted or to be contracted; to which this our assertion we haue caused the Seale of our faculty, with our Notaries signe to be put to this present writing. Dated in our Generall Congregation Iuly 2. Anno 1530.

The determination of the Ciuilians of the Vniuersity of Aniou.

After wee the Doctors and Rector had discussed and examined many places aswell of the Law of God as of mans Law, vpon sufficient deliberation taken, we define and determine, that neither by the Law of God nor of Nature, it is permitted for any Christian man, no not with the authority of the See Apostolike, or with any dispensation granted by the Pope to marry the wife that his brother hath left. In witness whereof we haue commanded the Scribe of our Vniuersity to signe this present publike instrument with the great Seale of our said Vniuersity Enacted

The Luthrans against K. Henries diuorce.

Enacted in the Church of Saint Peter in Anien. May 7th Anno 1530.

The Determination of the Vniuersity of Burges.

We the Deane and facultie of Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Burges, after the example of Saint Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles, begin with prayer to the quieting of the conscience, to whom this our writing shall come; the Question moued is whether the brother taking the wife of his dead brother, the marriage consummated, and perfect, be a thing lawfull or no. We by much labour and turning of Bookes, euerie one of us a part by himselfe, free from corruption, the better to obey the truth, finde it forbidden by the Leviticall law which is Gods, and that such marriage is an abominable discovering of his brothers shame, which cannot be allowed by the authority of any man: which our determination we haue caused to be signed with the seale of our faculty, the tenth day of Iune, and yeere of our Lord. 1530.

The opinions of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Bonony.

All wee Doctors of Diuinity in this Vniuersity, vnto whom this Question was propounded, whether it was forbidden only by the Ordinance of the Church, or else by the Law of God, that a man might not marry the left wife of his brother departed without children, and having examined the matter euerie one of us alone, lastly came altogether, and as it were line by line, and rule by rule, brought forth the reasons for the contrary part, with those of the most Reuerend Father Cardinall Caietaine, yea and of the dispensation for raising up seed to his brother, spoken of in Deuteronomie; thus we determine, give iudgement, and say, and confidently doe hold and winnes that such marriage is horrible, accursed, and to be cried out vpon, and utterly abominable, not only for a Christian man, but for an Infidel, vnfaithfull or heathen: and that it is prohibited vnder greuous paines and punishments by the Law of God, of Nature, and of man, and that the Pope, though he may doe much, vnto whom Christ gaue the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen, hath no power to a dispensation to anie man to contract such marriage: In witness whereof we confirme this our iudgement, both vnder the Seale of our Vniuersity, as also with the Seale of our Colledge of Doctors of Diuinity, and haue subscribed it in the Cathedrall Church of Bonony this tenth of Iune, the yeere of our Lord. 1530.

The determination of the Vniuersity of Padua.

Seeing that certaine great Orators and Ambassadors did humbly require of vs, that wee would vouchsafe to search out with all diligence this question following, whether to marry the wife of our brother departed without children is forbidden only by the Law of the Church, or by the Law of God also: and if forbid by both the Lawes, whether the Pope may dispense with any man for such Matrimony or no? which Question we haue discussed and as farre as we can, haue made it cleere, both priuate euery man by himselfe and after al together openly, we say, iudge, decree, witnesse, and for truth affirme, that such marriage is no marriage: yea and that it is abhorred and accursed of euery Christian man, and to be abominate as a greuous sinne, and that it is cleerely forbidden vnder euell penalty by the Lawes of nature, of God, and of man, and that the Pope vnto whom the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen are committed by Christ the Sonne of God, hath no power to dispense by the right of Law for any cause, suggestion, or excuse, that any such Matrimony should be contracted. In witness whereof wee haue made this writing, and haue authorized it, with the accustomed Seale of our Vniuersity, dated at Padua in the Church of the Heremites of Saint Augustine the first of Iuly, and yeere of our Lord. 1530.

The determination of the Vniuersity of Tholouze.

It was treated in our Vniuersity of Tholouze: whether it were lawfull for a brother to marry her which had bene wife to his brother now departed, and without children: as also whether the Pope which hath the cure of Christs flocke allowing it by his dispensation, it be lawfull: to resolve which, the best Doctors of Diuinity, and the Lawes, did sweare that they would obey the sacred Counsels, and would follow the holy Decrees of the Fathers, and falling to conclusion stucke fast vpon this point, that it is lawfull for no man, neither by the Law of God, nor by the Law of nature, to take her to wife that his brother hath left: neither can the Pope dispense with this Law of God: as touching the commendement in Deuteronomie that the brother should marry his wife to raise up seed vnto him, that his name should not perish among the Tribes of Israel, we answere that that Law was but a shadow and figure of things to come, which vanished away as soon as the substance of the Gospell appeared. Thus haue we given our sentence, which wee haue signed with our Authentickall Seale of this Vniuersity. Taken at Tholouze, the Calends or first day of October, the yeere of our Lord, 1530.

These and many more were read by the Lord Chauncellor vnto the lower house of Parliament that they might report in their countries, the Kings iust cause of diuorfe. To forward which (as was thought) Cardinall Wolsey the said Lord Chancellor was sent Ambassadour into France, laden with Crownes, as Guichardine faith, and with surpassing Pompe as London behelde, who with 900. Horie passed the Bridge toward Dover, and so into France.

But rumors in England full spreading of the good Queens diuorfe, about a yeere after, K. Henry to satisfie all, sent for his Nobles, his Counsellors, Iudges, and many wise Commoners vnto whom he made a most pithy Oration, shewing them with what care he had ruled almost twenty yeeres with honour and victory, which as he said, would shortly be clouded, if he should die and leaue them a litigious Heire, examples he shewed of the woollfull experience of Lancaster and Yorke, in whose diffidence the Realme was like to haue bene utterly destroyed: and although (saith he) we haue a daughter to the great comfort of her mother and me, yet it is told vs by great Clarke, our marriage is not lawfull, but that the stands in case of illegitimacy; and we both, are said to liue in abominable Adultery; thinke you (my Lords) that these words doe not touch my very soule, the perill whereof we venture, as you doe also your inheritance, for which cause I haue asked counsell of the greatest Clarke in Christendome, and haue likewise heard the opinion of mine owne. But as touching the Queene, if it be iudged by the Law of God that she is my lawfull wife, there shall be nothing more acceptable vnto mee, whose noble conditions, I assure you, (besides her great Parentage) is most gentle, loving and obedient, whereof I haue had a true experience almost these twenty yeeres: and were I to choose a wife (if the marriage might stand with Gods Law) my Choise should be of her, before any other woman in the world, and if it shall otherwise be proued, I shall not onely be most sorrowfull for parting with so loving a companion, but much more haue occasion to lament my chauce, and life in so foule a sin; these then are the fores that torment my minde, for the sauing of my soule, and for which cause I haue heere assembled you, that you may declare to our loving Subjects this our true meaning, and to stay if it may be the rumors of vnstaid reports; and this being said, he let them to depart, each man bewraying in countenance the affection of his mind, some pitying the King to see him so perplexed, some fauouring the Queene for her sake, and some

fighed deeply at this strange speech and sudden alteration.

(68) But the Cardinall of Yorke fearefull to wade too farre alone in these troubled waters, desired the assistance of the learned in the Realme, and thereto got the Kings licence, which with his Legatine authority, commanded many learned men both Diuines & Lawyers, from Oxford and Cambridge, with the presence of many Bishoppes besides. These assembled at London, were shewed the Instruments and Seales of many forraigne vniuersities, all of them disabling the marriage, and holding the dispensation (allowing it) vnlawfull: but because that string could not be touched without found of reproch to the Pope, as also to cleare the King from calumnious reports; it was thought fittest to send the saide instruments to Rome, whereunto these so appointed (set their owne seales, with an humble request to his Holinesse, that an indifferent Iudge might be sent them, to determine this great and strange cause of the King; which was so followed by his Ambassadors in the Popes Court, that Lawrence Campius a Cardinall of great credite and wildome, from their Consistory was sent into England, vnto whom, wife Wolsey Cardinall of Yorke was ioined in commission, with power to erect a Court, to heare the cause pleaded, & to giue sentence definitiue, as they found the equity of law.

(69) To that end therefore a place was ordained at the Blacke-fryers in London, and the King with the Queene remoued themselves vnto his palace of Bridenell neere adioining, whence ere long they were summoned by Proccesse personally to appeare in Court, which accordingly they did, hauing several seates ordained vnder clothes of estate, mounted somewhat higher then the two Cardinals, the Presidents, vnder whose feet sat the Scribes and other Officers; the Court being framed Consistory wife, was furnished with Bishoppes, Doctors, Lawyers, and learned Counsellors, in most solemne wise: the Doctors for the King, were Simpson and Bell, and his Proctors Peter and Tregonell: for the Queene were Fisher, Standish, and Ridley, a very little man but a great Diuine, the Court thus set, and Commission read, the Cryer called the King, by the name of King Henry to come into the Court, who forthwith answered and said, Here. Then was the Queene called by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court, who made no answer at all, but presently rose vp, and going about the Court to the King, fell down on her knees, before his feet, and in the hearing of the people spake thus in effect.

Sir, I desire you to take some pity vpon mee, and doe mee Iustice and Right: I am a poore woman, a stranger borne out of your Dominions, hauing here no indifferent Councell, and lesse assurance of friendship. Alasse, wherein haue I offended, or what cause of displeasure haue I giuen, that you intend thus to put mee away? I take God to my Iudge, I haue bene to you a true and humble wife, euer conformable to your will and pleasure, neuer gaue-lying any thing wherein you tooke delight, without all grudge or discontented countenance; I haue loved all them that loved you, howeouer their affections haue bene to mee ward, I haue borne you children, and bin your wife now this twenty yeeres, of my virginity and marriage bed, I make God and your owne conscience the Iudge, and if it otherwise be proued, I am content to bee put from you with shame. The King your Father in his time for wifedome was knowne to bee a second Salomon, and Ferdinando of Spaine my Father, accounted the wisest among their Kings; could they in this match bee so farre ouerseen, or are there now wiser and more learned men, then at that time were? surely it seemeth wonderfull to mee that my marriage after twenty yeeres should bee thus called in question with new inuention against me who neuer intended but honesty. Alasse Sir, I see I am wronged, hauing no Councell to speake for me, but such as are your Subjects, and cannot bee indifferent vpon my part. Therefore I most humbly beseech you, euen in Charity to stay this course, vntill I may haue aduile and counsell from Spaine; if not, your Graces pleasure be done. And therewithall rising, and making lowly obeysance to the King, departed thence, leaning vpon the Arme of her receiuer, each man expecting shee had returned to her seat, when as shee tooke directie out of the place; which being perceived, the Cryer againe called her by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court; Madam quoth her guid, you are againe called; on, on, said shee, it maketh no matter, this is no indifferent Court for me; therefore goe forward.

(70) The King perceiving that she was departed, presently spake thus vnto the assembly. "I will (quoth hee) in her absence declare before you all, that shee hath bene to mee a most true, obedient and comfortable wife, ended with all vertuous qualities and conditions; according to her birth; and in lowliness equals any of baser estate. With that Cardinall Wolsey made vnto the King an humble request, that his Maiesty would bee pleased to declare before that honourable audience, whether hee had bene the causer of this his intended diuorfe, wherewith hee was charged in the opinions of the people.

My Lord Cardinall quoth the King, I can well excuse you in this, and rather affirme that you haue bene against mee, in attempting it thus far; but the chiefest motiue for this matter, was the scruple of conscience, conceived vpon certaine words spoken by the Bishop of Bayon, the French Ambassadour, sent from the King to conclude a marriage betwixt Prince Henry his second sonne, Duke of Orleans, and our onely daughter Lady Mary, which Bishoppe made doubt, and desired respite to bee satisfied for the legitimacy of our said daughter, in respect of our marriage with this woman, being my owne brothers wife, which presently engendered such scruples and doubts in me, that my conscience hath bene continually vexed, left by continuing in that sinne after knowledge, I draw Gods indignation against me, which I feare wee haue already done in that hee hath sent vs no issue male, and them that were begot in this untiall bed, no sooner came into the world, but were taken againe thence, and hopelesse now of more issue by her, it behoueth me to consider the state of this Realme, and the danger that may follow for lacke of a lawfull Prince to succeed. This burden too weighty for my weak conscience (not in any dislike of the Queenes age, or person, with whom I desire only to continue, if our marriage may stand with the law of God) I haue in this place assembled you our graue Prelates, and learned Diuines, to determine of, and will God willing submit my selfe to your iudgements. My doubts in this case I moued in confession to you my Lord of Lincoln, and ghostly father, whereof your selfe being somewhat troubled, said you would aske counsell of you all my Lords. Then of you my Lord of Canterbury being Metropolitan, I got licence to put the matter in question, to which I grant you all put your seales, as here in this Court the same is to be seen. True it is, said the Lord of Canterbury, and I doubt not but that all my brethren here present will acknowledge the same. Not so my Lord said the Bishoppe of Rochester, you neuer had my hand to that Instrument, nor neuer shal. Indeed said Cardinall of York you did it not your selfe, but admitted mee to subscribe your name, and allowed mee your Seale; vnder your correction said Rochester that is not so; Well, well, quoth the King, you are but one man, against whom at this time we will not dispute, and so rose vp, and the Court adioined untill another day. Which was vpon the next following, and twenty of May, the two Cardinals being for, the Lawyers were ready vpon either parts. Against the lawfulness of the marriage was alledged the other formerly solemnized with Prince Arthur, the Kings elder brother, and the nuptial knowledge of Lady Katherine's body, which was vehemently prosecuted by the Kings learned Council, by many reasons and likelihood of truth: one was, that Prince Henry had bene deferred from creation and title of Prince of Wales, the space of fixe monethes after Arthurs decease, as doubtfull whether Lady Katherine had bene by him conceived with child; for which cause as was alledged the said Lady had procured a second Bull from the Pope, with this collocation, vel forsan cognitam, and peradventur carnally knowne: which Bull was onely purchased to dispenche with this marriage. That she was carnally knowne, was vrged the report of his Chamberlaine, vpon certaine wordes spoken by Prince Arthur the first morning that hee rose from her bed.

(71) The Negatives denied all the presumptions, and this last, too farre vnbecoming that reuerent assembly and honourable Court. But by these Authentical Records which M. Fox had in his custody, the matter is past all contradiction for her carnal knowledge, whereto is affirmed that the Ambassadors of Ferdinand, being in England to see the same marriage consummated, returned their knowledge of their mutual conjunction, as that nothing was left vnperformed of any nuptial right, and they being of yeeres able to explete the Act, hee aboute fifteene, and shee aboute seuentee, laide both in one bed almost fixe monethes together, doe assure vs the certainty of that, which they made their greatest doubt, vnlesse the Popes dispensation was a Core to the cause. But that shee was carnally knowne the Vniuersity of Padua had concluded in their sentence, whom the Emperors Ambassadors earnestly solicited, either to retract their said grant, or to giue forth a new sentence vpon the case that the Queene was not carnaliter cognita ab illustissimo Principe Arthur, or to determine that this Matrimony was not dirimendum, which in no wise they could obtaine though they offered very largely to haue it done. Thus from day to day the pleas proceeded, but nothing concluded touching the diuorce, whereupon the King sent the two Cardinals to perswade with the Queene to put the whole matter onely to himselfe, which would bee farre better, and more honourable for her, then to stand to the tryall of law.

(72) These Legates accordingly repaired to Bridewell, and in presence staied for the Queene, who presently from among her maides at worke came forth vnto them, hauing a skaine of white thread about her necke; at whose sight shee said, alacke my Lords, I am very sorry to make you attend vpon me; what is your will? if it please your Grace (quoth Cardinal Wolsey) to goe into your priuy Chamber, we will deliuer the cause of our coming: my Lord (quoth he) this place is most fit, I pray you therefore declare here your minds. With that hee began his speech in Latine which she presently interrupted, saying, that shee vnderstoode the English very well.

(73) Madam (quoth the Cardinal) wee are come in goodwill, to know your Graces mind, in this great matter of your marriage, and to giue you our aduise with the best seruite we can. My Lords (said shee) I thank you, but for answer of my resolution, I cannot so suddenly make, the cause is great, and toucheth mee very neere; I am here a stranger, a poore woman lacking witte, notable to answer such noble and wise personages as yee be, I haue need of counsell, and they be in Spaine; for thinke you my Lords, that any English subjects, will bee for me against the King? forsooth I know

"they wil not, I pray your Lordships be good vnto me, a forrainger and destitute of friends, and assist mee with your Counsells, which I will be glad to heare. And thereupon taking them by the hands, led them into her Chamber, where they staied somewhat long; which done they departed, and made relation of her answer vnto the King. Who nothing pleased at the answer shee made them, sent againe certaine Lords vnto her, to shew her the determinations of those Christian Vniuersities, who had prescribed the marriage vnlawfull, and to wish her to remit the matter for the quieting of the kings conscience vnto foure Prelates, and foure temporall Lords: vnto whom shee answered saying, "the King my Father which concluded my marriage, I am sure was not so ignorant, but he asked counsell of Clerkes and well learned men, before hee married me the second time; for if he had had any doubt in my marriage, hee would not haue disbursed for a great treasures hee did, and then all the Doctors agreed my marriage to be good; insum that the Pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be done, did both dispense and ratifie the second marriage, against whose doings I maruaile that any person will speake or write. But as touching the determinations of the Vniuersities, I am a woman and lacke witte and learning to answer to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done iustly or partially: for this I am sure, that neither the Kings father, nor my father would haue condiscended to our marriage, if it had bene declared to bee vnlawfull; and where you say, I should put the cause to eight persons of this Realme for quietnesse of the Kings conscience; I pray God send his Grace a quiet conscience: and this shall bee your answer, that I say I am his lawful wife, and to him lawfully married, and by the order of the holy Church, I was to him espoused as his true wife (although I was so worthy) and in that point I will abide till the Court of Rome which was priuy to the beginning, haue made thereof a determination and final end.

(74) The King then hopelesse of his Queenes consent hastid his Lawyers to forward their diuorce, which daily they did, and the Consistory at Blacke Friers daily frequented, all points in Law were opened to the full, so that nothing now remained but the sentence of the Judges: for which a solemne day was assigned when the King in person came to heare it himselfe. His seat taken, and the Court set, after a crié for silence the proceedings were openly read, and all doubts cleared, the learned Counsell at Barre called for Iudgement, wherunto Campius the Popes stout Champion, vpon his stiffe gouty legges stood vp, all men expecting the sentence of Diuorce, but the Cardinal now not to learne what hee had formerly determined, said flatly, I will not giue iudgement in this matter, too high for vs, considering the estates of the Persons, and the doubtfulness of the occasions alledged, vntill I haue made a full relation to the Popes holiness of all our proceedings, whose counsell and commendation in this case I will obserue and follow, vnder whose authority we fit and are commissioners, therefore I will adiourne the Court for this time according to the order of the Court of Rome from whence our semblable iurisdiction is deriued. Which how it displeased the King, the Sequell will shew, and how then taken the words of the Duke of Suffolke did well declare, who stepping forth with a sterne countenance vied these words, It was neuer merry in England since we haue had any Cardinals among vs.

The Iudgement thus said, the King sent his Secretary Stephen Gardiner to Rome, to follow that Court, whether Queene Katherine had made her appeale: and Cardinal Campius admitted to depart, went away in no such estate, as was held fit for a man of his place, but rather as one suspected to carry with him more then his owne, had all his Chests recuseth of Campius against Cardinal.

Chests searched at Callis, euen to the Cloke-bags and Males. The cause of this stay (saith Slidam) was, that the French King, an entire friend vnto Rome, had no better successe in Naples, against the Emperour, whom the Pope durst not displease, the Lady Katherine being his Aunt, for whom the Emperour was so earnest, as in her behalfe he laboured Milan and many other places, that their learned men should not determine against the said Queene. But whatsoever the cause was, that Campius denied his sentence for the Diuorce, certaine it is, that Cardinal Wolsey, fell likewise in great displeasure of the King, though hee sought to excuse himselfe with want of sufficient authority: but now his Sunne hauing passed the Meridian of his greatnesse, began by degrees againe to decline, till lastly it set vnder the cloud of his fatal eclipse.

(75) Formerly wee haue spoken of the rising of this man, who now being swolne so bigge by the blasts of promotion, as the bladder not able to containe more greatnesse, suddenly burst, and vented forth the winde of all former fauours. Vaine glorious he was, in state, in diet, and in rich furniture for house, and in prodigall intertainements, more like to a Prince then a Prelate, attended with so many officers, and seruants as is almost incredible, were nor his Check-roll yet to bee seene. At his masse hee was serued by Dukes, and Earles, whoooke the assaie of his wine on their knees, and held him his Basin at the Lauatorie. And being Ambassador vnto the Emperour at Brussels, was there waited vpon by manie noble men of England, and serued at Table by his seruitors vpon their knees, to the great admiration of the Germanes which behelde it: and indeed so much ouertopped the Pompe of a spiritual function, as hee seemed to the more humble, to be mad for ioy; and him doth Campian iudge, rather to be a Bastard of some Prince, then the Sonne of a Butcher, so moulded for the one, and so farre mounting from the other: exceedingly wise he was and very well spoken, but full of reuenge and vicious of body, thrall to affection, and lulled asleepe with flattery, insatiable to get, but princely in bestowing, lofty to his enemies, and not easily reconciled, which hastened his fall, when he first began forto slippe. Queene Katherine in her cause, did grieuously accuse him, the Counsell for their parts, did article against him, the Law found him in a premunire vnto the King, and Sir Thomas Moore in the high Court of Parliament inueighed bitterly against him.

(76) The first steppe of his discent was his dislike of the Kings affection vnto Anne Bullen, a Gentlewoman nothing fauourable to his Pontificall Pompe, nor no great follower of the Rites of those times, which moued the Cardinal (the Pope hauing assumed the sentence of Queene Katherine's cause vnto himselfe) to write vnto his holiness to deferre the iudgement of Diuorce, till he had wrought the Kings minde in another mould. This was not done so secretly, but that it came to the Kings eare, and lastly cost the proud Cardinal his life. For the broad Scale first taken from him, and his other Bishopricks elsewhere betowed, his House and furniture seized vpon, and himselfe removed into the North, at Cawood Castle (euen miles from Yorke, was suddenly arrested (for arrogant words importing a desire of reuengement, saith Slidam) by the Earle of Northumberland, whence he was conueied toward London by the Lieutenant of the Tower, in which iourney at Leicester Abbey he ended his life, whose death himselfe had hastened by taking an ouermuch quantity of a confection to breake winde from off his stomacke, and in that Church was there enterrd.

(77) The grudges against this Cardinal were many and great, not onely for the effectual fauour he stood in with the King, and great stroake he bare at Counsell Board, (both which commonly breed emulation vnto the man so fasted) but for his intolerable pillings, who to patch vp his pride in the raising of his new Colledges, erected at Oxford and Ipswich, by the licence of Pope Clement 7. suppressed forrie Monasteries of good fame, and bountifull Hospitalitie, conuerting all their goods and mouables into his owne Cofers; which were so stuffed with treasure; that twelue Barrells full of gold and siluer were laid aside, to serue the Pope in his warres. As also that he emptied the Land of twelue score thousand pound, enforced by him from the King: All which he conuerted to relieue, and ranfome the Pope then in Prison, to the great impoverishing of his Maiesties Cofers: That his owne reuenues by his faculties, licences, and other legantine exactions did equalize the Kings yeerly Reuenues; and lastly his pride so intolerable, as no lesse then twelue hundred horse for his retinue, fourescore Waggons for his carriage, and threecore Mules for sumpter horses attended him into France. But St. transt gloria mundi, and the highest floud is subiect to an ebbe.

(78) But whilst the matter of the Kings marriage hung thus in suspence the space of two yeeres, and other Ambassadors intended to bee sent vnto Rome: it chaunced Doctor Crammer, Doctor Stephens, and Doctor Fox to meet at Waltham at one Table, where the two later, great Agents for the King, fell in discourse of his cause by termes, and strength of the Ciuill Law. Well said Doctor Crammer, if I might be heard, I thinke much better it might be tried by Gods Law: whereby the King should bee frustrated in the cause of his Conscience, then thus to be potted off with deliaies from yeere to yeere. This speech Doctor Fox made known to his Maiestie, which founded very tunably in his eare, then was Crammer sent for, conferred with by the King, and commanded to write his minde in the matter, but with this caution prefixed, not to respect the persons but the cause; who to him commended the vertuous perfections of his Queene, with whom aboute all others he most desired to continue, if their marriage could bee made warrantable by Gods Lawes; to which end hee commended the care of Bookes, and of his other Prouisions vnto the Earle of Wiltshire at Durham Place. The Doctor thus set on worke, when hee least looked to be so imployed, proued by Scriptures, General Councils, Auncient Writers, besides the present, and his owne opinion, that the Bishop of Rome had no authority to dispenche with the word of God, nor the Scriptures.

(79) The treatise thus finished, he presented it to the King, which when he had well read, and weighed the substance therein contained; Will you (quoth he) Master Doctor abide by what you haue writ? that will I by Gods grace said Crammer, euen before the Pope himselfe, if your Maieity will so assigne it; Marry quoth the King to him shall you goe. Whereupon Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltshire, Doctor Stokeley, Eleck of London, Doctor Lee the Kings Almoner, the Doctors Crane, Bennet, and Crammer, were sent to the Pope then at Bononie in Italy. The day approached for audience of their Ambassage, and the high Prelate set vpon his Throne of Estate, the Doctor prepared to make his Oration in defence of what hee had writ, when on the suddaine hee was interrupted by an vnmannerly spanell of the Earles, who seeing the Pope put forth his foot to be kist, caught in his teeth the Pontificall great Toe, so that these Ambassadors disdaining to kisse where the dogge had taken an assay, let the Pope draw backe his foot, and so lost that effectual fauour offered vnto them. The Proposition then made, that no man iure diuino could or ought to marry his brothers wife, and that the Bishop of Rome by no means could dispenche to the contrary, was replied vnto, that it should be answered at more leasure, when his holiness returned to Rome; in the meane while, to grace Crammer the more, he gratified him with the office of the Penitenciarship, and so dismissed the Ambassadors: who all, lauing Crammer returned ned to England; but he tooke his way towards the Emperour (to whom the cause somewhat appertained) being then at Vienna in his expedition against the Turke, vnto whose learned men he offered disputation, and in priuate conference ſatisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most respected for learning in the Emperours Court, as he held the Proposition most true. Whereupon others learned were discouraged to dispute, and suffered Grammer to depart without any further proceedings.

(80) The matter thus manifested in most parts of Christendome, this Gordians knot was lastly vnloosed by King Henrie himselfe, who now belides this his marriage, beganne to call in question, what authority the Pope had in his dominions, which being afterwards debated in Parliament, an Act passed against his vſurped Hierarchie, and all persons forbidden to appeale, or to make any payments vnto Rome. The Kings marriage with Lady Katherine, was by the same Parliament diſſolued, and his separation from her, made by the Archbishop of Canterbury to stand good, and effectually by Law, and that Queene Katherine from thenceforth should be called Princeſſe Dowager, which doings shee tooke so to hart, as shee procured the Popes curse against King Henrie, and his Realme, which curse was set vp at Dunkirke in Flanders, for that the bringer thereof durst come no nearer. And the Pope in reuenge of himselfe, being set in his Consistory accompanied with his Cardinals, proceeded to the Censure of these great Princes marriage, which he then adjudged to stand most firme and Canonically, and enioyned King Henry to hold matrimoniall society with the said Katherine his lawfull wife and Queene, and in that estate to account and maintaine her as it became a King and louing husband to doe, and if he refused to accomplish these premisses, then to be compelled thereunto, and neuer after to be heard in any Court as touching the invaliditie of the said marriage, and to pay the expences of the said traueſe, as he the holy father should iudice and thinke meete. This was done a yeere after that the King had married Queen Anne, and bare date from Rome, the 23. of March and yeere of Christ 1534. For in the meane while King Henry had set his affection vpon the Lady Anne Bullen, a Phenix indeed in his Princely eye, and another Heſſer for Englands saluation, both in her selfe and roiall Bud ſucceeding, as the heauens and world doe witness to this day. Shee was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Viſcount Rochford, Earle of Wiltſhire, and of Ladie Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk. This Earle Thomas her father was the ſonne of Sir William Bullen, whose wife was Lady Margaret, the second daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the ſonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen Lord Maior of London, who lieth buried in Saint Laurence Church in the Iewrie, pictured in his winding ſheete vpon a Plate of Braſſe, and about his Graue-stone vpon a border of braſſe in many places these words are written. Now thus, Now thus, Now thus, whose Charity was extended vpon the poore householders of that Citie, in distributing among them a thousand pounds. His Lady was Anne, eldest daughter and Coheire vnto Thomas Lord Hoo and Haffing, and his diſcent out of the house of the Bullens, an ancient Family in the Countie of Norfolk; accured therefore be the pen, that slanderously bringeth this roſe from a defiled Bed, whose Serpents mouth to vphold his God the Pope, hath ſewed out his poiſon of vntruthes, and made his tongue a sharpe ſword against the Lords annointed; let him therefore receiue his portion with the Serpent of deceit, and his reward with Satan the father of Lies.

(81) This Ladies religion was different from all Papall indulgences, embracing the Gospell that then began in our vulgar language to bee read, for which cause ſaith Steiden shee was accounted a Lutheran, cause enough to bee enuied at, by the Biſhops of that time.

(82) Her, the King inuested Marchionesse of Pembroke with Mantle and Coronet, both in regarde of her Nobilitie and many vertues (for ſo runne the wordes of her Patent) which done, he tooke the seas, for France, accompanied with ſuch a traine of his Nobles, as the like had not been ſeen, and among many Ladies Anne Bullen was one, where hee complained to the French King of the great wrongs offered him by the dull Pope as hee called him, who would haue Kings in perſonto attend his leaſure at Rome, and contrary to their Kingly dignities, to expoſe themſelues and affaires at his will there, to bondage and great danger; and therefore hee earnestly requested that the Pope might bee ſummoned to a Councell, to anſwer the many abuſes that hee had offered vnto most of the Princes in Christendome, and vnto himselfe not the leaſt, who for his part had allowed him threeſcore thousand Angels monethly to maintaine an Army for his deliuerance out of the Caſtle of Angell; where the Emperials vnder the Prince of Orange kept him. Which his buſineſſe being ended in France, and the King againe returned into England, hee preſently (though priuily) married the ſaid Lady Marchionesse in his Cloſet at White-hall, in the preſence of many; the Lady Anne Savage bearing her Traine, and Doctor Lee doing the rites of their coniunction, who was afterwards consecrated Biſhop of Cheſter, Conuener, and Lichfield, and Preſident of Wales.

(83) The Romanists much fearing that Babel would downe, if Queene Anne might bee heard against wicked * Haman, fought to vnderproppethe foundations thereof, with certaine deuiles of their owne; and that the ſame might paſſe without note of ſuſpition, they laid their forgery euen vpon Heauen it ſelfe; whose pretended Oracle Elizabeth Barton (commonly called, the holy maide of Kent) was made to bee; and the pillars of this godleſſe Fabrick were Edward Bocking, a Moncke by profeſſion, and doctour of Diuinity, Richard Maſters, Parſon of Aldington, the Town wherein he dwelt, Richard Deering a Monke, Hugh Rich a Friar, John Aſtſone, and Thomas Abell, Priests, put to their helping handes, and Henrie Gould Bachelor of Diuinity, with John Fiſher the Reuerend father of Rochefter, imploied their paines to daube theſe downe-falling walles, with their vnreproued Morter. The Scribes that let their pens for her Miracles, were Edward Thwaites Gentleman, and Thomas Lawrence Register, beſides Haukerſſ a Monke who writte a letter that was forged to bee ſent her from Heauen; and Richard Riſby and Thomas Gould, were the men which diſperſed her Miracles abroad to the world. This holy maide Elizabeth made a Votariffe in Canterbury, was taught by Bocking her Ghoſtly Father, and ſuſpected Paramour, to counterfeit many ſayned trances, and in the ſame to vtter many virtuous wordes, for the rebuke of ſinne, vnder which, more freely ſhee was heard againſt Luthers Doctrine, and the Scriptures translation, then deſired of many: neither ſo onely, but that ſhee gaue forth from God, and his Saints, by ſundry ſuggeſtiue Reuelations, that if the King proceeded in his diuorce, and ſecond marriage, he ſhould not raigne in his Realme one moneth after, nor reſt in Gods fauour the ſpace of an houre. But the truth diſcovered by Gods true Miniſters, this Oracle gaue place as all other ſuch did, when Chriſt by his death ſtopped their lying mouthes: for her ſelfe and * ſeuē of her Diſciples were executed for Treason at Tiſborne, and the other fixe put to their fines and imprisonment. With the like counterfeit reuelations and ſained predictions this Generation of Hypocrites had brought Edward Lord Stafford, Duke of Buckingham vnto his vnhappy ende, when as by the workings of John de la Court, his own Confeſſor, together with Nicolas Hopkins a Monke of the Carthusian Order, in the Priorie of Henion in Somerſetſhire, who by his viſions from heauen forthwith, heartned him for the Crown; but before his owne Coronet could aſpire to that toppie, hee worthily loſt both head and all vpon Tower-hill for his treaſon, Anno Dom. 1521. Vnto ſuch ſinners the world was then ſubiect, and into ſuch conceites their reputed holines had brought them, not onely among the ſimple and vnlettered, but euen with them that ſeemed to bee learned indeed: for by certaine predictions foreſhewing a great deluge, Prior Bolton of Saint Bartholomewes in London was ſo ſearefull, that hee built him a houſe vpon the height of Harrow hill, ſtoring it with provisions neceſſary, to keepe himſelfe from drowning, in A. D. 1524.

(84) But the Popes Holineſſe fearing the euent of the game, if euery man might ſet and caſt at his Crowne, thought it high time to lay hand on his owne State, and to keepe what was left, leſt al would bee gone; to which end hee ſollicited many Chriſtian Princes to ſtand on his part, and among them ſent his Brief vnto James the ſixt King of Scotland, deſiring his aſſiſtance againſt King Henry of England, whom in his Conſistory hee had pronounced to bee an Here-ſike, a Schiſmatike, a manifeſt Adulterer, a publike murderer, a committer of Sacrilege, a Rebel, and conuict of Leſe Maieſtatū, for that hee had riſen againſt him who was his Lord. And therefore hee had iuſtly depriued him of his ſaid Kingdom, and would diſpoſe the ſame to him and other Princes: ſo as they would aſſiſt to recouer the ſame, a very good provision, and very well foreſeene; for notwithstanding theſe boiſterous blaſts from Rome, the King kept his Crowne, and was rather feare of the Popes beſt Abettors, then did feare any potent power that the world could afford, whose thoughts were now buſied for the Coronation of his Queene.

(85) For Queene Anne conceiued, and percieued with Child, her royall Coronation was forthwith prepared, which with all royall obſeruances vpon the ſiſt of Iune, being Whiſunday was performed; and the ſeuenth of September following, ſhee bare into the world that excellent Princeſſe, which afterwards proued the mirrour of the world, euen Lady ELIZABETH, our late and moſt famous Queene.

(86) True it is, that the zealous conuerſation of this godly Queene gaue great encouragements vnto many, more publickly with boldnes to profeſſe the Goſpell; ſo that the Miniſters formerly fled in ſcafe of Religion, returned againe into England, where the new Teſtament (translated by Tyndall) was read, but with ſuch diſlikes to the Biſhoppes, that they got it to be burnt. Notwithstanding, to tickle the Kings eare, they preached againſt the Popes ſupremacy, and tooke the oath for the King themſelues; aboliſhed his authority by Act of Parliament, and ſuppreſſed many Monaſteries; leaving their reuenues to the Kings will; faire introductions indeed for what they intended, as the ſequell of the fixe Articles by them procured, doth manifeſtly ſhew: and thoſe purpoſely made againſt the maintainers of the Goſpell, whereof Queen Anne was the chiefe, who firſt was moſt fauourable to thoſe learned Diuines, that laide mans ſalutation vpon the Rocke Chriſt, next in procuring a tolleration from the king for them, whose doctrine did daily vndermine the Papall foundation: & laſtly, ſhe by no means would conſent to marry the King, vntill a lawfull diuorce was had for his ſeparation from Lady Katherine; his brother Arthurs wife, which thing this Pope greatly withſtood: theſe were cauſes ſufficient to moue his Holineſſe to bend his brow, and by his Inſtruments in Court to cutte off the principal mouer, who foreſawing no time tooke the Ball before his rebound.

(87) For the Queene deliuered of a dead Child, and the Kings affection wandring elſewhere, gaue them occaſion to worke on that Subiect, which God

In his wiſdome would haue downe, left his deliuerance from the bondage of darkeneſſe ſhould be attributed to any fleſhly arme, or that ſhee who then ſate in the throne of the worlds full felicity, ſhould fixe her ſenſes on ſo ſickle a Center, who hauing had experience what it was to bee a Princeſſe, muſt henceforth praſtiſe the patience of a poore priſoner, which in the third yeere of her marriage, and ſecond of May, to act the woſull Scene of her Tragedy, ſhee came vpon the Stage, being ſent to the Tower of London, and charged with high Treason againſt the King: at whole firſt entrance ſhee fell on her knees before Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk; and Thomas Cromwell Secretary her bringers, deſiring God to help her as ſhe was guiltleſſe of thoſe things whereof theſe waſtaceſſed, beſeeching thoſe Lords to bee Petitioners vnto his Maieſty in her behaile, who lamenting her caſe, left her Priſoner with Sir William Kingſſom Conſtable of the place.

(88) I will in no wiſe excuſe her guilt, hauing had iudgement and death by law, though others, and that vpon iuſt occaſions before mee haue done, but will ſpeake from them what they haue ſaid; and namely one, that wrote thereof vnto a worthy and reuerent perſon; in whoſe defence his wordes are theſe: It ſeemeth very plaine, that the crimes ſuppoſed againſt this Chriſtian Queene Anne, were matters contriued by the deuſe of the Pope, and his Inſtruments her enemies. None of them all that were accuſed in the ſame Treason, conſeſſing the Act euen vnto death, but haue left direct Teſtimonies in writing to the contrary; one meane Groome excepted, namely Marke Smeton, made confeſſion vpon ſome promiſe of life be like, but had his head cut off before hee was aware, or had time to recall what he had ſaid. The like did Cromwell the Secretary ſignific to the King, after the priſoners had bene thoroughly examined in the Tower by the Councell, who wrote thus in his letter on the ſame day; many things haue bene obiected, but nothing conſeſſed; onely ſome circumſtances haue bene acknowledged by Marke. And ſo doth Crommer Arch-biſhoppe of Canterbury in his letter of comfort vnto the King, who roſe lamented that ſuch a ſtarre was fallen, if her guilt could bee prooued. And willed his Highneſſe to ſtand in defence of the Goſpell as ſhee had done, without any report of confeſſing or acknowledging any ſuch Acts as were obiected, which as Steiden writteth, were Adultery, and inceſt, but vniuſally (ſaith he) as it is ſuppoſed and proued ſince: With her were executed certaine Gentlemen of the Kings Priuie Chamber, namely, Norris, Weſton, Breynton, and one Marke, which contrary to his conſcience (as it is reported) for hope of preferment ſubſcribed to a bill, whereby hee condemned both himſelfe and all the reſt.

(89) For vpon the ſeuenth of May, her brother George Bullen Lord Rochford, for his ſuppoſed offence with theſe foure before named, were all of them beheaded vpon the Tower hill, but none of them confeſſing the Act; I haue heard it reported that Rochford the Queenes brother coming to her bed ſide to ſollicite a ſuite, leaned thereupon to whiſper her in the eares, which the Spials gaue forth that hee did ſo, to kill the Queen, howloeuer, they are dead, and the Queene muſt die, who two dayes before had bene arraigned in the Tower, the Duke of Norfolk being her Judge; to her inditement ſhee anſwered ſo effectually, that ſhee ſeemed to cleare all matters laid to her charge; yet was ſhee found guilty, and vpon the nineteenth day of May, was brought to a Scaffold erected on the Greene within the ſaide Tower, where, in preſence of many noble men, the Lord Mayor of London, the Shirriffs, and ſome principall commoners, ſhee is ſaid to haue ſpoken theſe wordes in their preſence.

(90) Good Chriſtian people, I am come hither to die, for according to the Law, and by the Law I am iudged to death, and therefore I will ſpeake nothing againſt it: I come hither to accuſe no man

"man, nor to speake any thing of that whereof I am accused and condemned; as for mine owne offences God knoweth them; and vnto God I remitte them, beseeching him to haue mercy vpon my soule; and if any person will meddle in my cause, I desire them to iudge the best; and so I take my leaue of the world, and of you all, and heartily do beseech you to pray for mee; and I beseech Iesus Iesus my Soueraigne and Master the King, the most godliest, noblest, and gentlest Prince, that is, long to raigne ouer you. These words the vttered with a smiling countenance, which done, shee kneeled down, and with a feruent Spirit said, to Iesus Christ I commend my soule, Lord Iesus receive my soule; and repeating thole words very often, suddainly the stroke of the sword sealed the debt that she owed vnto death; whose head and body was buried in the quier of the Chappell in the Tower.

(91) Now that her death was rather sought for, than any wife desired, doth witness the sword, whose edge was not wiped from the blood of her death, before the marriage bed of the King was prepared for another wife, which was Lady Jane Seimer in vertues her equal; who vpon the next day following being the twentieth of May, was married vnto the King, and succeeded this vnforgotten Lady in place of his Queene.

(92) And albeit Eugene Anne in her life time had sinned as David; or by traitory fell, as who sinneth not; yet that it should be follicitious and vnnatural, the quiet of her conscience at her death, did well witness the contrary, & her innocency so much more apparant, as her Christian modesty, in excusing her Soueraigne, and yielding obedience to the law howsoever Poole and Paulus Iustus from their Cardinals spleenes have filled their penes to blot her faire name, whose death notwithstanding was so grievously taken among the German Protestant Princes, who were minded to haue made K. Henry the head of their league, that thereupon they vtterly brake off, and refused him, onely for the cause and death of this most Christian Queene, whose religion and vertues daily shewed forth the fruits of her life, both in preferring the best men of gifts vnto the best benefices, and also in retaining for her Chaplains them of good fame, whose godly exhortations shee did not onely follow, but would will them freely to tell her what they law in her amiss. So mercifull shee was to the poore, that shee spent almost her whole reuene for their reliefe, and in nine moneths space distributed among them to the value of fifteen thousand pounds, intending likewise to bestow a great stocke into the four quarters of the Realme, to set poore Artificers on worke. Now if the tree bee known by the fruits, as truly it is, then these were her lights that shined before men, and the workes that shewed the fruites of her faith farre from such finnes, as the sway of thole times charged her with.

(93) And by the working of the same faith, her penance was scene, in her sorrowes conceiued, and thirsting reconciliation vnto them whome shee had any wife offended, as by this worthy example is apparant; when the day before the suffered death, being attended vpon with six Ladies in the Tower, shee took the Lady Kingston into her Prefence Chamber, and there locking the dore vpon them, willed her to sit downe in the chaire of Estate: whereunto she answered, that it was her duty to stand, and not to sit at all in her prefence, much lesse vpon the seat and state of her, her Queene. Ah Madam quoth shee, that title is gone, I am a condemned person, and by law haue no estate left me in this life; but for clearing of my conscience I pray you sit downe; well said the Lady Kingston, I haue often played the foole in my youth, and to fulfill your command, I will doe it once more in mine age, and thereupon shee lay downe vnder the cloth of estate, which no sooner was done, but that the Queene most humbly fell vpon her knees before her, and with teares, holding vp her
